There are a number of experimental and development processes which are contemplated and which, in my judgment, are very necessary in order to perfect the present types of ordnance, because it was stated to the committee that this war has demonstrated that all of the types of ordnance used in the war, both by this country and by our allies, were in a measure obsolete on account of the information gained by our experience in the war.

It does, however, indicate that only such sums shall be expended from existing balances as may be needed to salvage and protect the vast quantities of material the Government has acquired and such additional sums as may be needed to carry out the military policy of the United States under whatever strength of army may be authorized for the coming year or may be warranted by the conclusions that may be reached by the conference of nations now being carried on.

The appropriations carried in the fortifications bill heretofore have been made without reference to a fiscal year and have continued available until they have been expended. The committee has recommended that the appropriations contained in the accompanying bill shall not be available after June 30, 1920, and that beginning with the fiscal year 1921, and annually thereafter, estimates for fortifications shall be made upon a fiscal-year basis. The greater number of the appropriations now provided in the bill are for maintenance purposes, and if appropriations for construction work which will require more than a fiscal year to complete are carried hereafter the question of their availability for more than a single fiscal year can be adjusted to fit the particular item. In connection with the placing of this bill upon a fiscal-year basis the committee also recommends that none of the unexpended balances of appropriations for fortifications remaining upon the books of the Treasury on June 30, 1920, shall be available for obligation after that date. Very large sums have been appropriated during the war for purposes generally described as "fortifications," and especially with reference to field artillery. While portions of these have been repealed, the committee believe that a limit to the period of availability of any sums which may remain will result in a more careful checking up of expenditures from continuing appropriations than otherwise could be had. [Applause.]

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, during the past few years considerable criticism has been directed to our military and naval program. Our entrance into the war with Germany found us unprepared both from a military and naval standpoint. The fact that we were unprepared was seized upon as a ground for the charge that America did not have a military or naval policy. Any person who will make a study of military or naval affairs must be forced naturally to the conclusion that such criticism is entirely unfounded. The military and naval policy in the United States for a number of years prior to our entrance into the world war has been for a small Army and for a reasonably large Navy. Whatever of criticism, however, may be directed against our Military Establishment in this regard can not with any justice be urged against that branch of the service for which the fortifications bill makes financial provision.

Keeping in mind the real objects of fortifications, it is admitted by those who are familiar with our fortifications and works of defense that they are the best in the world. I do not believe it is contended by anyone that we should erect permanent fortifications at points along our coast, as well as along our northern and southern borders, sufficiently close together to prevent an enemy under all circumstances landing at some place on American soil. Such a plan has never for a moment been seriously considered by anyone. Such a plan never will be seriously considered.

Broadly speaking, the functions of coast fortifications are threefold: First, they are designed to defend a particular place such as a harbor or a large center of population, and by the defense of a harbor is included the prevention of an enemy fleet from entering the harbor and using it as a rendezvous; second, to release the Navy in order that it may attack an approaching enemy, when without the fortifications the Navy would be compelled to remain where it could defend such harbor or center of population; third, it would compel an enemy to go to some undesirable point in order to land.

How well we have succeeded in accomplishing these results can best be gathered from the opinions of men who are, from a technical standpoint as well as a personal knowledge of our coast fortifications, competent to judge.

Fortifications in the United States have grown with the art of gunmaking. When the navies of the world carried only cast-iron, smoothbore guns, up to the period of the Civil War, it was only necessary to place like armament upon our seacoast fortifications. But when the navies commenced to discard this class of armament and substituted in its place modern rifled ordnance it was necessary for us to displace the old cast-iron cannon with a piece of ordnance having a range equal to that of any gun that might be brought against it.

Various boards have been established from time to time by the War Department to establish standards for our coast fortifications. The Getty Board on Heavy Ordnance was appointed pursuant to an act of Congress of 1881. The Gun Foundry Board was appointed under an act of Congress of 1883. But the board which formulated the plans of our modern coast fortifications was known as the Endicott Board, which was appointed by the President on May 12, 1885, and made its report on January 23, 1886. The report of the Endicott Board was the rule that guided Congress in making appropriations for fortifications for more than 20 years. President Roosevelt constituted the National Defense Board, commonly known as the Taft Board, which made its report to Congress on March 5, 1906. This report, with slight modifications in its recommendations made from time to time by the War Department, continued to be the guide of Congress in making appropriations for fortifications after its adoption until 1916, when a new board appointed by the Secretary of War in February, 1915, made its report in 1916.

The estimated cost of constructing these works of defense under the several plans adopted from time to time by the acceptance of the reports of the various boards is as follows:

Endicott Board, scheme of fortifications, exclusive of ammunition, was	$126, 377, 800
Taft Board, cost completing defenses, exclusive of ammunition	6, 571, 301
Taft Board, cost of ammunition	50, 876, 339
Board of Review projects	96, 000, 000

These reports of military boards composed of experts have been the charts guiding Congress in the making of appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense. Members of the committee can not form independent judgments that are worth anything on technical matters of this kind, but are forced to follow these charts that have been made for them by the men who are competent to pass upon these matters.

In 1914 Maj. Gen. Leonard A. Wood, then Chief of Staff, in a statement before the Subcommittee on Fortifications, gave it as his opinion that with the completion of the Taft board projects our fortifications were adequate. His statement was as follows:

Mr. SHERLEY. It has been testified heretofore that so far as the continental United States was concerned we were not only adequately fortified but in many instances overfortified.

Gen. WOOD. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHERLEY. And you concur in that general proposition?

Gen. WOOD. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHERLEY. In your judgment, would it ever be necessary, as to the large proportion of fortified places, to make any change in the armament that has been provided?

Gen. WOOD. No, sir; except possibly in the type of mortar carriages and some other minor changes which might involve the placing, possibly at an advanced point, a battery or two of a heavier type of gun, but essentially the present armaments will remain intact so far as we can see.

Gen. Wood further stated that the Taft board project which Congress had approved remained to be completed; that some portions of it might not be needed, and he gave a list of the batteries, with their accessories, which it would be necessary to construct to fully complete the scheme.

In a statement before the Subcommittee on Fortifications in 1915 Maj. Gen. Erastus M. Weaver, who for many years was the efficient Chief of Coast Artillery and familiar with its every detail, speaking of our fortifications, said:

My opinion is that our system of fortifications is reasonably adequate for all defensive purposes which they are likely to be called upon to meet. * * * I have been a close student of the whole subject, naturally, for a number of years, and I know of no fortifications in the world, as far as my reading, observation, and knowledge go, that compare favorably in efficiency with ours.

This year when this same subject was before the committee Gen. Black was questioned, and he answered as follows:

Mr. GOOD. What lessons have we learned during this war with regard to the power of guns or new implements of war that would change in any material degree the plans for the seacoast defenses as laid down by the board?

Gen. BLACK. I really can not say that there has been anything new brought out. The only new feature that has been brought out has been airplane fighting.

Mr. GOOD. How about the range of guns? Would that unsettle your plans?

Gen. BLACK. No, sir; not very much, or not more than we have outlined in the estimates, and that was foreseen.

I quote these experts on this subject only to show in a general way what our defenses are and as a further reason for our failure to adopt new and costly additions for our defenses which have never been adopted by the Board of Review.

Since these hearings were had we have done very much toward adding to our fortifications and strengthening those already constructed by the installation of guns of greater power and range. During the past 25 years the War Department has recognized the fact that as long as the art of war was in a stage of progress the plans of coast fortifications had to keep abreast with such progress; that the function of seacoast fortifications would not serve their full purpose unless such fortifications were able to cause a naval enemy to keep beyond the range of the armament of the fortifications. Unquestionably such a claim can truthfully be made for the fortifications of the United States.

Mr. DENISON. Does that include the Philippines?

Mr. GOOD. Yes; that includes the Philippines, Hawaii, Panama Canal Zone, and continental United States. The bill embraces the whole matter.

Mr. DENISON. I had reference to the statement which the gentleman has been reading. Had they a reference to these fortifications, too?

Mr. GOOD. Yes. I might say that our fortifications in the Philippines are finer even than those in the United States, as the construction there was commenced at a later date than our fortifications here, and I think without question they are the most modern fortifications in all the world.

Mr. DENISON. In that connection I want to repeat what I heard here in the House the other day in reference to the fortifications at the Panama Canal Zone——

Mr. GOOD. I can not yield for that purpose now. This splendid showing has, as I have already indicated, not come about by chance. The system adopted in the United States has been a consistent system and has been adopted by accepting the judgment of men qualified to pass on the subject.

I do not believe that any member of the committee professes to have that scientific knowledge requisite to say where a fortification should be placed, the character of the armament, or anything of that kind, and, so far as I know, it has never delegated to itself that authority; but what we have done is to take the report of these boards as they were brought down to date from time to time, analyze them carefully, consider very carefully the estimates for appropriations, and give such money as in the judgment of the committee was thought wise to appropriate under all the circumstances.

I do not mean to say that Congress has at all times followed explicitly the reports of the various boards or of the Secretary of War where he modifies the reports of any of these several boards. For instance, a few years ago an estimate was made by the War Department to build an artificial island down at Cape Henry. On investigation it was found that the total cost would be about $30,000,000. That matter was before Congress for a number of years, was finally rejected by Congress and abandoned by the War Department, and yet able men from the War Department had advocated that work for a number of years. Take this year. Here we have estimates totaling $71,740,180 for aero service.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The amount of $125,000,000 under the Endicott Board plan has already been expended. What are the actual appropriations up to this time for our coast fortifications, approximately?

Mr. GOOD. I am sorry I can not give the gentleman that information; I do not know what the total is. My recollection is in the continental United States the armament alone is carried on inventory at something over $50,000,000, and what the emplacements and armament cost, what additions in the way of alterations have been made, I do not know, as changes are constantly going on. This bill provides for one item of $1,125,000 for alterations alone, a great deal of it to be expended to change certain carriages so they will give the guns an elevation of 20 degrees instead of 15 or less degrees, as now obtains for a great many of those guns.

Now, the committee had before it estimates for over $71,000,000 for aerial stations. Already the War Department has $10,800,000 that could be expended in continental United States for that purpose. The committee did not give anything for this project and for a very good reason.

In the first place, if the projects have the merit that the officers who came before the committee claimed for them, then it seemed to the committee that the War Department should ask this Board of Review, which is a permanent board, to modify their changes, and come before the committee with a complete report upon which the officers who have studied the problems agree that that is a solution. Suppose Congress would give $71,000,000 on the request of the Secretary of War and the showing made by some subordinate officer without a report from the Board of Review, and then we should find we had made a mistake and that there had been great extravagance and waste and that these stations had been placed at points where they do not add to our defense? If that were done one can readily see the criticism for such useless expenditures might properly be directed toward the Congress.

Take the question of railway mounts. We were asked to give large sums of money—several millions of dollars—for railway mounts for these large guns. We went into that question quite fully. The Board of Review has not asked for a single railway mount to be provided for fortification purposes, and yet the Board of Review is a permanent board as now constituted. Hence this estimate comes without their approval so far as the record discloses. Gen. Black testified that there are two principal objections to railway mounts, so far as guns of large caliber is concerned; that is, over 10-inch guns. In the first place, you can not fire them as rapidly, and, in the second place, you can not fire them as accurately. When a gun at a fortification is fired at a moving target and that target is comparatively small, a battleship, for example, two things are absolutely essential; first, there must be absolute accuracy of fire if the fortifications are to be effective, and, secondly, there must be great rapidity of fire.

It is not like training a gun upon a big city like Metz, as Gen. Beach pointed out, with its fortifications and its manufacturing plants and its railroads. Used at such a place, if a projectile does not strike at the point where it was desired to strike it still does great damage if it destroys a railway or if it destroys a munition factory, or something of that kind. Not so with a moving target. If it fails to hit the battleship no damage is done. When the committee heard these conditions it did seem to us that before we provided for additional railway carriages in addition to those which we will obtain in bringing a great many of them back from France, the Board of Review should take the matter up and study it in a scientific way, and then make a report to Congress upon which a layman could act in an intelligent way.

As stated by the chairman, there was estimated originally, before the armistice was signed, and in supplemental estimates, for the purposes of this bill, $645,576,961. After the signing of the armistice additional estimates came in, estimates for objects that were not estimated for while war was in progress. And a revision brought the total amount down to $92,893,657. The committee has reported this bill carrying $11,199,000. While the reduction seems to be very large, I undertake to say that by that great reduction we have not postponed for a single day the completion of any project provided for, either in the Endicott Board, the Taft Board, or the Board of Review. But we did eliminate a great many things that were not provided for in the reports of any of these boards, and in some places we did not give as much money as was requested, because it was found that with the amounts appropriated and the money on hand the department would have more than it could probably expend.

A great deal of money was asked for making alterations in field artillery and field-artillery ammunition, and the committee was amazed and surprised to learn that after the millions and billions of dollars we had expended for field artillery the men best qualified to know stated to the committee that we did not have a piece of field artillery to-day but that was obsolete or comparatively so, and they wanted vast sums of money with which to commence the study of new types.

The same thing was true with regard to field artillery and other ammunition. The committee did not give any money for this purpose because the department, in the opinion of the committee, has sufficient funds with which to discharge its obligations and also to carry on reasonable investigations in this regard.

And I want now to call the attention of the House to a thing that I think the War Department intends to do that it should not be permitted to do.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield before he gets onto that question?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. FESS. How long does it take to make a piece of artillery obsolete? What I am trying to get at is, is the change so frequent that it is impossible to keep up with the latest?

Mr. GOOD. Changes are constantly going on, and the only example that was brought before the committee's attention in that respect was of our 75-millimeter guns.

Mr. FESS. How old are they?

Mr. GOOD. They are new. We have turned out more since the signing of the armistice than we turned out before, so far as our own manufacture is concerned. It is said that that gun is practically obsolete, because that gun was designed to be drawn, as I now recall, by four horses—maybe it was eight horses—that the bringing into use of the self-propelled vehicle upon which these guns would be mounted makes the 75-millimeter gun interchangeable with the 88-millimeter gun of the Austrians, and that the two are interchangeable so far as mobility is concerned, but the range of the Austrian 88 is a great deal more than our 75.

Mr. FESS. I thank the gentleman. I did not want to interrupt his line of thought.

Mr. GOOD. I was speaking about a matter which I think the War Department has no authority to do with money in its hands. A considerable amount of money was asked for the purpose of making experiments in ammunition. We have already appropriated vast sums of money for ammunition, and a great deal of it was used for the purpose of constructing nitrate plants. We built four nitrate plants—one at Sheffield, one at Muscle Shoals, one at Toledo, and one at Cincinnati, or rather we commenced one at Cincinnati. Now it has been discovered that the ammonium nitrate we are manufacturing at Muscle Shoals, for instance, where one plant has been completed, has turned out commercially so that it can not be used for fertilizer. It cakes rapidly. It must be produced in a more powdered form in order to be available for commercial fertilizer; and the War Department asked the committee for $300,000 to build a laboratory in the city of Washington to make this investigation, not for war purposes but for commercial purposes. That might be desirable, but so far as the money that was appropriated for war purposes is concerned, not a single penny of it ought to be expended for any commercial purposes, no matter how desirable it might be to do work along that line. The committee on fortification has no jurisdiction of that subject.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I would like to say at that point in the gentleman's argument that I have been informed within the past two weeks that the Muscle Shoals plant has been entirely shut down and is not now in operation.

Mr. GOOD. That is correct. The committee went into that question. We have fine buildings at Muscle Shoals and fine buildings at Sheffield, where this experimental work could be done, and the committee was amazed to find that the only substantial reason urged why it could not be done there, if done at all, and why it should be done at Washington, was that the officers in the Army would not live at Muscle Shoals or at Sheffield; that neither was a desirable place in which to live. I do not know whether that would be true of Cincinnati or not.

Mr. LONGWORTH. They would have all flocked there.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman said "expended," but he did not say how much, on the Sheffield and Muscle Shoals plants.

Mr. GOOD. I do not have the figures at hand but my recollection of the figures is that these four plants have cost us considerably over $100,000,000.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I can state that so far there has been over $65,000,000 expended at plant No. 2 at Muscle Shoals alone, and the estimates are that it will amount to about $80,000,000, and the plant is now closed.

Mr. GOOD. Then the entire expenditures for nitrate plants will run very much over $100,000,000.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. The gentleman says that the location of the plant at Cincinnati would not be a desirable place to live. I will say it is located close to Amelia, Ohio, and it is a very desirable place to live in.

Mr. SLOAN. May I ask the gentleman what is the objection to living in Cincinnati?

Mr. GOOD. I take it none. Cincinnati is a very desirable place to live in, no doubt.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will say to the gentleman that we are particular as to whom we will allow to come there. [Laughter.]

Mr. GOOD. That may account for the fact that the War Department was unable to locate this $300,000 plant down there. [Laughter.]

I submit that a very substantial reason is given in this connection for a little discipline to some of these Army officers, whether they want to live there or not. If it is necessary to do this work, they ought to be compelled to live there. Other people live in these communities, the plants were located by the War Department, and in constructing them the officers of the War Department ought to have taken into consideration then the desirability or undesirability of the location within which people might comfortably live, and if workmen can live there it is a fit place for officers to live.

But, as I have said, there is another objection which to my mind is even greater, and that is that this bill does not and should not carry a provision for studying commercial standards for anything. This is the fortification bill, and the money appropriated under this bill is purely for military purposes, and not a penny of it is authorized to be expended for purposes such as are proposed. And I for one propose to see to it that the policy that has always prevailed in behalf of the War Department and Congress, so far as the items carried in this bill are concerned, shall be followed out, and that not a single penny shall be expended for matters that are not specifically authorized.

The bill this year, as I stated, carries something over $11,000,000. The average appropriation for 10 years prior to 1917 by the fortification appropriation bill is a trifle over $6,000,000 per annum. It is fair, however, to say that this bill carries some objects not formerly carried during those years in the fortification bill. It takes care of the fortifications at Panama, and contains an item of $4,000,000 for the erection of barracks and quarters at Panama for two regiments of Infantry.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. I see we continue to spend money in defending Panama, and in fortifying Panama against any invasion that might be attempted there.

Mr. GOOD. Yes. We carry a considerable sum.

Mr. SLOAN. What is the object of defending it since the United States has no special privileges reserved to its citizens there?

Mr. GOOD. A few Members of Congress think we have some special interests at Panama worth protecting, and they are not only willing to protect them, but intend to see to it that ample protection is afforded.

Mr. SLOAN. But the House some years ago yielded them up at the request of the Executive, but without my vote.

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does it take $4,000,000 to shelter two regiments of Infantry?

Mr. GOOD. Those buildings are to be fireproof buildings. They are barracks and quarters. There is a great deal of work to be done in the way of bringing water to the barracks, and quite a considerable expenditure for sewers and the like. At the present time the only provision for the troops at Panama is on one side of the canal, while the railway and the places where it was desired to keep the troops are on the other side.

There are no barracks there at all where the men can find shelter, except the barracks formerly occupied by the Porto Rican regiment. That regiment has gone back to Porto Rico, and it is impossible to use those barracks for the shelter of those that we are sending there at present. The bill also provides for storage for hay and grain and a few things of that kind.

I will say to my colleague that the amount estimated was considerably in excess of that, but the estimates were made at a time when everything—labor and materials—was at the peak, and the committee seemed to think that we could reasonably cut the estimates by about 15 or 20 per cent, which we did.

There is also an item in the bill which is unusual, and helps to swell the total by something over $500,000—for the protection of Sandy Hook. That matter has been before our committee for a couple of years. The action of the waves at that point upon a narrow strip has been to encroach upon the land, washing away the trestles that carry the Government railroad and endangering our fortifications there as well. The committee, after considerable hesitancy, decided that that piece of land—that reservation there containing many thousands of acres of land—was worth protecting, and especially in view of the fact that we maintain a large garrison there and have very extensive fortifications at that point. Therefore we thought that we should yield to the demands that have been made for several years, inasmuch as the work of encroachment upon the land seemed to be going on.

But the one thing about the bill that, it seems to me, ought to commend it to the House is the fact that, while it represents a cut of over $80,000,000 from the amount recommended by the War Department, it will not in the slightest degree prevent the carrying on of the work as outlined by the Board of Review for Seacoast Fortifications.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, has the gentleman's time expired, so that he has not time to answer any questions in regard to the bill?

Mr. GOOD. I shall be glad to answer.

Mr. DENISON. The act of 1916 in regard to this John Hays Hammond apparatus appropriated $417,000, and provided that no part of that amount should be expended until the Government had first secured from Mr. Hammond his rights. That is repealed in this act, and this act appropriates $417,000 for the purpose of going ahead and making the demonstrations, with no assurance whatever that the Government will get the rights after it has made the expenditure. Is that the intention of the committee?

Mr. GOOD. No; it is not the intention of the committee, and I do not think the language of the bill warrants that interpretation. All we have done by this provision is to permit the expenditure of $417,000 prior to the acceptance of the patent to be acquired from Mr. Hammond.

Mr. DENISON. Can the gentleman point out any language which secures to the Government the patent rights in case they go ahead and make the demonstration?

Mr. GOOD. The Government's rights are secured, not by the act of 1916 alone, but rather by the contracts with Mr. Hammond mentioned in that act. The fact that the Government has entered into a contract with John Hays Hammond, jr., for the purchase of this, and that that contract is referred to in the legislation which authorized the purchase of these patents, the act of July 6, 1916, known as proposal Z, which was made by John Hays Hammond, jr., and that the patents themselves will repose in the Patent Office under a special provision whereby no one can get them and no one can see them, ought to be sufficient warrant to the Government that it will get the patents if the board finally conclude that they are a desirable thing to acquire.

Mr. DENISON. I think that is true, if they have such a contract.

Mr. GOOD. They have. [Applause.]

I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] four minutes.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I have here in my hand an account of the work done by the rifle makers at Eddystone. Samuel M. Vauclain, who is the first vice president and general manager of the Baldwin Locomotive Works, was the farseeing man under whose direction this plant was built. I recall that the Baldwin Locomotive Works at one time made two locomotives a day. Now they make 10 each day of the heaviest sort of locomotives. Mr. Vauclain put through the plant at Eddystone in eight months. At the beginning there was a swampy piece of ground. At the end of that time there was a plant with 33 acres of floor space, 15,000 men employed, and 10,000 machines at work. They made 1,000,000 rifles for the allies abroad and 60 per cent of the rifles for the Americans. These men stayed at home to help in the work of preparation. Mr. Vauclain chose for his assistants Mr. Charles H. Schlacks and Maj. Garrett. He planned this great plant, organized it, made it do its work, and now its work is done.

I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a newspaper account of the work done by the rifle makers at Eddystone.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MARTIN). Is there objection to the gentleman inserting in the RECORD the article which he refers to?

There was no objection.

The article is as follows:

EDDYSTONE SOON TO CEASE LABOR—BIGGEST RIFLE WORKS IN WORLD WILL CLOSE JANUARY 11—JOB DONE, AND WELL.

The rifle makers at Eddystone stop work January 11, but their spirit and their achievement will go marching down through history.

These workers, men and women, own a full share in the glory of the war with the boys who gave their lives at Chateau Thierry and Belleau Wood.

For Eddystone made the rifles that drove the Kaiser out of France.

Washington has ordered a discontinuance of the manufacture of arms. The need has passed for rifle making by the million. Eddystone has done its job, just as our fighting forces in France have done theirs.

The workers at Eddystone wear on their breasts, whether they be mechanics or executives, a bronze medal of honor. It was given them by the Government when they had completed the millionth rifle for the American Army.

That medal tells the story of the Midvale Steel & Ordnance Co.

The great rifle plant met the stirring emergency of war as gallantly and as victoriously as the Army which it equipped with weapons.

BIGGEST IN THE WORLD.

The Midvale Steel & Ordnance Co. is the biggest rifle works in the world. It made 60 per cent of all the rifles manufactured for the United States Army.

A large majority of the rifles that spat lead and death at the boche in the last decisive battles of the war were made at Eddystone. Many a straight-shooting American rifleman, coolly pausing as he advanced through gusts of shrapnel and machine-gun bullets to take aimed shots at the enemy, defended his life with an Eddystone rifle.

It would be almost literally true to say that every rifle used in battle was an Eddystone product. If we except a few hundred thousand Springfields, the only rifles which got abroad to the boys in the fight were made at Eddystone.

So, perhaps, it isn't too much to say that the 15,000 men and women who toiled in the great Eddystone factory, with its 10,000 machines and its 33 acres of floor space, possess a proud share in the honors of victory.

They are still making rifles at Eddystone. But within a year there will be no sign of the present rifle plant. The vast building will be there, but the floors will have been gutted out and huge overhead cranes will swing their chain cables from under the roof. The great rifle works will become a great boiler shop, part of the Baldwin plant.

To date the Midvale Steel & Ordnance Co. has made, in round numbers, 2,000,000 rifles for both the British and American Governments. It armed Britain before it armed America.

When working at top speed it has employed as many as 16,000 hands, 20 per cent of them being women.

Its pay roll has run about $375,000 a week.

Its 10,000 machines are worth $5,000,000 alone.

It has had on hand constantly reserve stocks of cutting tools made of the costliest steel, worth from $1,000,000 to $2,000,000.

Day after day it has turned out complete 5,500 rifles—some days 6,500.

Every part for every rifle, down to the smallest screws, has been made in the plant.

To make 5,000 rifles in a day entails a total of 15,000,000 single operations.

By September of 1917 its first American rifle was delivered to the Government.

Twelve months later it had completed 1,000,000 rifles.

These facts and figures give some notion of the vastness of the plant. Only a visit to the place itself and hours spent walking through its acres of swiftly whirling belts and speeding machines could convey an adequate idea of the plant's great size and ceaseless industry.

The beginnings of the great arms factory at Eddystone go back to the early days of the European war, when England's need created it and when few Americans were sufficiently farseeing to realize that ultimately this country would become involved.

VAUCLAIN'S PROPHECY.

One man at least who had to do with the erection of the Eddystone rifle plant read the handwriting on the wall. He was Samuel M. Vauclain, vice president of the Baldwin Locomotive Works. The Baldwin Co. built the plant. When the broad lines of its construction were being laid out Mr. Vauclain said, in effect, to his associates:

"Let us build it big. Let us make it the greatest of rifle plants, for sooner or later this country must be drawn into the war, and if we build adequately now we will be able to do our best for the Nation then."

So they built it as it stands. When America sprang to arms to help the world win back its freedom the Midvale Steel & Ordnance Co. was ready. The machines were there, needing but few changes to manufacture the American type of rifle. The executive personnel was there. A large nucleus of trained and expert men and women were ready to build the rifles that armed Americans in the great cause. The rifle plant was a great, swift-running, perfectly functioning organization.

Back in 1914, when the war caught all the world but Germany unprepared, Britain needed rifles. Her own plants could not turn them out nearly fast enough. She came for help to industrial America.

In May of 1915 the spot where the rifle plant now stands was a great tract of swampy land adjacent to the Baldwin works at Eddystone. On May 11 ground was broken for the rifle works.

Mid-August saw the first pieces of machinery stored in the building, then well on toward completion. By the end of the month the furnaces were going in.

The last day of 1915 at the Eddystone plant was historic. On that day they completed their first rifle for the British Government.

From the breaking of ground in a swamp it had taken less than eight months to build a modern factory with 33 acres of floor space; to purchase and set up rifle-making machinery, all of which had to be especially manufactured for the purpose; to get together a huge stock of the finest and scarcest steels; to fabricate millions of small parts, made with accuracy carried to the thousandth part of an inch and less; to assemble these in the completed product.

RIFLES FOR THE BRITISH.

It was an achievement even in this day and land of mechanical miracles.

In all, the Midvale Steel & Ordnance Co. made 600,000 rifles for the British Government. Most of them went to France. One hundred thousand, however, were shipped to far Mesopotamia, where sun-bitten English Tommies carried them in that terrible march to Bagdad.

The rifle made for England was the Enfield of 1914, chambered for the British type of rim cartridge of .303 caliber. A fine, hard-shooting, accurate weapon, the best rifle that had been devised prior to the war. And these rifles were turned out in such huge quantities at Eddystone that at the peak of production the Midvale Steel & Ordnance Co. was making more English rifles than all the arsenals and private plants of England combined.

Then came our entrance into the war. From the first month it was evident that we would need huge armies. They had to be raised, trained, equipped, transported abroad in record time. Making rifles for them was one of our biggest problems.

Shortly after war was declared the officials of the country's various rifle plants were called to Washington for a conference with Secretary Baker. He laid the Nation's needs before them. He asked them to estimate how long it would take to deliver rifles of the American type in the quantities needed. They said six months.

The Midvale Steel & Ordnance Co. agreed to furnish its first quota of American rifles by November 12, 1917.

It did so on September 17.

By September of 1918, a year after these first rifles were turned over to the United States, a total of 1,000,000 had been manufactured and delivered.

This was record production—faster than even the British rifles were made.

THE MILLIONTH RIFLE.

On the 23d of September the employees of the plant celebrated the making of the millionth rifle. It was a great occasion. The broad courtyard in front of the rifle factory held 14,000 people—workers and guests. Secretary Daniels was there, with representatives of the Secretary of War, of the Army, of the various departments of the Government. Brig. Gen. John T. Thompson, present director of arsenals at Washington, and one of the men who assisted in the organization and development of the Eddystone plant, cabled news of the millionth rifle to Gen. Pershing.

Mr. Vauclain, on behalf of the plant's employees, presented the millionth rifle to Charles H. Schlacks, general manager of the works and the man who is credited by officers and employees alike with having had the biggest share in perfecting and maintaining the great organization.

This millionth rifle was bought for him by the employees themselves. They subscribed a penny each to make the purchase—and had more than a hundred dollars over for the Red Cross.

To show the spirit of industry of the great plant, it might be mentioned here that the employees on that gala day, when they celebrated the making of the millionth rifle, kept right on the job until 3.30 o'clock in the afternoon. Until the moment the whistle sounded to cease work the machines and the men and women who ran them sped faster, if anything, than usual, so that there might be no production loss.

The spirit of the employees is one of the most interesting things about the big rifle works. They have earned good wages, but they have given full value. Never was there a day's shutdown; never was there an hour's labor disturbance. The workers were too busy, too patriotic, too certain of the fair intentions of their employers, to listen to agitators.

MILLIONS FOR LIBERTY BONDS.

It is significant, too, that the workers, men and women, bought more than $3,000,000 worth of the various liberty loan issues, besides investing large sums in war-savings stamps and contributing generously to the War Chest and Red Cross.

So much for the workers—now for their product.

The rifles made at Eddystone for the American Army are the last word in small arms. They combine the best qualities of both the British Enfield and the old American Springfield.

The British Army uses a cartridge of .303 caliber. The American Army for years has been using a .30-caliber cartridge. When our country went into the war American rifle plants, which had been making small arms for England, could have continued making the same type and caliber arm for the United States without the loss of a day.

That, however, would have made necessary two kinds of ammunition. Rather than risk the danger and inconvenience of this course, the War Department accepted the delay incidental to changing machines and manufacturing a new stock of parts.

The lessons American rifle makers had learned in manufacturing the British Enfield helped make the new American rifle the truest-shooting, hardest-hitting military rifle ever devised.

The rifles with which our new armies are equipped is known as the United States rifle, caliber .30, model 1917. It has a muzzle velocity of 2,750 feet, compared to the 2,200 feet muzzle velocity of the Enfield. The explosive pressure developed in the American rifle is 51,000 pounds, compared to the 40,000 pounds of the British arm. Our rifles are tested with a bursting charge equivalent to 70,000 pounds to the inch, as against the 52,000-pound-per-inch test charge of the Enfield.

The gun made at Eddystone and used by our troops in France will kill a man at 3 miles.

It shoots so accurately that a trained marksman can hit an individual with it at a full mile.

It is worth while quoting a letter written by an Army captain in France about the Eddystone rifle to one of the assistant general managers of the plant:

"We went through the St. Mihiel drive, and as I write the drive of November 1 is going merrily on—started 3.15 a. m. Some 3,600 pieces of artillery let go at that time. You can easily imagine the way the earth rocked as 'Wilson's answer' went home. Our big guns usually carry a placard, 'Wilson's answer,' and after the barrage has been placed and our boys go over, then the Springfield-Enfield, or model 1917, rifles come into their own.

THE RIFLE FOR BAYONET WORK.

"I have handled many rifles, old and new—Springfields, Krags, Mausers, and a few others—but when it comes to service the sturdy-built Eddystone rifle certainly delivers the goods. The stock is so strong that it makes an ideal rifle for bayonet work. I have in St. Mihiel seen many evidences of the bayonet on the business end of an Enfield make perfectly good Huns out of bad ones—they were, of course, dead ones. The German rifle is but a toy compared to ours."

The man who wrote that letter knows the Eddystone rifle. He has staked his life on it.

The letter links the shops with the battle field. The same spirit of service that made our soldiers indomitable in the field has animated the men and women at lathe and drill. They, too, are heroes.

Go into the shops and you will see this spirit.

It is impossible to describe the actual making of rifles at Eddystone. It is an extremely complex undertaking—as you may realize if you reflect a moment upon the statement made early in this article that there are 15,000,000 single operations entailed in a day's output of 5,000 rifles.

To do so vast a job in a day with even the 15,000 employees who were at work with production at its height naturally means perfect system. Every man does just his own job. He has studied every movement of hands and body so as to get the most work out of the fewest motions. He may operate one or several machines. If several, he times their operations so that he can adjust one idle tool while the others are working.

Every floor of the great plant is close packed with machinery, ranged in broad trucks that clang about all day, with aisles so that electric "jitneys," the loads of raw material, or parts in various stages of completion can run freely back and forth.

As far as eye can reach down the long vistas of machinery stretch forests of belting—there are 75 miles of whirling belts in the "receiver department" alone.

The making of this receiver—in layman's language the part of the rifle that holds the loading and firing mechanism—is one of the most painstaking and important tasks in rifle manufacture. It goes through 144 operations. At the start it is a forging of the finest steel weighing 8 pounds. Complete, it weighs about 8 ounces.

LEARNED AS THEY WORKED.

When the Eddystone plant was built, few men understood rifle making. Few plants made the machine tools for it. Eddystone studied the problem as it unfolded, first adopting and then perfecting processes already in use.

Automatic tools are used in most operations. They are marvelously accurate. In this connection it might be mentioned that the Midvale Steel & Ordnance Co. has the finest machine-tool shop in America, devoted entirely to the manufacture of its own cutting tools.

One of the most engrossing operations to watch is the boring of rifle barrels. The barrel is whirled against a hollow, stationary drill at the speed of 1,800 revolutions a minute. Oil forced through the drill under pressure brings back the minute steel chips. A barrel is drilled at the rate of about an inch a minute. A somewhat similar machine reams out the first fine hole cut by the drill. Still another puts in the delicate grooves which we know as "rifling."

Before the rifle is assembled the barrel and action are tested by firing through them a special bursting charge developing a pressure of 70,000 pounds to the square inch. The test shot is fired into sand. A number of rifles are fired at once, racked in a frame, and discharged automatically. The testing is done in a series of little armored rooms, bullet and splinty proof, and the operator fires only after he has taken position behind a thick steel shield, to guard against the danger of a defective barrel.

The assembled rifle is fired again for accuracy by Government experts. Every process of its manufacture, of course, is under Government supervision. There are more than a thousand Government employees at Eddystone who do nothing but inspect. The plant's own inspectors likewise follow the rifle through all its processes, from raw material to finished product.

This firing for accuracy is one of the things that catches the interest of the outsider visiting the plant, if he be lucky enough to win through the door that is guarded against even plant employees, into the long, narrow "shooting gallery." Here experts "lay" the rifle with the aid of a telescopic sight. Fifty-six rifle tests are going at once. They are fired at small paper targets set up 100 feet from the muzzle. Four out of five shots must hit inside a rectangle measuring one by one and a half inches.

EYE-STRAIGHTENING BARRELS.

Another fascinating operation is the final straightening of rifle barrels. This is done by eye, which proves more accurate than any machine yet devised.

The experts who do this work use a big and curious vise, with a jaw actuated by a heavy wheel. The contrivance looks like an old-fashioned letter press set on a pedestal about as high as a man's head. The straightener puts the barrel in his vise and sights through the bore at a straight black line on the background of a glazed glass window. He doesn't see the line through the barrel, but he does see two parallel shadows cast down the barrel half its length. If the shadows are exactly parallel, the barrel is straight. If they waver, the barrel is crooked, and pressure of the vise is applied at the right place to straighten it.

It takes a highly educated eye to see the slight wavering of these lines. Not every eye is capable of this kind of education. Barrel straighteners are "born," the experts say, more truly even than are poets. When Eddystone got into the business of rifle making there were only three or four real barrel straighteners obtainable in the country. Eddystone hired as much of the available supply as was possible, then began to train a big corps of experts of its own.

It is related that about the best man developed at Eddystone had never looked through a rifle barrel in his life before some one accidentally discovered the power he did not know he owned. He had been employed for months in the plant as an iceman, delivering ice in a zinc-lined truck.

While you watch, a gunstock is made. Saws, drills, turning lathes work with human accuracy. Each process takes but a few moments. When cut and turned the stocks are put in racks and dipped in linseed oil, which soaks into every pore.

Stock assembly is comparatively simple—if you are an expert—because of the absolute interchangeability of parts. Before Eddystone studied and perfected this assembly job a good workman would put together 50 rifles in a day and feel proud of his work. Now many of the men assemble 200 rifles a day. One man, who holds the plant record, has assembled 285 rifles in 10 hours.

READY FOR THE FRONT.

When the last job is done and the rifle stands complete it is given a protecting bath of vaseline before being packed for shipment. In a rack with many others it is swung over a vat of hot vaseline and dipped in. The liquid vaseline clings to barrel, stock, and working parts. When it hardens it makes a thick incrustation, impervious to water or dampness.

Then the rifles are ready for packing, 10 to the crate. They go out in freight cars or motor trucks, which are run right into the delivery room for loading. And then overseas.

This is but a glimpse of the work at Eddystone, a few of the things that stand out so vividly that the least technical visitor can not help seeing them. It would be a hopeless task to attempt to picture the real sights and sounds of the place.

Eddystone is still hard at work, despite the Government order that will put out the forge fires and still the roar of the hammer shop next month. Between 3,000 and 5,000 employees are at work there now.

Eddystone has completed its task. It has faced and won its big fight. It will simply be "demobilized," like the gallant Army it equipped.

The thousands who work there will carry with them, when they leave the plant next January, the same deep, quiet pride that is the soldier's best memento of the war. They have done their work.

Mr. GOOD. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I wish the attention of the House for a few minutes while I refer to some matters that I think are of extraordinary importance to every citizen of the United States, and of especial importance to every industry in the United States and to every one dependent upon those industries.

It may not be generally known, but it is true, that it is almost impossible for any person, firm, or corporation to export any article from the United States to Holland, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland, or any of the neutral countries. It occurs to me that it is time the people of the United States are apprised of the reasons why this extraordinary condition exists. Before a person can export any article out of this country to any neutral country he must first get a permit from the country to which it is expected to export the goods in order to obtain a license from this country to export them. Whenever an attempt is made by any exporter in the United States to send any of his manufactured goods abroad, before he can get a permit from the War Trade Board in the city of Washington he must show to the War Trade Board that the consignee has a permit to receive those goods over on the other side. For this reason the United States is not exporting goods of any consequence to-day. The result is that idleness in this country is constantly increasing while the volume of business is diminishing, until to-day many of the railroads of this country are doing 40 per cent less business than they were doing at the time the armistice was signed.

Now, what brought about all this? When the war was on there was organized what is known as the Netherlands Overseas Trust. Its purpose was to prevent goods shipped from the United States into any of these countries that I have named from sifting into the enemy countries. When this trust was organized it was dominated and controlled by British influences and British officers.

It is likewise controlling to-day, and they are exercising the same domination and enforcing the same boycott with reference to goods manufactured in the United States that they were exercising at the time the war was on. So that before the person now can get any goods into Holland or any of these countries, the person who is to receive the goods in that country must get a license to receive them before the War Trade Board will give a license to ship them.

What is the result? A cable is sent over for the purpose of getting the license required over there. No return is had inside of 25 or 30 days. In the meantime the man who wants the goods is compelled to go to some place else to purchase. The gentlemen who are censors on the other side find out whether it is possible for these wants to be supplied with manufactured goods furnished by somebody in the English Empire, and they are bold to say, and I have the concrete evidence here and will furnish it to anyone who wishes to know the fact, or to any investigating committee, that they have in the United States customhouses and in the United States men, British officers, who will say to the American shipper or the man who wants to ship, "We do not propose that you shall ship anything out of the United States that we can manufacture and ship from Great Britain."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Is it part of the same scheme that the censorship has been retained on the mails of the country?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; and I want to give you an illustration of these facts. There are British export houses in the United States that can send a cablegram from here to Singapore with reference to the shipment of their goods and get a return in two or three days. On the other hand, an American exporter, exporting the same character of goods, can send a cablegram to Singapore and he can not be answered in 30 days. These are facts capable of proof, and it is time that the American Congress should be advised as to why this is so.

Now, I want to call attention to a few concrete examples. There was an American concern organized and established to export from the United States to Samarang, in the Dutch East Indies, organized by American capital, seeking to take advantage of the situation for the purpose of extending American trade. They opened up their house in Samarang, and the very first attempt they made to export any goods from this country to that distributing house they were notified by the War Trade Board that the shipments could not be made. When asked why, they said because objection had come from the Netherlands Overseas Trust. When asked why, there was an intimation that the parties conducting this concern were disloyal. But they were Americans with American capital, and when asked to be furnished with the proof of their disloyalty, protesting that they were as loyal as anybody in the United States, they were advised that they could not have the information upon which the action of our department was based. The result was that hundreds of thousands of dollars put into this investment in that legitimate business was absolutely wasted.

Here is another concrete example to which I wish to call the attention of the committee: There was a concern in this country seeking to ship 3,000 cases of tea. They sought to get a permission for the house on the other side that wanted to get tea but they could not get it, and in consequence could not get the license on this side. When the reason was asked why this permit would not be granted on the other side they were informed by this Netherlands Overseas Trust that they proposed that it should be supplied immediately from Java and not shipped from any other country. Tea was selling here for 53 cents a pound. It was selling in Holland for $3 or $3.50, depending on the quality. After refusing to grant a permit to the American exporter, within two days after the refusal an agent of Sir Thomas Lipton came into this house and made a proposition to purchase this tea. When informed of the attempt to ship it across to the other side and the reason given why they could not ship it, the agent said, "We will take care of that." The result was that this house sold the tea to Lipton's agent and it was shipped from here to England and from there into Holland, at the price of $3 to $3.50.

That is going on constantly in this country, and I dare say that every Member of this House that has manufacturing industries in his district is receiving almost daily complaints from men who are seeking to ship out their goods in order that they may keep their factories going and in order that they may give employment to their men, and are met with these same results.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. I understood the gentleman to say a while ago that the British are maintaining officers at our ports to see that no goods were shipped out or only such goods as they would permit to be shipped out. Does the gentleman mean to be shipped to Great Britain or does he mean to any point in the world?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. To any point in the world where the British can supply the goods.

Mr. KEARNS. What rights have British officers at our ports to tell any American shipper where he can ship his goods, provided he does not want to ship them to England?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. British officers are telling the American manufacturers that they can not ship their goods or they will see to it that they will not be permitted to ship them as long as manufacturing concerns in Great Britain can supply the demand. There is a man now located, or there was in the month of January, and I dare say he is there now, in the customhouse in the city of New York, who has the unadulterated gall to send out and bring in exporters whom he knows are seeking to export goods out of this country into Sweden, into Switzerland, and into the Netherlands, and to tell them "You must cease your efforts, for we will not permit you to ship anything," and when asked why they are not permitted to do this thing, he simply smiles and says, "Because we are controlling the shipping of this country to-day and expect to continue to do it as long as the present embargo exists."

I think it would be very interesting to call your attention to what this gentleman has said. This is what the exporter says, addressing the British agent:

> I can tell you this, that since a couple of weeks ago I have been making complaints to the proper authorities in Washington about this obstructing of American business by the censor of cables in London, and from now on I certainly will make more complaints on every specific case that might come to my attention where we can prove that cables or letters are held up for a certain length of time; and then really the climax of our conversation came. Both the captain and his assistant smiled, and they asked me, "Mr. Stork, so you really think they act on these complaints in Washington?" I think this is about the limit, unless they could have gone a little further and said, "Do you really think they dare to act upon these complaints?" The whole interview really came down to this: They told me to my face that I would not have a ghost of a chance to promote American business so long as the Britishers could prevent it. At the end of this conversation I asked Capt. Makins, who is this British officer, "Captain, now that we have been talking so frankly to each other, how long do you figure you Britishers can play this game?" He said, "Oh, anyhow for several months, because we are running the actual blockade and we won't take it off."

That is the situation, if you please.

Mr. SLAYDEN. What did he mean by "running the actual blockade"?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. They meant that they were in control. They have established this blockade by reason of these two facts. In the first place, the exporter from this side must get a permit before he can ship any goods out of this country abroad, and before he can get a permit from his own country to ship it this Netherlands Overseas Trust sees to it that the gentleman on the other side does not get his permit, and, in consequence, the exporter on this side can not get his license here, and it is just as complete a blockade as could possibly be made. That thing is going on, and has been going on, continuously, and just think of the idea of this country, which has done so much for the allies, being absolutely prohibited from any commercial intercourse with the allies, absolutely prohibited, if you please, from any intercourse with the neutral countries, and the whole business being done by a gentleman not of our country, yet, if you please, with the very sanction, if not with the encouragement, of our country, when they are permitting such men as Makins in the customhouse in the city of New York to take the high-handed action he has taken in the cases named.

Mr. SLAYDEN. What do our people here say in explanation of such an extraordinary state of affairs?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. They say this, that under the arrangement they have with the allies, and under the arrangement they have with Great Britain, with reference to passing censorship upon all goods shipped into Denmark, Holland, Switzerland, and these other countries, as long as that arrangement stands they are bound upon this side. It was once said that Nero sat on a hill and fiddled with delight while he was watching a city of more or less respectability burn. While the business industries of this country are going to pot as rapidly as they can, those who are in absolute control, at the heads of these departments, are attending to everybody's business but our own.

That is the reason why this thing has been continued thus far unchecked and uncriticized. If you go to one of these departments to-day—go to the War Trade Board, if you please—and ask them why this is thus and so, and they will admit that all the criticism you make is absolutely true and obtains, but that they are powerless to change any order until their chief comes back. He is away on the other side. You go to the Shipping Board and you meet with the same response there. The heads of all of these departments are away from their place of business, and where they ought to be attending to the interests of the people of the United States and are gallivanting around on the other side. That is one reason.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will.

Mr. DENISON. This arrangement was evidently entered into during the war, and when there might have been some possible excuse for it, but it was never intended to continue it with the consent of our Government during peace times when we ought to be restoring our industries?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Absolutely; and here is the proposition: The other countries, our allies, are taking advantage of this situation—taking and tying up the threads of commercial intercourse broken by reason of the war and reestablishing their trade while we are absolutely prohibited from entering into that competition at all. If it continues for many months, and Mr. Makin says it will continue for many months, these new trade relations will have been established and it will be hard, indeed, for a manufacturer and exporter of the United States to break in. I am not blaming England for taking the advantage that she naturally would take as a competitor in business, but I am blaming the administration of the United States that is not only permitting but encouraging, by inaction at least, this very kind of treatment of our exporters. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to submit a few remarks about cotton. I am in favor of lifting the embargo against the raw materials of America on everything, including cotton. I think the time has come when we must look out for the products of our farms, our factories, and of our mines. I am not in favor of permitting any foreign countries now to buy up the raw material of America in congested markets with the price beat down, because of any embargo condition that now exists, and then move that produce to the foreign country and sell it at a greatly increased price to the consumers of that country. To-day the cotton producers of America are being wonderfully handicapped by conditions that exist in the embargo, and the time has come when that embargo should be lifted. I stand ready to support a measure that will lift it. I will support a measure that will lift the embargo against the other products of America. Now, gentlemen, the wheat crop of America, estimated to be worth about $1,600,000,000—when the war ended the price of wheat fell, because a big crop was coming in, it was said. Now, the Government comes in and it takes up the loss that the wheat grower would sustain, and it is going to protect him. The cotton producers of the United States, with a crop estimated to be worth a billion and a half dollars, are suffering a loss now, and what are we doing to protect the cotton producer and prevent his loss? He does not ask the Government at this stage to come to his rescue with money. All that the producer asks is that this Government will give him a fair chance with his product. He asks that the embargo in every form be lifted on the cotton going to the consuming world. If you will permit that the foreign spinners will pay the producers of the United States inside of 30 days from 30 to 35 cents a pound for this cotton. If you do not permit that then the foreign spinners will be aided in their scheme to rob the American cotton producers.

The purpose is to beat down the price of cotton so that the cotton merchants of Europe can buy it cheaply, and then they will sell it to some of the spinners of the Old World at from 40 to 50 cents a pound. I am not in favor of sitting here and permitting the American producer to be robbed in this fashion. We asked the Rules Committee of this House, and I appeal to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] a member of that committee as well as to the Members on this side to report out the Caraway resolution that will permit an investigation of the New York and New Orleans Cotton Exchanges to see how much cotton they have on hand, the character of that cotton, and see how many contracts with legitimate speculators are actually filled and how much of that is a gambling transaction.

Gentlemen, great reforms come about in times of stress and strain, and it may be the time has come to prevent gambling in cotton and grain. Let us investigate these exchanges. I hold that the New York Cotton Exchange is buying cheap cotton—low-grade cotton—and tendering it on these contracts of the middling grade. For instance, if you buy a contract on the middling basis, and they tender you a cotton they call middling and it is not, and the middling price is 30 cents a pound, they will tender you stuff that they buy for 19 cents a pound; and when you ask for a difference in the grades and settlements they will tell you it is a dollar and a quarter, and you will insist that it is $8.50; but you have no remedy.

I charge that these exchanges as now conducted are no longer places for safe and honest hedging. Ask the spinners of New England; ask the spinners of the South if they are. Ask the producer if they aid him. If they do not, why should the Congress of the United States permit them to longer exist? To-day Germany wants to buy 2,000,000 bales of American cotton. We can not ship it there yet. She is willing to buy it and store it in the United States until the allied powers say it can go. She wants to know that she will have it, and I think that she is entitled to it. I think that the cotton producers of the United States are entitled to let them buy this cotton and store it here. We are permitting grain and meat to go to Germany; why not cotton? Take the embargo off and let cotton go unrestrictedly to all the allied countries, and let Germany and Austria buy cotton in the United States and store it until our Government and the other governments say she can have it. Gentlemen, that looks fair to me.

Yesterday a gentleman informed me that a friendly little country in Europe wants to buy 50,000 bales of cotton now and asked my advice where to go in order to get it—to the exchanges or where. I told him not to go to the exchanges, but to go to Memphis, Tenn., or Galveston, Tex.; to go to the spot market, buy the cotton, and have it shipped direct. I advised him not to go to these exchanges.

Gentlemen, we ask the Rules Committee of this Congress to report out this resolution of Judge CARAWAY, and let us investigate these exchanges and find out the exact truth of the situation. Why, they have got a bogus concern up there like the fellow who once sold whisky in New York. He had a café running in connection with his whisky establishment, and the law was that you could not sell whisky on Sunday except when you served food with it. So he got to serving sandwiches with a drink of whisky, and a man would go in and buy whisky. He did not want anything to eat, but they had to put something to eat on the table. So the officer would look around and glance in through the window and see if there was food on the table, and if he saw a sandwich or a piece of brown bread with a piece of ham between the slices he would pass on. And what do you suppose they did? This bartender said there was no use to go to all that expense; that the people did not eat that bread; and he hired an artist to paint him some sandwiches made out of wood. The artist painted a red streak in the middle and brown on the outside, and the policeman would look in and see something that looked like bread and would say that they were complying with the law. But when they did that they no longer called on the baker or the butcher. They were not helping that business. It was a liquor transaction purely and wholly.

I hold to-day that these exchange transactions are gambling transactions. A sample of cotton is laid upon the table, a bet is made, and no cotton is delivered in the deal, no contract is fulfilled by the delivery of actual cotton. I make the charge here and now that out of the 11,000,000 bales of cotton the New York Cotton Exchange has not supplied spinners within 12 months with 75,000 bales delivered at the mills.

Now, gentlemen, what particular purpose does that interest serve? Is it a gambling concern or is it a legitimate speculation? I think that it is a gambling concern. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for seven minutes.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I am going to ask Members to study with me for a little while this proposed constitution of the world. I do not do this as an advocate, neither as one condemning the idea of a league of nations, but rather as an expositor, to study this proposed constitution of a league of nations as to the possibilities within it.

I think that all the world, and especially our country, would be glad to find a way to prevent war in the future; and, as the league of nations is a plan that has frequently been identified with our hopes, if we could find such a league to accomplish such a great desire without submitting to greater dangers probably than war, we ought certainly to do it.

I hold in my hand the proposed constitution of 26 articles of the league of nations. I have made a very careful study of it, as careful as the average student would study a draft of this sort. I think there are some features in it that are fraught with grave danger. Under this proposal the United States is to become an integral part of a league whose legislative body of delegates is undetermined in number and voting power. The covenant embraces no limitation of subject matter save as found in the first article. It designates the number to constitute the league by those which become signatory powers. Article 2 provides each member has but one vote. Article 7 provides the method of joining the league and extends the privilege to self-governing countries including dominions and colonies. This will give the United Kingdom at least five to seven times the voting power in the body of delegates that is permitted to the United States.

The executive council which is to be the real agency of the league to enforce its finding is to be limited to nine members, one each from the United States, Britain, France, Italy, and Japan, and one each from four other States to be selected by the body of delegates. The decisions of each body, delegates or executive council, are by a majority vote; so that in all cases the findings of the council will be determined by five members. In other words any five of the nine voting together can bind the United States without its consent to any matter falling within the province of the league.

To be specific: Article 19 authorizes the league to vest mandatory authority and select the nation to exercise it over such countries recently under other sovereignties, and which are not yet regarded sufficiently stable to maintain stable self-government. This article permits by a vote of the league the necessity of the United States to undertake the maintenance of law and order in Armenia, for example, or a country in Africa. No matter what may be the wish of our own people to avoid mixing in the tangle of European or Asiatic politics any five of the nine can fix such responsibility upon us.

Any group of five of the nine can fix the character of our defensive program, as the question of the size of armament large or small of any member of the league is up to this vote by article 8.

While the preamble or covenant article pretends to limit the subject of consideration to war, it must extend without limit, as it embraces what may be considered as causes of war, to be determined by a vote of the league. This transfers the nation's sovereignty on these matters completely to a group of European nations by a mere vote to the effect that the subject in question may lead to war.

Articles 23, 24, and 25 abrogate all existing treaties between the signatory countries which by decision of the league are inconsistent with the provision of the league, and forbids any further treaty except under specific direction or in connection with the countries making up the league. This means if a treaty now exists between us and Japan inconsistent with the judgment of the league as expressed by any five of the nine, it must be abrogated. The question of European immigration will also fall under this authority, and our laws of limitation inconsistent with what a majority of this league shall find must be abrogated.

The Japanese delegation presented an amendment providing that radical discrimination should not be tolerated in immigration laws, but it was dropped for the present when other delegates urged that this would open such a large question that great delay might ensue. This interest of Japan in a sensitive question between us for many years indicates a future claim of this country. It will certainly be brought up later by Japan as a matter of interest of the league to be determined by a vote of the league in which we have but one vote.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. FESS. I regret I can not yield.

No further legislation on European or Asiatic immigration shall be enacted without the consent of the league, as it covers not only treaty making, but such laws as are based upon treaties. Can we be sure that questions of an American merchant marine will not fall under a vote of European countries, which quite naturally will prefer to keep the monopoly of this particular activity? Who will be the judge? Evidently the league will have something to say about it. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] called our attention awhile ago to the restrictive regulations by Great Britain touching the commerce leaving our shores. It appears by this practice already our merchant marine is somewhat under the control of overseas powers. This covenant increases this power.

Article 21 proposes to give to the league certain powers over the commerce of the nations making up the league. This article, read in the light of article 20, which looks to a permanent international labor bureau, will show the subtle plan of placing the matter of our own commercial standing in legislation looking to maintain American standards under a group of European countries. The moment this authority is granted we will hear Democratic free-trade politicians demand all protective legislation repealed upon the basis that to favor an American standard not reached by Europe is not within the authority of this Nation, because by this covenant we have surrendered any such authority we may have had to the findings of the league of nations, of which we are a responsible party.

The most dangerous feature of this proposed constitution of the world is the provision which makes this independent, self-developing Republic a constituent part of a league which exercises supreme authority, through a body of delegates without name or number, each of which will have equal authority in all matters which come before it with this Republic. The matters of consideration are not defined, and therefore not limited. If the Mouroe doctrine is included in the judgment of a majority of the members, what recourse have we after we have entered the league, which speaks by a majority vote? If immigration is included according to a majority of the league, what is our defense? If a tariff is included according to the judgment of the majority, what have we left to surrender or commit a breach of covenant? This Nation should never, under any circumstance, surrender its sovereignty on any questions which pertain to its future welfare to a vote of a league made up of an indeterminate number of countries whose major interests can not be expected to be identical with our own.

Article 26 purports to provide for amendment of the league. Of course, no amendment in the interests of the United States will likely ever be made, as it requires the vote of all the nine States which are represented in the council, and then the ratification of three-fourths of the States represented in the body of delegates, which must be indeterminate. If it should be claimed by the proponents of this preposterous proposition that questions I have named are not included in the league, no man of sense will deny that under article 26 amendments can be made by interested nations to include these questions.

I look upon this proposition as couched in the proposed constitution of the world which is to supersede our own authority as a Nation as monstrous, and I predict that just as soon as the American people shall grasp the vicious possibilities herein included there will be such a revolution of sentiment aroused that any man who will subscribe to this perpetual surrender of this Republic's future to a vote of foreign nations will be, as he should be, repudiated as an enemy to the spirit and genius of American institutions. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, before proceeding, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, after this war and our experience in it we ought to feel now, if never before, that Congress ought to provide for the common defense. If at the beginning of this war it had been known to the world that we had arms and munitions to arm our people; if we had had the enrollment which in old days was prescribed for the militia, and which ought to be continued now for the militia, so that we could have drafted our men without delay; if we had had educated officers to take charge of them in the field, I do not think we would have had to enter this war. No nation would have touched us or dared to do so. And my text to-day, when we have made partial preparation, and when the speeches that have been delivered on this bill tell us how defective that preparation is in some respects, and especially in artillery, what I appeal for is that we may have legislation for the common defense, which will provide that we shall not scrap what arms we have, or camps, or our enrollment, or training schools, or our factories, or our shipyards, or our merchant marine, which will carry our soldiers in case of need; that we shall not scrap the dies, jigs, and gauges which will enable us to manufacture, but so far as possible that we shall preserve our preparedness, not by a large standing army, not by conscription for long service and at great expense, but by the comparatively inexpensive plan of providing what is necessary for our boys when they are called into the field.

Legislation should also provide for an enlargement of the powers and jurisdiction of the great fortifications board, or the creation possibly of a new board which will always give pitiless publicity and annual reports of what we have and not attempt to keep it quiet, as we used to do in the past. The Nation should know whether it is really prepared.

After all previous wars we have scrapped our defense. The maintenance of preparedness and provision for the common defense during the peace that will come is a subject that should not fail to have our attention now before preparedness is gone.

The maintenance of preparedness was utterly neglected after the Civil War. At that time the soldiers went home tired of war. They would usually have little to do with the militia. Arms were sold for a song. The factories manufacturing war munitions were abandoned. Our Navy went to pieces. The fleet of monitors were our only steel vessels and were too slow. The decadence of our merchant marine had begun shortly before 1860, when we extended the "most favored nation" clause to England, and thereby abolished the differential tariff in favor of American vessels. Decline continued until our flag was almost never seen in foreign trade.

When the Spanish War broke out we had no modern field guns. We had some antiquated forts, about 300,000 Springfield rifles in only fair condition, no powder, shot, or shell, and a small Navy so ill supplied with ammunition that McKinley had to delay the war in order to obtain some sort of provision of transports and ammunition. When that war ended I was on the Committee on Military Affairs and obtained an increase in the appropriation for rifles enough to give 100,000 annually, so that five years ago we had a million rifles on hand, though that appropriation had then been reduced, because our wise men thought that a million was enough for a first line of defense of 700,000 men. Even after the European war began it was the plan of the administration to supply artillery and munitions for only 700,000 men in the course of some seven years. During that time I was urging what has turned out to be the fact, that modern warfare is a war of nations and not of any such first line, and that the nation which can first put its forces into the field, thoroughly supplied, will be the victor. We did nothing, however, until long after we declared war, nearly three years after hostilities had begun. We then were able, after seven months, to produce modified Enfield rifles which would carry our cartridges, and to employ factories which had been manufacturing for England. We did not have the dies, jigs, gauges, and patterns to make artillery, and it was only after seven months of hesitation we adopted the French 75-millimeter field gun, which is the best in the world. We were in November, 1918, just beginning to send our artillery and munitions, and have been and are now using French guns and ammunition for our Artillery abroad.

We had begun to send heavy bombing planes, and were expecting to send scout fighting planes when the war ceased.

We have established a most magnificant system of shipbuilding, which in about four years will be able to supply the losses in merchant ships caused by submarines.

We are ready now to provide what is needed for the life of the Nation. We hope to be at peace and not at war, but we learn from Holy Writ that it is only when the strong man armed keepeth his house that his goods are in peace. War comes now like the bolt from the blue or like the day of judgment. "Be ye also ready, for ye know not what day or what hour" it cometh.

It was the duty of Congress always, as it is our duty now and not hereafter, to enact such legislation as will provide for the common defense. This was one of the main objects of the Constitution.

Under the Constitution the militia meant the whole Nation between the ages of 18 and 45, and Congress was ordered by the Constitution to provide for arming, organizing, and disciplining the militia. It was also empowered to raise armies, and a proper standing Army is necessary for the instruction of the militia and as a model for them. Congress was also given power to organize a Navy and to regulate commerce, and there is no man that does not feel that this Navy must be large enough and that commerce, if necessary, must be encouraged so as to furnish seamen, ships, and shipyards to that Navy. We can not act too soon in seeing that we are kept ready by sea and land.

I am not a militarist. It would not be possible, practical, or sensible to take our whole people away for one, two, three, or four years of their lives from productive occupations and place them in a standing army, as is done by European countries. If our boys are given military drill in their schools, if there are arms in plenty and they are taught how to shoot, and if there are plenty of officers who understand their business, it takes a comparatively short time to make soldiers out of Americans, who are always ready to do their duty with an alacrity and courage that have been the wonder and admiration of foreign nations. The United States marines had not had much drill when they and other American troops captured Belleau Wood, after throwing back the German advance across the Marne and storming a height defended by machine guns, with nothing but their rifles in their hands.

They lost 6,200 men out of the 7,800 of the marine brigade, but they captured the hill and gave new courage to the French Army, which had almost come to believe that the German attack could not be withstood. Then when a flank attack was organized by that great genius, Gen. Foch, that attack at Soissons was composed of three divisions. Two of them were American, and the center division was composed of the foreign legion, the Moroccan brigade and the Senegalese brigade. To such want of men had the French Army come that these were selected for that attack, and they went through, and the German retreat began.

It was soldiers of very limited experience that have been doing tremendous work in the Forest of Argonne, and who worked their way forward day after day against the pick of the enemy's troops until they had the whole German Army in retreat and the allied armies were ready to demand a surrender. Many wish that that attack had been continued until the German Army was captured or crushed and that there had been no armistice, because we are not now sure that conditions of peace can be restored in central Europe except by military occupation and the protection as well as the establishment of local self-governments. It is not so sure, in the state of affairs now prevailing, that we may not have to go to Berlin yet in order to establish such governments, for if we expect indemnity we can not expect it to be paid by anarchy.

This is only by the bye. But there is no man who has seen the delay that has taken place in furnishing arms, even when we were aided by factories that had been selling to the belligerents for two years, that does not feel that we ought to provide and store enough war material to be able to respond to any call to arms within months instead of years. There is no one who has seen our difficulty in supplying officers that has not the same feeling as to the higher military education. There is no one who has seen our shortage of ships that does not feel that facilities for their production should be now maintained. All this is not a matter of large expense, but simply of retaining what we have.

Arms are the first essential when a nation is called to arms. War is the nation in arms, and to provide arms, educated officers, and a military training for the whole people is a constitutional duty. In order to "secure domestic tranquillity" it is necessary to "provide for the common defense." A rifle ready for every man, artillery in store, school discipline, with marches and target practice, an enrolled militia, and enough West Point or other thoroughly trained graduates in civil life—these will provide an adequate army at insignificant cost which will be ready for any call to arms.

Here the hammer fell and under leave to extend Mr. PARKER of New Jersey submits the following:

I am quoting somewhat from former speeches. The topic is old but it is ever new and never more so than at present.

Let us deal with arms first. It was the duty of the United States to provide for arming the militia; that is to say, for arming the whole Nation. We may have 5,000,000 rifles on hand now. They are only one-quarter of the number we ought to have if we have to call out our able-bodied population of 20,000,000. Even for 5,000,000 men, 20,000,000 rifles would not be more than sufficient, for in modern warfare a rifle lasts about six months. As for cannon, five fieldpieces are required for every 1,000 men, and we are just beginning to furnish fieldpieces, but we have the factories and should not scrap them. This bill should provide for fieldpieces.

As to shells, we are just beginning to furnish large quantities, but we have the dies and the patterns and the factories, which would be worth nothing if thrown into the junk heap. During this present war some large factories which were making English munitions asked whether they should be preserved or whether they should be scrapped, and our Government said they did not need them and let them be scrapped. Let us see that this not repeated.

Proper legislation will provide sufficient funds, not to manufacture enormous quantities of arms at great expense at the present time, but to pay a small sum for the maintenance of these factories and for the storage of this machinery and of these patterns and models, so that we can manufacture largely on short notice. A provident government will also appropriate from time to time to increase our stores of arms and munitions. This policy will include, of course, the factories that make guncotton and nitrates. We do not wish to continue enormous manufacture, because explosives spoil, but we do wish to have the imperishable nitrates in sufficient store to be used in case of need and we want to maintain factories which can turn them into munitions of war. This had been the German plan for generations. Every factory was paid some small amount, sometimes for a small contract, more often simply for keeping themselves ready to do what work might be demanded. Dye works were so organized that they could be instantly changed into manufactories of explosives. The steel works kept the dies and models by which their machines could be used on cannon instead of on the weapons of peace. We now have a sufficient number of boards and officers that understand all this. We need a policy that shall be fixed by legislation whereby we can maintain that condition so as to meet any future emergency.

Above all, we should not get rid of any war matériel. It was only last year that naval guns had to be repurchased which were not of the long range desired in the Navy. We paid perhaps one hundred times as much as we sold them for, so as to use them as howitzers and for land siege guns. These naval guns were our only artillery in Europe. Springfield rifles, which were sold at $1 apiece to Mexico, might better have been in our hands than in those of Mexicans who were shooting down our men. And the experience of modern warfare is such, especially in trench warfare, that even the long-range modern rifle is not always so much desired as a shorter range weapon carrying a heavier bullet of greater stopping power. If old rifles were good for nothing else, they would have been good for the drilling of the Nation in the manual of arms and in target practice. Pretty good shooting can be done with those old rifles, even if they do not carry 2,000 yards. To aim at 2,000 yards is almost an impossibility, and long-range guns are dangerous for practice on an ordinary range.

This whole subject needs investigation by a special committee of Congress or by a standing commission or by both. Our fortifications board has been most useful, though somewhat slow, but a board of that character, so organized as to contain a good proportion of younger men and perhaps a few Members of the House and Senate, might give valuable information.

The most important thing of all, however, is publicity. During the Spanish War ordnance officers told me, in a whisper, that we had only between 300,000 and 400,000 Springfield rifles. Every foreign Government knew the appropriations for rifles; knew how many could be made; could easily find out how many were sold; and the knowledge which was withheld from Congress was in their possession. Above all things, therefore, the amount and character of our military stores should be yearly reported in detail to Congress and to the people. It is certain, however, that we ought to have several times the number of rifles that we have now and many times the number of field guns. The average life of any particular pattern is about 20 years, and then a new pattern comes in that is better, although the old one is good. The Springfield muzzle-loading rifle came in shortly after the Civil War. It was changed to a breech-loader, and then in about 1900 the Krag rifle was adopted. The breechloader is a good rifle yet, although the department preferred to change to the Springfield modern rifle, which is as good as any. Some changes are occasionally made in sights, and so forth, but any rifle is good enough in the hands of a good marksman. We have suffered too much from faddists who would not give us any arms because they hoped to better them.

As to cannon, it was about 20 years ago that the French adopted the new seventy-five, which has contrivances to absorb recoil and to facilitate quick aiming and which is better than perhaps any other cannon. Any gun, however, will use ammunition faster than it can be supplied and will wear out with continuous use. What we need is arms for the Nation if we have to put the Nation in arms.

The Constitution also says that the United States shall provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, by which they meant the Nation, leaving to the States the appointment of the officers and the authority of training of the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress; to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions. At that time the musket or the Kentucky rifle was the only small arm known. Every gentleman wished to be an officer, and it was preferred that the appointments should be made by the States. It is not certain that State training is a bad plan. It has never been fairly tried. The United States never furnished arms, for one thing. Switzerland leaves all training to her various cantons. Germany left each Kingdom in charge of its own forces, only providing that they should meet for inspection and maneuvers once a year, at which time ineffectives were weeded out. It should not be forgotten that the German maneuvers were practically a competitive inspection. A German officer is not appointed by the Emperor. There are military schools at which men are educated, or men who have had a college course can take their turn with the various regiments as one-year volunteers, and if they prove themselves fit are certified as fit to be appointed officers. But this certificate from the imperial authority gives no appointment whatever. The appointment comes from the officers' mess of the regiment.

Those officers have the right to select their associates. They are proud of their regiment and of its traditions; and if on the annual inspection any one of their number receives a blue envelope stating that he has failed in his duty and has been ineffective as an officer, his comrades will see to it that he resigns, so that they may be sure to obtain the credit that is due them from year to year. If he does not resign, he is simply sent to Coventry and finds it unbearable, or perhaps has to fight a duel because of some remark made as to what he has done. Each regiment is recruited from a certain district; these districts are rivals.

If an empire finds it advisable to create such a system of rivalry, it is not at all certain that the same can not be done by a republic. It is done in Switzerland. There, after school training without arms, the man joins the army, not to go into the field but to be drilled a year or two, especially in marksmanship. He receives his rifle and his uniform and carries them home with him. He carries the rifle with him to his factory in the morning, if there is a drill in the afternoon, and I have seen 500 men come running down out of a factory, going into a room where they took their rifles and cartridge belts, falling in in the street, and starting off for an hour's march up and down the steep hills of the town. The man stands this drill and saves months of camp life. At the end of his time he goes into the reserves, but takes the rifle home with him as his own if he has done proper target practice and been certified. He keeps that rifle as his treasure, belonging to him. These men were all mobilized in this war.

Remember that all this need cost very little. In peace times a man's uniform can be provided for $20; his rifle for $15 more; tents, and so forth, for enough to bring it up to $50. I think I made an estimate of other articles, artillery, and so forth, which made the total cost $200 or $250 for his share of the whole matériel of the Army. Less than a twentieth of our able-bodied men become 18 each year. Only 5 per cent of those liable to service would be annually provided for; and considering that the cost of a soldier in the Regular Army is at least $1,000 a year, this method of securing a population ready to turn out on call, armed, is incomparably the cheapest of all. As America was, the Constitution provided for a nation in arms as follows:

> A well-regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free state, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed.

It is time that we got back to this principle of the arming of each man.

This brings us, however, to the question of how much drill and training there shall be, and whether men should be taken away from their ordinary occupations. We can not afford that now. We must supply the world with food; we must build ships to repair the losses; we must inaugurate foreign trade; we must pay the enormous debts caused by this war; and we must go to work to make the money that will enable us to do it. The wealth of the Nation lies in productive power. The nation that can produce in the greatest quantity will be the victor in any war, and this war has proved it. But there is no question that discipline and training can be had without infringing on our work.

We have common schools throughout the whole country, and it would be a simple thing to provide that every schoolboy of 14 shall be a member of the militia, and that the schools shall be furnished with arms and sufficient ammunition for target practice under proper instructors. Nearly a million men every year attain the age of 18. It would be a simple matter to provide that those boys should take a certain amount of drill if they have not taken it already in school, and should likewise be members of the active militia, say, for two years, and then be in the reserves of their companies, say, for five years more.

There are many schools and colleges that have long summer vacations. It would be simple to provide for summer camps during two months, with proper officers and drills for at least two years of their course. Pay is unnecessary. Only second-rate service is gotten for second-rate pay. The best and hardest work that is done by every student, the one in which he takes the most interest and which costs him the most money, is in the unpaid athletic games of baseball and football; and it is not impossible to have a like competition between every college and every high school, as to their efficiency in military affairs, their marks for efficiency being multiplied by the proportion of the students who are trained and participate in the contest. The same competition is possible in the militia with reference to localities. That is what is practically done in Switzerland. A contest for prizes appeals to every boy, and the greatest mistake that has taken place, not only in our militia but in our Regular Army, is that the system of competitive inspection adopted by Kitchener in India was not adopted here, except in the case of one brigade of Cavalry, wherein the inspections were made competitive by troops, and every troop received a mark, and the marks were read out at the head of the regiment at the end of the inspection.

The result in that brigade was that companies at lonely posts who had been slack in discipline and careless about their quarters were inspired with such emulation that the men were staying up at night to clean their arms and working over their quarters and horses for weeks before the inspection took place. Nothing is more simple; and after the approval and initiation of this scheme in the posts of the northwestern part of Hindustan as inaugurated by that great soldier, Kitchener, we can be sure that it is worth while. It is, I think, used in every army of any consequence in Europe, but chiefly in the citizen army of the Swiss. We have adopted it generally only as to rifle practice, and as to that my State has the pride of knowing that the New Jersey range at Sea Girt anticipated rifle contests in the Regular Army and led to its general adoption after Army teams had gone there. What will work for rifle practice will work for other branches of military service.

Trained officers, however, are of as much importance as arms. There can be no use of the arms and no discipline of the men without officers. After the Bladensburg raid and the burning of the Capitol in the War of 1812 we realized that the want of our militia was trained officers, and we increased West Point to 250 men. We had only 5,000 men then in our Army, and many more officers were graduated than could find places in the Regular Army. Our population then was about 8,000,000. It is now 13 times that; and a West Point of proportionate size would comprise over 3,000 cadets. We have no such number there now. The advantages of the enlarged West Point were shown in the War with Mexico in 1848. Almost all of the divisions were commanded by West Pointers, often from civil life.

It was shown again in the War of 1860, when we had four years in which to train men, but except in the case of a few natural-born solders our chief commanders were West Point graduates. They had not usually all stayed in the Army. Meade and Lee were of the Regular Army, but Grant, Sherman, Jackson, McClellan, and a host of others were former Army officers who had gone into civil life during the long period when our Army had been small. It may perhaps be said fairly that a military officer who has seen something of civil life and has been a success there may be the best man for general command, where the arranging of large business affairs is required, as well as ordinary military knowledge.

There is no doubt that our military schools should be enlarged, either at West Point or by the establishment of other rival schools. In this present war our principal need has been officers. We have had to commission a great many by guesswork. We have gotten rid of a good many of these, and ought to have gotten rid of a good many more. On the other hand, we have set our colleges to work, and college graduates with short, intensive training have proved valuable as officers in our National Army. They have done themselves credit in France. But we had to wait for them. We had to wait for men to train the first draft, and we were in an absolute quandary how to get proper officers for the second draft. Officers had not been provided and were being provided with great difficulty, and weeded out with still more difficulty. Men who had worked fairly well in the camps were often discharged just as the troops went abroad, because they were not thought fit for foreign work.

There are many ways in which our military schools could be enlarged. We could continue student training at the various colleges. It can not be forced upon them, but they are more than willing to attempt it if they are aided with arms and officers to train the students. The organization of our staff and of our training schools has been very largely improved, and it ought not to be lost. It might be perhaps possible to allow colleges to send selected students after a three-year course to attend the last year at West Point and to graduate with the class and in competition with them on the final examination, so that the best scholars who are now assigned to the Engineers or Artillery might be selected not only from the West Point graduates but from the other schools. Any sort of competition will give some life to our military system, which is so apt to fall into a condition of dry rot and decay.

It is not necessary to have large expense for buildings. There is nothing about West Point which is to be so despised as the constant requests for costly stone buildings. There is no reason why a regiment on the frontier, if supplied with the proper officers and books, could not teach every one of the soldiers the same studies in the same way as they are taught at West Point. It might almost be said that a standing army of 100,000 men, of which a quarter should be enlisted every year, could give a four-year course of this sort to 100,000 men. Probably 18,000 would graduate each year and go into the community as reserve officers, with education given them free and with the understanding that in those regiments no one should stay after the four years unless he becomes an officer.

This may seem visionary, but nothing is visionary after the experiences of this war, in which our colleges and schools and our officers' training schools have graduated officers by precisely this process, although in the officers' schools they have not enforced the rigorous hardships of discipline which prevail in a regular army and originally prevailed at West Point. Such an army would not need penalties against desertion. The man who did not keep up or did not obey orders would be discharged and another man would take his place, to obtain the benefit of this thorough education in sciences and languages. And it costs no more to give that sort of education than it does to keep the man as an ordinary soldier, except that there must be a few more officers as instructors.

But we must have officers, and the various systems of training officers that have been established should be the last thing to be abandoned. The graduates in peace times are not needed in the standing army, but they are a reserve for an army, ready to go to train their fellow countrymen whenever they are needed. They would become teachers in our public schools and colleges, and be able to train the students without expense to the Government. They would become officers of our militia, and it is fair to the militia to say that if they had good officers they would have been always a very much better force than they have been. The men have always been willing, but the officers have often been ignorant.

All this is a matter which must be dealt with by the administration under legislation that should give authority to appropriate for these various purposes, while appropriations should be made from time to time, governed by the good sense of Congress, after reports of the administration and of any commission that might be appointed, to govern and perpetuate the system.

Enrollment is the basis of any national system. It was hard to make our enrollment, but it will be easy to keep it up. It is important that the lists be not thrown away, that copies be kept in the localities, and that every man who becomes 18 shall be added to the list. This was the law of the United States from May 8, 1792, when the first militia act was passed, until the passage of the Dick bill some 20 years ago. The first section of that act provided:

> Each and every free, able-bodied white male citizen of the respective States, resident therein, who is or shall be of the age of 18 years and under the age of 45 years, except as hereinafter excepted, shall severally and respectively be enrolled in the militia by the captain or commanding officer of the company within whose boundaries such citizen shall reside.

By section 6 the adjutant general of the State was—

> To receive from the several officers of the different corps throughout the State returns of the militia under their command, reporting the actual situation of their arms, accouterments, and ammunition, their delinquencies, and every other thing which relates to the general advancement of good order and discipline. * * * From which returns he shall make proper abstracts, and lay the same annually before the commander in chief of the State.

And by the act of March 2, 1803, he was to make returns of the militia of the State, and so forth, as above, to the President of the United States annually or before the first Monday in January in each year.

Muster day was really observed in the United States for more than half a century. We must return to the wisdom of our fathers in maintaining a complete system of enrollment. It will not be hard to maintain such a system. If the States desire to avoid expense it would be perfectly simple for them to provide by law that no one should vote until he had performed his two years' service in the militia and had an honorable service. This would simplify the difficulties and expense with reference to registry for elections and really save money.

Camps, camp grounds, and barracks must not be scrapped, but maintained and preserved. During the Spanish War our principal difficulty was to find camp grounds near the principal cities and centers of population where the men could be assembled and drilled. We have had the same trouble to a much larger extent in the present war. In the early days there were many forts established in central locations on healthy ground where troops could have been assembled, as, for example, Baton Rouge, Perth Amboy, Omaha, and many other places, and the lack of those grounds was greatly felt in this war. These grounds in time of peace afford the whole neighborhood large public parks for recreation when they are not used for military purposes. We have a number of national parks at the present day—Chickamauga is the most notable—where troops were assembled during the war, and if the costly system of separate park commissions were abandoned and all these parks were placed under the management of the Secretary of War the cost of maintenance would be small.

The cantonments which have been built will be useful for the exercises of the militia and will save expense. Some of the buildings will be valuable as armories for the large quantity of war matériel which a prudent nation ought to keep on hand, and the keepers of those armories could watch over the other buildings in the camp without extra cost. But we should especially avoid the waste of Government property which has taken place under the existing statutes, whereby the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy are eager to get a little money in by selling arms which they deem to be obsolete, scrapping vessels and machinery, and transferring military camps which are not in use to the Secretary of the Interior to be sold for a song in order that speculators may make profits by dividing them up into lots.

Even the Post Office bill just passed orders the War Department to give up road-making tools.

If the jurisdiction of the Fortifications Commission should be enlarged so as to include all war matériel and proper publicity enforced as to what we have on hand, so that we could see whether our military resources were increasing or diminishing in proportion to our population, there would be less danger of the raids on our national military and naval resources which are made from time to time. This war has proved that there is not a single weapon that will use a percussion cap that has not come back into use. Boat howitzers and muzzle-loading cannon are revived in the trench and Stokes mortars. The saber, sword, and bayonet, that were deemed obsolete a few years ago, all find their use now. Even the lance has its advocates in foreign cavalry.

The forts which become valueless for purposes of defense have become of the utmost value when their underground bombproof tunnels were used as storage places for arms, ammunition, and provisions. Verdun, though no longer used as a fort, contained supplies and supply shops 40 feet underground for 300,000 men. Governors Island is no longer a fort, but it is an essential naval and military depot, where troops can be housed before shipment by sea. We now have buildings, grounds, and room enough to store our military matériel and add to it. Let us pass laws which will see that this shall be done. Do not scrap our camps and camp grounds.

The sea is the heritage of the descendants of nations that dwelt on the shores of the Baltic and Mediterranean. Communication by sea is as important as ever, and the nation that owns the means of communication has the control of the world and can feed its people and supply its navy with trained seamen. We have restored American power upon the sea, not only in our Navy, but in the merchant ships that we are building and manning. We must maintain that new creation, and it will not be easy to do so, because in time of peace the cost of running vessels from the tramp to the ocean liner depends so largely upon the wages of the men that are employed in that vessel that Americans will not go to sea unless they receive much higher wages than in other nations. Conditions have changed. In olden times, when pirates infested the ocean, every ship was an adventure, and our whalers and traders sailed as independent ships, with not only a captain but a ship's husband on board, who directed the voyage for the profit not only of the owners but also usually of the crew, for often every man in that crew had an interest in that voyage.

This sort of work was agreeable to the American, who does not care to be a common sailor on a ship plying from port to port, where the crew are discharged at the end of every voyage and where there is no chance of advancement, with hardships such as are not known on shore.

Our laws, which require certain things to be done for every sailor, have made the management of ships so costly that American ships got off the sea. Merchant shipping was carried on by the Germans and French as part of their military system, with sailors obtained by conscription, whose service took the place of military service. In England the vessels came to be manned very largely, and more and more from year to year, by Lascars, Chinamen, Japanese, and all the nations of the earth. England was able to depend upon her large fishing fleets and trawlers, which have really given her the victory in this war by searching out mines and submarines and putting down piracy. We have had no such reserve, but have had to build vessels for the purpose. We have had to commit the most awful waste of public money in establishing shipyards where ships are turned out on standard designs, with the various parts made in different factories throughout the United States, but at prices that never would be repaid by ordinary work in times of peace after freights shall be lower. There is a scarcity of ships now, and though ships will be able to run at a profit with the present rates charged for the carrying of goods, this can not be expected to last, and it is for us now to enact wise legislation by which the building, owning, and operation of ships manned by Americans and commanded by Americans shall be preserved.

There are several means by which this can be done. We can not use conscription for this purpose. It is foreign to the genius of our institutions and would never be submitted to except in case of necessity, as has been the case during this war.

We can use subsidies based upon carrying the mails or upon the number of miles traveled and the amount of freight carried or the speed of the vessels. To a limited extent this ought to be done by general law; but subsidies are such a fruitful source of graft and corruption that they are unpopular, and deservedly so. These subsidies would not be settled by the board called lords of trade and plantations, as they are in England, or of some shipping board, as they are on the Continent, and if we established such boards they could hardly be controlled and would be sure to be abolished. What is needed is some continuous policy which will tempt Americans to go to sea. The really successful policy, once adopted by the United States, was that of granting a rebate of part of the duties upon all goods brought in by American vessels. There are treaties which prevent this, but in the present time of readjustment of all treaties throughout the whole world these clauses ought to be denounced and put to an end and that old system ought to be reestablished. There can be no doubt of this. The rebate is fair, because everyone can get the advantage of it, and it leaves travel by sea open to competition as before.

Another scheme in which I have had great interest was one that I brought once before the Naval Board of the United States. It would have cost at that time about $3,000,000 a year. It would cost more now, but at that time they were unwilling to spend that little money. My suggestion was that if the shipowners were paid the difference between the wages of American seamen and officers and those of foreigners—Lascars and Chinamen—they could afford to run their vessels. The subsidy would be based upon men, and justly so, because wages in America are higher. A freight subsidy is likely to become exorbitant, because what is necessary in the beginning to enable ships to run will not be necessary afterwards when larger vessels are obtained. A subsidy based on speed would have been granted a few years ago for a 15-knot vessel, and now it ought only to be granted for a 25-knot vessel.

A subsidy based on carrying the mails is to a certain extent a sham, because it is much more than the cost of carrying the mails and is a mere favor to certain favored lines. But if it were the law that every shipowner should receive a certain amount per month for every officer and seaman employed by him, who had stood his training in the Navy and enlisted in the Naval Reserve, so as to be subject to the call of his country in time of war, the result would be that the shipowner would be paid the difference between the wages of foreigners and the wages of the Americans, while every American seaman would go proudly to the shipping office, exhibiting his certificate of enrollment in the reserve and the proper service in the Navy, and insisting that he should be paid proper wages because of the amount to be received by the shipowner.

This is entirely different from the ordinary scheme of Naval Reserve, by which the man is to be paid a very small amount for enrollment in the reserve, and the reserve is soon composed of loafers alongshore who do not go to sea at all. The reason for this was that shipowners did not like to employ a Naval Reserve man who has to go away occasionally to stand a month's training in the Navy. This difficulty could be avoided by providing that any man after a year's service in the Navy should be entitled to the rating that he had there obtained. If he desired to increase his rating he would have to go and stand a further examination. The officers would, of course, have to pass examinations and be enrolled as officers in the Naval Reserve. This system has been adopted in the most wonderful fashion in the present war. The transport officers and crews are now enrolled in our Navy as naval reserves. It only needs a continuation of this policy in time of peace to establish the personnel, but their payment must be secured so that they may get proper wages, either by subsidy—best, I think, founded upon man power—or by differential duties, such as existed in the past. We can build ships in America as cheaply as anywhere in the world. We have the machinery, the coal, the steel, and now we have the shipyards, and ships would be built by private enterprise if it can only be made profitable to run them.

Our shipyards should be kept up by the Government. They have been established and connections made therewith at large expense. Little can be got for them if they are scrapped or sold and diverted to other uses. There is no reason why this should be done. Of course, shipbuilding should be by private enterprise, but those yards could be let at proper rents, adjustable from time to time, to private builders. It would pay the Government to let them for nothing except maintenance, if we can only keep up the shipbuilding of the United States. This war has proven that in time of war we must depend upon ourselves for our production of ships, as well as in all other matters. The old doctrine, which had been so long forgotten, that we must so control our industries in peace that we shall be independent of every other nation in time of war is still good. This doctrine has been revived by all modern political economists, who have found that it was a delusion and a snare to cry, "Peace, peace," when there might be no peace. This doctrine is especially applicable to the United States. We have been allied in this conflict with the nation which commanded the seas, but in any future conflict it might not be so. We might have to depend upon ourselves, and it should be a cardinal maxim that if we desire to maintain our independence we should be able to produce every necessary, whether for the support of our population or the supply of our armies or the defense of our rights at sea.

Let us not scrap preparedness.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT].

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago I felt called upon to criticize some of the methods of the War Department in regard to the infamous system of courts-martial that were being held in our armies. In the course of those remarks I criticized somewhat severely Gen. Ansell, who had been acting as Judge Advocate General. Facts that have come to my attention since that time have led me to believe that I was perhaps too harsh in that criticism. I have received a letter from Gen. Ansell, and the gentleman who handed that letter to me stated that I was at liberty to place it in the RECORD. This letter shows much of the activity of Gen. Ansell in trying to reform that infamous system.

It always gives me pleasure when I have done even a partial injustice to anyone, to admit that fact, or make reparation. I do not believe, however, that even from the letter of Gen. Ansell itself that he has been entirely blameless. He shows in the letter that he did make his appeal to Gen. Crowder, to the Chief of Staff, and to the Secretary of War, urging the correction of the system that had grown up, and which he thought, and which I think beyond question, they had the right to revise and change. He shows that he tried to secure reconsideration in a number of cases, and was overruled. But, Mr. Chairman, my reason for now criticizing him—not so harshly as before—is that, as he knew, that those iniquities were being perpetrated, that those outrages were being committed, he ought to have notified those who were his superior officers and responsible for them that he intended to resign unless such abuses were corrected. Not having done so, I feel that he has not placed himself entirely outside the pale of just and legitimate criticism.

I know what the answer will be. The answer will be that during that time we were at war, and that is true, and that may be a partial mitigation; but we were at war when Senator CHAMBERLAIN bravely dared to criticize conditions in the military camps of this country. Attempts were made to call him down. It was even said by high authority that he had forced the Secretary of War to lose his valuable time in going before the committee of the Senate for the purpose of making explanations. But, Mr. Chairman, though that brave Senator may go down to defeat, I believe he will carry with him the blessings of many mothers of soldiers in this country whose lives he saved by that very criticism, because he brought about at least a partial reform in the infamous conditions that existed in the camps. If that action on the part of that brave Senator shall forever retire him to the shades of private life, he will carry with him the consciousness of having saved human lives from the work of heartless tyrants. And I believe that if Gen. Ansell had then said to the War Department, "Unless these things are changed, unless these savageries are discontinued, unless these barbarous and inhuman cruelties are stopped, I will resign my position and expose to the world just what has been going on," I believe it would have had its effect in getting a correction of those conditions.

He would no doubt have been threatened with court-martial; but if the War Department had permitted that outrage, the country would have arisen in such just protest that the threat would never have been executed.

A brave man may be suppressed for a time, but the conscience of honest people, shocked by atrocity and barbarism, will rise to his vindication, and the cowards who seek his destruction will in the end be driven from the seat of power. The wicked and heartless may flourish for a season, but that justice which has its seat in the bosom of God will finally overtake them. It seems from the letter of Gen. Ansell that whenever he tried to treat soldiers like human beings he was called down and overruled. Then how could he remain in the councils of such Huns? How could he herd with such Attilas?

Mr. Chairman, as he suggests, I was no doubt too harsh in the criticism, and I feel that it is due to me and to this House and to the country that I should read the statement of Gen. Ansell, and thus pillory the Neros responsible for these cruelties before the country.

Only yesterday I received a letter from the War Department in regard to a court-martial sentence that had been brought to my attention. I had placed before them a case where it was stated to me that a young man had, as I thought, been most cruelly sentenced to 20 years at Fort Leavenworth. The reply was that they could not reopen the case now, because more than six months had expired since he made application for clemency, and clemency had been denied. The letter stated that a reexamination at the present time is precluded under War Department orders of August 28, 1907, which prohibit the reexamination of application for clemency within six months of the last consideration, unless new and material reasons therefor are presented. Is that the system under which people in a Christian land, in a civilized country, have to live? Is it possible that the War Department has so tied itself down by inflexible rules that although a most outrageous sentence has been fixed upon a soldier because it has been six months since clemency had been asked and denied, they could not reopen the case? The letter pointed out that the 18th of May, 1919, was as early as he could make another application. Hindenburg and Kaiser Bill could hardly be more cruel. The letter is as follows:

FEBRUARY 17, 1919.

Hon. JOHN L. BURNETT,
House of Representatives.

SIR: I regret to have observed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 14 that upon that day, during the debate on the Army bill in the House, you took occasion to make a bitter attack upon me, based upon your gratuitous assumption that I had made no effort to prevent or correct the prevalent injustices of courts-martial administration; and it was with even greater regret, if of greater regret I could be sensible, I observed that your attack upon me evoked the applause of your colleagues.

Despite the intemperance of your remarks, and notwithstanding that you based them upon the purest assumption which the slightest investigation would have shown, even if my present attitude had not satisfactorily indicated, to be the very opposite of the truth, I shall assume, for the present at least, that you do not intend to do me a grievous wrong; that you do not wish to take advantage of your official position to my great injury; and I shall assume, in fairness to you, that the highly objectionable character of your remarks is due to the fact that you spoke out of an outraged sense of justice, and that you want to be fair, and can be fair, and will be fair even now.

If I am justified in indulging this presumption you will permit me to show you, and you will be glad to be shown and to be able to acknowledge, that your attack upon me was as baseless as it was bitter.

Your initial statement was as follows:

"Gen. Ansell, when he made the statement credited to him in the Washington Post to-day, showed that he himself was a party to the crime. Any man who would sit by as an assistant judge advocate general and see men convicted under the circumstances that Gen. Ansell detailed must either be a coward or an incompetent weakling. [Applause.]

"Now, there is no use talking about it. I think he stated facts about it, and there have been committed the enormities and atrocities by men on courts-martial which have been winked at by Crowder, and perhaps by the Secretary of War himself. These outrages are only equaled by the atrocities that the Huns themselves committed. It is infamous. The statement of Ansell shows the wickedness in the War Department among these petty officers, some of whom no doubt were men from civil life who never made $50 or $100 a month, and who tried men and sent them to Leavenworth Penitentiary for years, and yet the men higher up of this department are the ones who are responsible and ought either to be impeached or court-martialed themselves."

And when reminded by another Member that you were doing me an injustice you continued to say:

"Why did he not appeal to Gen. Crowder, why did he not appeal to the President to vindicate him, why did he go on here until he was called before a committee of the Senate to do it? Now, if he had been a brave man and an honest man, he never would have held the place that he held with these atrocities and wickedness being perpetrated by men in high life. You can not get around it, gentlemen. He is a party to the crime; there is no doubt about it. * * * Those things are done, gentlemen. But who has done it? Gen. Ansell is responsible; Crowder and the whole bunch of them; Crowder, no doubt, more than any of them. Do not try to throw it on one man, but hold the whole lot of them responsible. Let the responsibility fall where it ought to fall, gentlemen, and not upon any one man."

I shall speak by the record and tell you, in part at least, of the efforts made by me since the beginning of this war to correct a situation which I believe, and which you with bitterness have proclaimed, to have produced injustice. It is not my purpose to assert that my views were right; it is my sole purpose to show you that I did not "sit back," inactive, without attempting to prevent and remedy a course of administration which is now generally conceded to have resulted in injustice to the enlisted men of the Army.

In the first place, I think I may appropriately say in this connection that throughout my service I have not been able to accept the view that our military code sufficiently establishes the rights of an enlisted man before a court-martial, or that our procedure is sufficiently protective of those rights, or that there is no reason or necessity for authoritative supervision of the procedure of courts-martial, and of revision of their judgments. Such a view I have ever rejected, as all those will attest who have been most closely associated with me in the performance of my legal duties in the Army.

In and out of season, whenever opportunity has offered, and at times with an insistence which has strained, if not transgressed, the military proprieties, I have labored to the end that courts-martial might come to be legally established and universally regarded and respected as courts administering law according to fixed and established principles of jurisprudence; that is, as courts of justice. Such was my attitude as early as 1901. Throughout my instructorship at West Point, from 1902 to 1909, I labored to that end; and the whole course of my conduct as a judge advocate has been marked by a desire to liberalize the harsh features of our military methods and subject them, to the greatest practicable extent, to those guaranties that guard an accused on trial in a civil forum. When, by virtue of seniority, I came to the head of this office in September, 1917, while my chief was engaged in the performance of his duties as Provost Marshal General, I knew that with this new and large citizen Army we should have need of the closest legal supervision of courts-martial procedure and judgments, and I envisioned the great difficulties that must result from a continuation of our old-established methods.

At the outbreak of the war the state of the law was, as the department had for years construed it, that the judgment of a court-martial once approved by the officer in the field appointing it was final and unmodifiable; that no matter how gross and prejudicial and palpable the errors of law in the proceedings as shown upon the face of the record, there was no power in the department or elsewhere to modify, reverse, or set the judgment aside. This was the crux of the difficulty. There was no authority whatever with power to correct for prejudicial errors of law. If this were true, then, indeed, as was said by those in the department who have opposed me during this agitation, is "a military camp the fittest field of application of the military code." The camp commander's will and view become the touchstone of legality; there can be no such thing as established legal control over courts-martial and courts-martial proceedings; no means of correcting their judgments, however unlawful and however unjust. When I became the senior present for duty in the office in the early days of the war I saw, or at least I thought I saw, the necessity of breaking up such a static and intolerable legal situation, and proceeded to act accordingly. During this war I have made the following efforts, among other innumerable ones in individual cases, to that end:

(a) On October 18, 1917, I had the office begin a study to determine whether the power of revision of courts-martial judgments and the incidental power of a close and corrective supervision over their procedure could not be found in existing law.

(b) On November 10 I completed and submitted to the Secretary of War for his personal consideration a formal office opinion which held, with all my associates concurring, that such a power had been conferred upon the Judge Advocate General of the Army, by virtue of 1199 Revised Statutes of the United States.

(c) I immediately proceeded to revise courts-martial judgments, and on the very first day under the opinion I set aside several sentences on the ground of their illegality.

(d) I immediately took steps to establish in the office a court of revision and to consider the drafting of regulations to govern it.

(e) The Judge Advocate General, who was then Provost Marshal General and who up to this time had been without active connection with this office, thereupon returned to this office, wrote and filed with the Secretary of War a brief in opposition, and held that there was no such power of revision, and urged the reversal of my opinion and my action.

(f) The Secretary of War, for the time being at least, agreed with the Judge Advocate General, as did also the Acting Chief of Staff and the Inspector General of the Army, who apparently had been called into conference.

(g) Thereupon I was relieved of my duties in connection with the administration of military justice, and these were taken over by the Judge Advocate General in person. Consequently, from the middle of November, 1917, to the middle of July, 1918, I was not charged with any duty or responsibility in connection with the administration of military justice, nor was I consulted either by the Secretary of War or the Judge Advocate General upon matters affecting the administration of military justice.

(gg) About this time, also, an order which had previously been issued with the concurrence of the Judge Advocate General and the Chief of Staff, under 1132 Revised Statutes, empowering me to take full charge of the office and its policies, was revoked.

(h) On December 11, 1917, I asked the Secretary of War for a suspension of his decision and that I be permitted to file an extended brief in support of my views and the office opinion. This permission was granted. The brief was filed with the Secretary. As indicating its character, the following were its several points:

I. The action taken by the Secretary of War on the advice of the Judge Advocate General has been taken under very evident misapprehension. Such action is predicated upon the correctness of conviction; and the acceptance of such an act of grace by these innocent men necessarily implies a confession of guilt of a crime, which upon well-established principles of law and justice they never committed. Justice is a matter of law and not of executive favor.

II. It is as regrettable as it is obvious that those who oppose my views do not vision in the administration of military justice what the new Army of America will require, nor do they even see what the present is revealing; they are looking backward and taking counsel of a reactionary past whose guidance will prove harmful if not fatal.

(1) The views of the Assistant Chief of Staff and the Inspector General savor of professional absolutism.

(2) The opposing legal views are anachronistic. They are given a backward slant through undue deference to the theory of an illustrious text writer as to the nature of courts-martial, a theory which civil jurisprudence has never adopted but distinctly denied.

(3) The teachings which followed upon the premise that courts-martial are executive agencies have all been disproved by the Supreme Court of the United States, though this department still clings to them.

III. The whole argument of the other side is found in the contention that the word "revise" has no substantial meaning, but has reference only to clerical corrections.

One single fact exposes the utter fallacy of that contention, and had it been considered must have prevented an expression of that view.

That fact is this: The word "revise" is an organic word, which solely creates and defines the duties of an entire bureau. Congress went to the great length of creating an independent bureau in the War Department for the sole and declared purpose of having it "revise" the proceedings of all military courts, and made that duty of revision the sole duty of that bureau.

IV. "Revise" in its every sense—ordinary, legal, and technical military sense—means to correct, to alter, and amend.

V. The word "revise," as a matter of fact, is in no sense ambiguous, and there is no room for misconstruing it. It would have made no difference, therefore, what the administrative practice was or is. The quality of law is not impaired by nonuse. As a matter of fact, Judge Holt did, in form at least, pronounce sentences invalid, and did not content himself simply with recommending that pronouncement was by superior authority. His views as to the validity of proceedings were expressed in terms that savor of judicial pronouncement, and the orders of the War Department so far as examined seem to respect that quality by confirmance.

VI. The judge advocate general of England certainly did have this power of revision. I am not advised of his present authority.

VII. Whence comes the established power to declare proceedings null and void for jurisdictional error? And why should not the larger power include the lesser radical one of correction of legal error?

VIII. The necessity, in the name of justice, of locating this power in this department and preferably in this office, where logically and, I think, legally it belongs, must be apparent to all who are familiar with the administration of military justice.

(hh) The Judge Advocate General filed a brief in opposition to my second brief, which was to the point that the power did not exist and to the effect that the military code should better be left to be administered by the camp commander.

(i) The Secretary of War again held with the Judge Advocate General that the power was not to be deduced by the existing law, and directed him, not me, to make a "study" of the situation regarding revisory powers.

(j) About this time 13 negro soldiers were hanged in Texas almost immediately upon the completion of their trial and without review of their cases. Indeed, the proceedings under their cases did not reach the department until probably some three months after they had been executed. I took this occasion to file a memorandum with the Judge Advocate General to show what was happening and what was always likely to happen if he and the Secretary of War adhered to their views.

(k) The Judge Advocate General recommended and the department finally adopted an administrative method known as General Order 7, which suspended certain sentences until the proceedings could be examined in this office and the commanding general advised with. This was an administrative palliative which was described by the Judge Advocate General as necessary to head off a "threatened congressional investigation," to "silence criticism," "to prevent talk about the establishment of courts of appeal," and to make it "apparent that an accused did get some kind of revision of his proceedings other than the revision at field headquarters."

(l) I volunteered to criticize this compromise with the law and justice and again asked that revisory power be established in this office. I recommended that if the administrative method was nevertheless to be adhered to, it should be greatly extended.

(ll) It was upon my voluntary recommendation that a branch of this office was established in France, to make such review as departmental administration permitted.

(m) Several times—three times, I think—during January, February, March, and April, 1917, I called attention to the necessity of closer supervision of courts-martial judgments and proceedings.

(n) Returning from Europe in the middle of July, whither I had gone the April before for the purpose of studying the military administration of our allies, I filed with the Judge Advocate General a report which, among other things, treated especially of the administration of military justice in France, Italy, and England, and which indicated those elements of their systems which I believed to be better than our own, and suggested our own weaknesses. This report never reached the Secretary of War.

(o) In August, 1918, I reorganized the office so as to be enabled to present a more thorough presentation of the deficiencies of the court-martial records coming to the office, and by strength and thoroughness of argument, to impel the minds of the military authorities to action in individual cases. For this purpose I created the boards of review, which still exist and perform most valuable service, but without any authority to make a modification of a judgment in any case.

(p) In September, I ordered the Boards of Review to break away from the office interpretation (which, however, was probably correct) of the administrative method heretofore referred to (subpar. k), which had been construed to forbid this office to make any recommendation or suggestion as to clemency. And I ordered that, in a proper case, despite the order, clemency should be suggested to commanding generals.

(q) In September, upon my insistent recommendation, power was established in the Acting Judge Advocate General in France to make rulings upon matters of the administration of military justice, in our own forces in France, which would control all commanding generals until overruled by the Secretary of War. This is now being opposed by the commanding general American Expeditionary Forces and my own action and propriety in procuring the issue of this order is being subjected to question.

(r) In October, the Executive Officer and I advocated (and the head of the office approved) the increase of the personnel of the department, so that at least the trial judge advocate should be a lawyer and could use his power as such to exert some legal control over the court.

Upon every occasion and every opportunity I have stood for an absolute legal supervision of courts-martial procedure and judgments, and even when not charged with any duty touching the administration of military justice, I have never hesitated to express my view upon any matter concerning it that might come to my attention. In certain several cases involving sentences of death, I voluntarily went to the chief of this office and opposed his recommendation for execution.

These are a part of my efforts. I hope they may serve to convince all fair-minded men that I am not a coward or weakling.

You seem to think that under these circumstances I should have gone directly to the President. Upon a little reflection you will appreciate, I am sure, the impossibility of such a course. I think, however, that, resting under the charge which you have made against me, I am justified in saying this, that on one occasion I well remember—and doubtless there are others—when four sentences of death were pending in the department for confirmation, and when this office had recommended execution, I went to the head of the office and orally presented to him my views in opposition. I then filed with him a memorandum in which I did my best to show, what seemed to me to be obvious, that these men had been most unfairly tried, had not been tried at all, and ought not to die or suffer any other punishment upon such records. Discovering that these memoranda had not been presented to the Secretary of War, and feeling justified by the fact that I had no other forum in this department, I gave a copy of the memorandum to a distinguished member of the Judiciary Committee of the House and was told by him that he would present the cases to the President himself.

I was compelled to do this—an act inconsistent with strict military propriety—by the dictates of my own conscience, by my desire to serve justice, and by my sense of duty to my God and these unprotected men that their lives might be spared.

Very respectfully, yours,

S. T. ANSELL.

WASHINGTON, February 17, 1919.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS].

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, Gen. Ansell has recognized the injustice that has been done thousands and tens of thousands of private soldiers during this war. These wrongs have been committed in the name of justice through the medium of a military trial. He has come to this Congress and asked us to revise the military laws under which it is made possible for these wrongs to be inflicted on the enlisted man. If any Member of Congress will take the time and has the inclination to go to the War Department and investigate these alleged courts-martial, he will come back to his seat in this House denouncing in most unmeasured terms the military law under which the enlisted men have been tried during this war and are still being tried.

We ought not to forget that we still have under arms more than two millions of men. Each one is subject to trial by court-martial upon the charge of violating some frivolous and absurd military rule. I will venture to guess that none of you can read the hearings in the average court-martial but will say that justice is an absolute stranger at these so-called trials.

If we adjourn this Congress and leave Gen. Ansell and other officers who want to help him with their hands tied, I do not know what may be the result. If the worst should follow, the responsibility will be at the door of Congress, because we have refused to heed his cry of danger.

In this connection I am going to read to you an excerpt from a letter received from the mother of one of these boys who is somewhere in Europe. The mother says:

I am inclosing you herewith a letter that I have received from my son. Can't these boys be brought home?

I am thinking that this thought is in the heart of many mothers to-day. I will read now a paragraph from the son's letter which was inclosed:

This is the worst hole that I ever got into. I sleep on a board floor, as does each private. The officers are well fed while we starve. They have good beds in good quarters. If we complain, we get a court-martial. I have not been up before them yet. Don't know how soon I will be.

Here follows a warning in this letter that every Member of Congress ought to heed. Listen to the voice of this boy as it comes from over the sea. Here is his closing sentence in this paragraph:

One thing, a time will come when the boys are home, and these officers may never know who got them.

Mr. FERRIS. Does the gentleman think that is a good spirit for the boy to write?

Mr. KEARNS. I am not discussing the spirit of this letter. I am stating a cold fact. I have sympathy for a boy put in this position, where he is made to sleep on a bare floor and the officer is furnished with comfortable quarters and well fed while the boy is being starved. I say most emphatically my sympathy is with the boy.

Mr. FERRIS. Does the gentleman's sympathy extend to the threat to assassinate the officer?

Mr. KEARNS. Of course I have no sympathy with anarchy or lawlessness in any form, but I have read to this House the language of a boy who says he has been made to suffer untold and useless hardships. He says if he complains because he is starving he is brought before a court-martial. Under our present system of courts-martial the chances are he would receive many years at hard labor in prison. To my mind, the entire system is wrong and the hardship of these boys would appeal to a heart of adamant. The only argument that I am trying to advance is the argument that we, this Congress, should act; that we should do something before we adjourn to relieve these boys. No; I am not upholding anarchy, neither do I subscribe to any veiled threat that might be expressed between the lines of the paragraph taken from this letter, whatever that threat may be. I believe in law and order; but I am telling you that these antiquated laws should be repealed. They have come down the centuries from the Dark Ages. We have tried to rewrite these laws here on two or three occasions within the week by way of amendment to the military appropriation bill, but each time some one made a point of order to the amendment. We wanted to rewrite these laws so that boys would not be compelled to make threats against officers, if indeed they make threats. We wanted to make the enlisted man's liberty just as sacred and as safe as your liberty and mine.

I want to say to you that there is not one private out of one hundred who is tried by a court-martial who stands a ghost of a chance of acquittal if an officer is the prosecuting witness. In support of this statement let me read to you from an argument made by a young officer in defense of his client. Before I do that, and by way of explanation, permit me to say that three officers had testified against the defendant who was a private. When these officers had finished their testimony the prosecution rested its case. The young lieutenant who was defending the boy did not put his client on the stand, nor did he put any witness on the stand. Here I call your attention to the reason, as he said, why he did not. Let me say in praise of the young lieutenant who defended this private that he had nerve sufficient to talk straight out from the shoulder to the court. He had the nerve to tell them the situation, the environment in which he found himself in the defense of his client. Listen to the language that he defiantly slings into the very teeth of the court, composed, I think, of about seven officers. And note, too, the silence of the court when, if this statement that follows is not true, the officer making the accusation should have been himself brought to trial. Yet there are high Army officers here in Washington who will tell you this situation does not exist. Listen to the first paragraph of this argument, and then tell me what you think. The language hurled at the court was as follows. Listen to it:

If the court please, I will take up a few minutes this morning of your time in order to sum up the evidence. I will deal mostly with the evidence of Capt. Williams, the man who prepared the charges and on whose account we are assembled here this morning. I did not allow the defendant to take the stand in his own behalf—

Let me pause here and ask, Why do you suppose he did not? I want you to listen to the reason why he says he did not allow his client to take the stand in his own behalf to rebut the testimony of the three officers. This is what he says:

I did not allow the defendant to take the stand in his own behalf because I realize that the words of an officer are above reproach (with this court) and that any evidence that the defendant might be able to give would simply be a waste of time.

This is the first paragraph in the speech made by the counsel for the defendant, and yet officers here in Washington will tell you that what I am saying is not true; yet I have quoted from the record of a military trial wherein the defendant was found guilty and sentenced to imprisonment for eight years at hard labor, and all because an officer's word in a military court "is above reproach." All because it would be "a waste of time" to offer testimony of a private soldier in a military court. I say this is disgraceful; this is shameful, and this Congress ought to deal military autocracy a death blow while we have this chance. Gen. Ansell has defied this military aristocracy and is begging us to act. Here is a young lieutenant, M. P. O'Keefe, defending a private and has the nerve to say to the court that he did not put his client on the witness stand because he realized that the word of a private was worthless in a military court as against the word of an officer, and the court sat there and listened to the charge in silence, and by that silence, as we all know, admitted that every word that Lieut. O'Keefe said was true. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWITZER].

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, I shall address my remarks to some of the results flowing from the activities of war rather than to questions of preparation or plans for offense or defense. What I am about to say I know is a matter of great importance to thousands and thousands of men who are returning home, who are crippled, and I believe it will be of interest generally to the people throughout the country. Some weeks ago I called the attention of the House to the inadequate compensation provided by the war-risk insurance law for the soldiers who have become crippled and maimed in the great war just closing. At the time of the passage of the law I called the attention of the House to this lame place in the law and asserted on the floor on several occasions that it appeared that the draftsmen of the act had lopped off the pensions to the blind, the legless, the armless, the man who had lost one leg and one arm, for the purpose of increasing the compensation to be paid other beneficiaries to be provided for in the act. I suppose it was done to round out the symmetrical conception or scheme of some sociologic dreamer. The compensation provided by the act for the man who had lost an arm and a leg, who has no wife or child living, is an insult and a burning shame. Under article 3 of the war-risk insurance law this man is given a percentage of the compensation for a total permanent disability. That sum is $30 per month. Under the general pension law the man who has lost an arm and a leg is entitled to a pension of $60 per month. The Civil War veteran receives $60 a month, the Spanish War veterans receive $60 a month, and the soldier of this war who has lost an arm and a leg would have received $60 a month if the war-risk insurance law had not been enacted. The law unfairly discriminates against the crippled soldier. It is unfortunate that we use the word "compensation" in the act instead of the word "pension."

To my mind there is much more to be considered than the mere physical impairment to earning a living. These injuries that I refer to in the main have been received upon the field of conflict, in the performance of acts of heroism, and the mutilated condition of the soldier should be taken into consideration when we arrive at the reward that an appreciative and rich nation decrees for him. There can be no such thing as compensation to the man who has lost both eyes, who has lost two hands, who has lost two feet, to the man who has lost an arm and a leg, to the man who is helpless and permanently bedridden. He should be granted a pension—a word that comprehends not only his physical impairment for earning a living but also takes into consideration that he rendered valorous services; that he performed acts of heroism; that he has made a sacrifice for his country. His disfigurement also should be considered. But this rule of commercial compensation does not know anything about the principles to which I allude. They are foreign to the principle of commercial compensation which enters into and which is the rule for measuring the amount to be paid under the war-risk insurance law. Paragraph 2 of that act requires the bureau officials to make a schedule of ratings of reduction of earning capacity from specific injuries and combinations of injuries of a permanent nature.

These ratings can be as high as 100 per cent, but they are required to be based, "as far as practicable upon the average impairment of the earning capacity resulting from such injuries in civil occupations." The bureau officials construe this provision to mean that they must classify the soldiers in reference to their vocation or calling in civil life, that they must determine whether or not the soldier in one of these classes is entitled to a greater or less compensation than soldiers in another and dissimilar class who are likewise mutilated, and the result is that practically for the same injury a pension of $25 or $27 or $28 a month is allowed to one man who has lost an arm or a part of an arm, and then for a soldier in another class only $18 or $20 is allowed. I think that this ought to be eliminated from the law. We give the private and the officer the same rate, or we intended to, in the way of compensation. I do not believe that there should be this discrimination in the law between classes of soldiers.

For instance, a soldier who is a lawyer will not be considered as having sustained as great a loss on account of an amputated arm or hand as a soldier who has followed the vocation of a carpenter.

In passing, I wish to state that it will be impossible to ever convince the soldier receiving the lesser rate of compensation that he is not entitled to the higher rate. The lawyer with an arm and a leg off and without clientage will certainly think he is entitled to as much as the carpenter likewise mutilated.

I happened to know at one time a one-armed carpenter who got along much better, so far as making a living is concerned, than many lawyers.

Under the war-risk law the soldier who loses two hands or two feet, or two eyes, or is helpless and permanently bedridden, receives $100 per month, and under the ruling of the bureau officials he is entitled to the 240 monthly payments of any insurance he may have taken out—that is, they hold that these disabilities render him totally and permanently disabled within the meaning of the law. This I believe is the proper interpretation of the act, for I believe the above disabilities to be fair illustrations of what Congress considered to be of total and of permanent nature.

The soldier who loses an arm and a leg, or a hand and a foot, or an arm or a foot will receive anywhere from eighteen to thirty dollars per month for the injury, and out of this he will have to pay the monthly premiums on his insurance or allow the same to lapse unless he has some other income or means, while the soldier losing two hands or two feet will receive $100 per month special compensation, and if he has taken out $10,000 of insurance, he will receive in addition to his special compensation $57.50 per month on his insurance for the period of 20 years.

The insurance to the man who has only one arm and one leg is a handicap to him, as it is a monthly expense and something from which he will never derive any direct benefit and which will never be of any personal assistance to him. We insisted that they should take out this insurance when they were drafted, and now we require them to let it lapse in the event they have no independent means or force them to pay the monthly premiums on their policies out of an inadequate monthly compensation, less than half the pension now paid to the Spanish-American War veteran likewise crippled.

These men can not be anyways near adequately compensated unless the law is amended by specifying the rates for specific injuries, as was done in the general pension law, or the basis for total disability on account of injuries resulting from amputations, or equivalent conditions, be raised from thirty to one hundred dollars per month in the war-risk law.

This is the rate provided in the law for the loss of two hands, or two feet, or two eyes, or for becoming totally blind or helpless and permanently bedridden; and if Congress will specifically declare the rate of $100 per month as the basis for total disability resulting from amputations of limbs and parts thereof, and equivalent conditions, and direct that the impairments of earning capacity resulting from such amputations or conditions be given a rate of compensation prorated on the basic $100 for total disability, the bureau officials by applying the tables of rates and methods now employed would arrive at a rate of compensation for the specific injuries I refer to approximating those carried in the general pension law for similar disabilities.

The War Risk Bureau officials, after more than a year spent in administering the law, suggested or recommended some months ago, so I am informed, that the basis for total disability for what is known as amputated cases or equivalent conditions be raised from $30 to $100 per month, the specific rate in the law for the loss of both eyes, two feet, or both hands, and so forth.

This recommendation of the bureau officials is a high tribute to the Pension Committees of the House, for the foregoing $100 rate per month is the result of an amendment offered by myself when the war-risk insurance bill was under consideration by the House, and I took the rate carried by the existing general pension law for the disabilities above enumerated. The bureau officials state that by applying their tables and methods of computation for partial disabilities from amputations and equivalent conditions that they will arrive at the same rate or about the same rates carried in the general pension law for the same or similar disabilities, a further tribute to the good judgment of the Pension Committees of the House and the Congresses which enacted the laws carrying some of the specific rates referred to more than 30 or 40 years ago.

The Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House has been so busy investigating the packers and the multitudinous matters piling up before it that it has had no time to consider propositions or suggestions to remedy the imperfections of the war-risk insurance law, although glaring injustices are being daily worked out by the bureau in charge of its administration; and the fault is not with the bureau officials, but with the law.

In order to bring this matter more forcibly to the attention of the House, I have introduced a House resolution to create a new committee, to be known as the committee on soldiers' compensation and insurance, to which may be referred all matters and bills affecting soldiers' compensation and insurance. This committee can devote its whole time to matters coming before it, which will soon be voluminous.

The House has had a pension committee since 1813, and since 1880 it has had two committees to look after the pensions of soldiers of past wars. The enlisted and drafted men of this war, I presume, nearly equal in numbers the total number of the soldiers serving in all the other wars since the birth of the Nation. Therefore there should be a special committee to look after the compensation and insurance of the soldiers of this war. Many imperfections will be found in the existing law, and soon there will be thousands of bills for special relief introduced for those who can not obtain justice under the general law, and these matters should have the attention of a committee which can devote its whole time to the consideration of these subjects.

When the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House was created, no one ever dreamed that it would some time in the future consider and report out legislation for the insurance of ships and seamen and eventually stretch forth its tentacles and take jurisdiction of subjects and over matters which had been under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Pension Committee and the Pension Committees of the House since 1813. But, as this committee has now lost the services of the originator of the law and the colossal bureau builder of this administration, the late Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McAdoo, I submit that there can be no further excuse offered for its retention of jurisdiction over matters pertaining to pensions or soldiers' insurance. The committee had more work than it could well do before it was commanded to take jurisdiction of pensions.

The 4,000,000 soldiers serving us in the war now closing, and their dependents, will furnish all the work necessary to keep one committee busy, and they should have the whole attention of one committee. The soldiers and ex-soldiers of the Civil War, and their dependents, have at their service the Invalid Pension Committee of the House. I therefore trust that the Republicans, in the organization of the next House, will give this matter their utmost careful attention, and I believe that they will come to the conclusion that such a committee as provided for in my House resolution No. 558 should be created. It may be found necessary to create a committee on allotments and allowances, but I do not believe that the allotment and allowance feature of the war-risk insurance law should be blended or mixed with the subjects that may be placed under the jurisdiction of the committee on soldiers' compensation and insurance proposed in my House resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, this morning we agreed to a conference report carrying $600,000. This evening we will pass this bill carrying a few million dollars, to-morrow we will consider a bill perhaps to appropriate $750,000,000 to the railroads, and the next day a bill appropriating a billion and a quarter of dollars to the farmers, so that what I have to say may seem very inconsequential. I hold in my hand a letter written from the Quartermaster Department to a man who was a first-class private in the aero squadron in France, and by the time he received the letter had received a probably merited promotion to first lieutenant. This letter is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE QUARTERMASTER GENERAL OF THE ARMY, TRANSPORTATION AND TELEGRAPH BRANCH,
Washington, August 7, 1918.

No. 553.4-CD-T-Fessenden
B. & A.-2174.
From: The Acting Quartermaster General of the Army.
To: Pvt. (First Class) Frank W. Tillman, A. S. S. E. R. C., care Adjutant General of the Army, Washington, D. C.
Subject: Transfer of baggage.

1. On August 25, 1917, you were issued transportation from Boston, Mass., to Fairfield, Ohio. In connection with this transportation you had your baggage transferred from the Big Four station to the Ohio electric station in Dayton, Ohio.

2. As this transfer was not authorized, it is requested that you forward a check for 25 cents promptly to this office.

By authority of the Acting Quartermaster General:
T. F. POWELL,
Major, Q. M. R. C.

Paid February 5, 1918, 25 cents. P. M.

FRANK W. TILLMAN,
First Lieutenant, A. S., U. S. A.,
185th Aero Squadron, 2d Pursuit Group, A. E. F., France.

And the young man complied and forwarded 25 cents. Here was a young man in the Army granted transportation home, and when he reached the city of Dayton he easily and quickly left the Big Four Railroad and transferred to the Electric Ohio Road, which runs through the village of Fairfield, and a great and grateful Republic spends a few dollars in connection with the official communications to inform the young man that he ought to have carried his baggage in his hand instead of transferring it from the Big Four station to the Ohio Electric station, and demanding that he refund to this Government 25 cents. I have often read little descriptions, under the head of "the meanest man" of various kinds, endeavoring to illustrate how small some one person could be in reference to money. We must not forget that in the appropriation of these vast and enormous sums of money we have some very careful officials who insist on collecting, at the expense of several dollars, 25 cents from a poor soldier who did the sensible thing and had his baggage transferred, and then went back to the fighting line and risked his life in aeroplanes and received a promotion from a private to that of first lieutenant. I rather think that the Government takes the cake on being "the meanest man." [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DENTON].

Mr. DENTON. Mr. Chairman, I have not taken up much time on the floor of this House, and I would not speak now, when time is so valuable, if I did not think that something ought to be said with reference to the tendency manifested here to criticize and try to embarrass the President. This tendency has been more marked since the ending of the war, although it had existed before. We all know what efforts were made by the other side of the House to take the control of the war out of the hands of the President, where the Constitution had placed it, and to put it in the hands of committees to be selected by Congress, a fact that was pointed out by the President in his letter, which has been so much misrepresented, the letter on which the opposition based its statement, and reiterated the same both on the platform and in the press, that the President had branded the Republicans as disloyal, when just the opposite was true, when he had said that they were prowar but antiadministration, which every man in this House knows was true, as applied to the great majority. Some of us remember that when a month or so before the election the gentleman from East St. Louis, Ill., made his bitter and rhetorical attack upon the President it was greeted by loud applause on the Republican side, as were other attacks.

Nevertheless, the Republicans went before the people contending that they were better friends of the President and had supported him better than the Democrats. But no sooner had they gotten in on this theory than they studiously began to try to embarrass him in every way possible.

On the very first day of this session of Congress, when the President appeared to deliver his message, they sought to insult and humiliate him by studied discourtesy, and the same spirit has manifested itself continuously to this day. Everything that he has done has been wrong. He has been on a mission as noble and commendable as ever engaged the attention of any statesman, trying—honestly trying—to bring about such a settlement of this war as will make impossible the recurrence of such another world catastrophe. Certainly this is a desirable end. He may fall far short of his aims. The world has been thousands of years in the making, and its trend can not be entirely changed in a few short months. But much can be done to bring about changes which the lessons of this great war have brought the people to realize the need of. And we should certainly commend the President for the great work he is trying to do instead of criticizing him and throwing obstructions in his way, making his work more difficult. Instead of trying to help and encourage the President in this great work, many Members of Congress seem to want to make his work as difficult as possible, and are trying to discount the result in advance.

A league of nations will not bring about the millenium, but it can do much to lessen the danger of future wars by substituting reason for force in the settlement of international controversies. We settle our domestic difficulties in that way, and there is no reason why we should not settle our international difficulties in the same way. There is no more reason why international difficulties should be settled by force than there is for the settlement of our personal difficulties in the same way.

Some criticism has been made because the peace conference has not concluded its work sooner. Better take a little more time and do this work well; too much haste is always regrettable. Let us tie the nations up in a league that will be permanent while the necessity for the same is impressed on the minds of the people by the great catastrophe which has befallen them. It has been said that the conference should complete its work and bring our boys home as soon as possible. We are all anxious to have our boys brought home, but this will not be hastened by a speedy conclusion of peace. Every ship that comes over now is loaded to its full capacity. It took more than a year to transport 2,000,000 troops, the largest Army we ever had, 3,000 miles across the ocean with the aid of our allies, which was considered almost a miracle, and it will take longer to bring them back.

It has been said on the floor of this House that we should get out of Europe as soon as possible and go back to the good old days of Washington and Jefferson, when we had no entangling alliances but were sufficient unto ourselves. President Wilson should come home, it has been said, and leave Europe to settle its own difficulties and make its own peace. Happy would we be if this could be done. We tried to keep out of the war and to keep free from these entanglements, and we kept out as long as possible, and many of you then criticized the President for keeping us out too long; some of you who are now criticizing him because he does not get out soon enough. You would have him return home and let the warring parties establish another balance of power which might become unbalanced at any time and fall, as it did in the past, with disastrous results to the people of the world. The loss of more than 50,000 of the best of our American boys and a debt of $50,000,000,000, which probably we will eventually have as the result of this war, testify to the futility of any attempt on our part to adopt a policy of nonintervention in world politics. We could not keep out of this world conflagration, and what assurance have we that we could keep out of the next one? Modern science has brought the peoples of the world so closely together that a great upheaval in one part of the world is felt by all civilized people everywhere.

The fathers and mothers of the boys who have made such great sacrifices in this war, and the taxpayers, who will have to bear the financial burden, are back of our great President, wishing him every success. If he can even in a small degree lessen the danger of the occurrence of wars by a league of nations, the people are for it. And instead of decrying our great President and trying to belittle his efforts, we should help him and be proud of him, and of the great work he is doing. No man at the peace conference has more influence than he; and he would have a still greater influence if he had behind him at home a sympathetic and united Congress.

No man before ever had such a world-wide influence as has Woodrow Wilson. His name is known in every civilized country on the globe, and wherever people are struggling for liberty and the right of self-government their eyes are turned to him, and in him they find their champion. He is the idol of the great mass of the common people the world over; he is revered and looked up to among the people of the nations allied with us, and also by the people striving for democracy, even in the countries with which we have been at war.

What gives him this world power? The same thing that gave him his power at home. The American people have been behind him and Congress has followed his lead, because it was realized that when he spoke it was the voice of the people. How frequently have we seen the defeat in this House of measures advocated by him when they were being considered in the "Committee of the Whole," where there could be no record vote, and then seen these same measures pass this House when there was a roll call, and with the aid of the votes of the same men who had voted against them in committee? Men on both sides of the House have voted for these measures against their personal inclination only because they knew that the people were back of the President. It is this same thing that gives him his power at the world conference. The great mass of the war-weary people of the world are behind him. They have seen in him the embodiment of the principles for which they are striving, and they have made him their spokesman. When he speaks at the world conference it is realized that the people of the world are speaking, and politicians and statesmen of all countries listen.

Can we not forget politics for the time being? Important as it was that we should win the war, the work ahead of us now is no less important; nothing is of more importance than that the questions growing out of this war shall be settled right, so that all our sacrifices shall not have been in vain.

For one, I have no patience with all this talk that, having turned the tide at the critical moment and thus helped to win this war, we have no further duty in the matter, but should come home as fast as we can and leave the settlement to our allies. Experience having shown our vital interest in the questions involved in this war, we have a right to insist, and we would be false to our trust if we did not do so, that these questions must be so settled that we will not again be caught in a great world whirlpool. The American people, who have made the sacrifices necessary to win this war, expect and demand nothing less. If we disappoint them by opposition and obstruction where we should render assistance, we will rue it; we will be faithless to our trust and little less than disloyal to our country. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I have no patience with any criticism that smacks of politics, but there are times when because of politics to refrain from justly criticizing becomes a breach of duty. I am hoping through the publicity of the following facts to get from the War Department some late, authentic, definite information concerning the present condition of the Thirty-sixth Division in France and, if possible, to secure for the soldiers—brave fighting boys from Texas and Oklahoma—better camp conditions and more comfortable quarters during their enforced stay in a foreign land.

On February 7 Mr. R. E. Johnson, whose home is in Burnet, Tex., and who is a veteran officer of the Spanish-American War, came into my office, stating he had just arrived from France, and that on leaving the Thirty-sixth Division about 20 days before he had promised some Texas boys from my district to let me know the numerous hardships they were undergoing, urging me to get for them some relief.

I immediately sent the following letter to the Secretary of War:

FEBRUARY 7, 1919.

Hon. NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: A substantial citizen from my district has just returned from France. He tells me that he left Brest January 25, and left the Thirty-sixth Division about 20 days ago.

He informed me that the Thirty-sixth Division was quartered in an area of about 10 miles square, and that while the officers had beds to sleep in in the farmhouses the privates were occupying barns, outhouses, chicken houses, and every other place that afforded any cover, with mud everywhere and much sickness. He also stated that these men generally were scratching themselves sore because of "cooties" and were disheartened, with no hope of getting home soon.

Instead of making public criticism in the House, and probably do an injustice to your department, I am bringing this complaint direct to you, hoping that you will give me the facts as they really exist and will take immediate steps to remedy this condition. My informant is a credible citizen, loyal to the core, and would not have made this complaint had there been no foundation for it.

In this connection, if it is possible, could you give me some intimation when the Thirty-sixth may be expected home?

Very sincerely, yours,

THOMAS L. BLANTON.

Five days elapsed, and I received under date of February 11 the following communication from the Secretary of War:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 11, 1919.

MY DEAR MR. BLANTON: I deeply appreciate the information contained in your letter of February 7 and the spirit in which you transmit it. On the occasion of my own visits to France I confess I was amazed at the conditions under which the soldiers had to live; but, of course, there are some two million British soldiers and about two million American soldiers there for whom no permanent provision could be made, and who then had to live, and probably still have to live, under conditions which in this country would be regarded as quite impossible. The contrast between our well-ordered camps in this country, with their barracks, storehouses, bathing facilities, etc., and a quartered division in France is something which can not be described but must be seen to be understood.

Of course, the signing of the armistice enabled us to move some divisions from the least possible places, but until a substantial number of our troops are returned it will not be possible to find even moderately comfortable surroundings for them. We are, of course, using every ship we can lay our hands upon to carry soldiers home, and each boatload diminishes the problem on the other side, but the problem is still there, and is serious, and part of its seriousness lies in the fact that, of course, every soldier now in France has his mind set on coming home, the inspiration under which they lived while the war was still on is withdrawn, and they are more sensitive to unpleasant conditions. In addition to that, I know of no country in the world where it rains so steadily and so often, or where the mud is so impressive, as it is in France at this season of the year. Fortunately, the health records of the Army in France do not bear out the apprehension of your friend as to the sickness prevailing there. It seems to be true that mud is less dangerous than the dust which they have to endure in the summer.

However, I am never willing to rest on presumptions about matters of this kind, and will have an immediate inquiry made into the situation of the Thirty-sixth Division, so as to be sure that everything possible is being done for its comfort. I shall be glad, also, to let you know as early as I can the probable date of the return of the division.

Cordially, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives.

I have received a letter from a major in the United States Army, in which he takes exception to the statement of Mr. Johnson, and from which I quote the following excerpts:

Up to December 5, when I left my battalion, I had only had one death among 480 men and 20 officers. * * *

I, as an officer of this division, wish to forcibly protest and request that Mr. Johnson's statement be withdrawn. * * *

The officers slept in beds in private houses, and the men were billeted in houses, barns, old storerooms, wooden barracks, etc., and were not in camp in the mud as reported. * * *

In regard to the body lice, when men fight in the rain and mud, take their rest in shell holes half filled with water, and otherwise live the life of beasts, which is a necessity in the style of fighting the Thirty-sixth went through, it is to be expected that they will accumulate a few body lice, known in the trenches as "cooties," but better known among the Americans as "crums." But the Medical Department must be credited with a continual war against these festive birds from the time the men are inducted in the service until their discharge. Where and when possible a portable bath is set up and the men given a chance to scrub them off and put on clean clothing and given a fair chance to rid themselves. As soon as the division was moved to winter quarters permanent baths were established, and the men were checked off as they bathed. In view of the fact that at no time could it be possible for every man in an organization to be put through at the same time, and the lice hiding out at bathing time, there is bound to be a few escape. This can not be avoided, and it delays the extermination necessarily for several weeks. I have no doubt but what the Thirty-sixth is entirely rid of them by now.

Notwithstanding the demand of this major in the Army that Mr. Johnson retract, I have a written statement from Mr. Johnson making no retraction. This major left France on December 5, while Mr. Johnson sailed from Brest on January 25.

The following is Mr. Johnson's statement, made since he was criticized by this major in the United States Army:

Inasmuch as it has been published that I had made complaint about the billeting of the Thirty-sixth (Texas-Oklahoma Volunteer) Division in France, I take the liberty to submit a statement that I believe the men of the Thirty-sixth, when they finally return home and are free to express themselves, will declare to be conservative.

I met Congressman BLANTON in his office in Washington a few days ago and related to him what I saw and experienced of the situation of the Thirty-sixth Division as it was when I left it, about one month since, and it is evident that immediate representations were made to the War Department by Mr. BLANTON looking to a betterment of the conditions existing, and now, in order that all who wish to do so may cooperate in such reasonable, patriotic way as they may choose, I submit my observations and offer my own personal suggestions in the premises.

The States of Texas and Oklahoma have two divisions accredited to them jointly overseas, viz, the Ninetieth, commonly known as the National Army Division, and the Thirty-sixth, commonly known as the Volunteer or National Guard Division. The latter, however, is largely mixed, having many selected (drafted) men in its ranks.

The Ninetieth Division was soon after the signing of the armistice designated as a part of the army of occupation and has been in the army of occupation at or near the extreme front for some time, and, from reports received by me from men coming back from that area and from newspaper reports, it seems that the Ninetieth is well billeted, comfortable, and enjoying cleanly, sanitary, and good moral environment.

The Thirty-sixth Division, after the signing of the armistice, was marched back toward the interior of France to a point some 125 miles from Paris, the men believing that they were on their way to a port of embarkation and home. They were billeted in a rural district over an area of some 15 miles square, usually a small contingent in each small farm village. In France I saw no farmhouses as we understand the term. The farms range from less than an acre to several acres, and the people who do the farming live in the near-by villages. There being so very little suitable ground for camps of tents or barracks, the Army has adopted the only sensible plan for troops to occupy the country by billeting them in these villages, and, naturally, the soldiers' requirements are just that much in excess of the purposes for which the villages were established, creating the necessity for occupying as sleeping quarters for the soldiers almost every kind of building that will shield the soldier from the rain that scarcely ever ceases to fall; consequently, the men of the Thirty-sixth Division are occupying all sorts of domiciles, some comparatively good, some better than none, and including barns and other outhouses, with, in many cases, huge piles of manure in very close proximity to these living and sleeping quarters of the men and to their source of drinking water; the latter, however, regulations forbid the men to drink until it has been placed in large water bags and chemically treated.

In some instances horses, cows, rabbits, and fowls occupy the same building as the men, with partitions separating, which do not in all cases prevent the odors from the animals reaching the quarters of the men.

While the military authorities have endeavored to clean up the men moved back from the trenches to the interior, it is quite evident that the men of the Thirty-sixth Division have not been rid of the body lice, a most disgusting, humiliating, and demoralizing pest to the men who are forced to endure such inhabitants of their bodies.

Fuel for the men to use in their billets has at times been hard to get, and I am reliably informed that some of the men bought wood at about the equivalent of $18 per cord when they had not received wood or fuel from the Army supply.

Without any purpose to create the impression that the womanhood of France is totally depraved, I certainly feel justified in saying that immorality is so openly in evidence that I believe a truthful statement, which may be had from our soldiers when they return, will seem to the average American gross exaggeration.

As to intoxicating drinks, while I do not expect our soldiers to come any nearer "going to the devil" as the victims of booze than have the American people thus far, nevertheless France seems to be overflowing with that means of debauchery, and we certainly are not ready to treat our brave men in France as we would convicts and deprive them of liberty to the extent that would insure even a temperate use of intoxicants by those who have the inclination to imbibe freely.

The men of the Thirty-sixth Division have that same true American spirit that has sustained our country since its beginning. They gave themselves to battle for the ideals which prompted us to go to war, and they have endured uncomplainingly every hardship and unpleasant circumstance incident to their purpose to whip Germany and finish the job quickly. Tney appreciated every effort, and cooperated therein, of the people and the Government to get them overseas and into the fight; but, after all, they are not soldiers; they don't want to be soldiers, and they should not be looked upon any longer as mere soldiers. They are, and should be considered by us, an overseas portion of the best of our citizenry; men really more deeply interested in the affairs of our Nation than those on this side who have not gone through the crucible of the last year "over there." They are thinking, virile, earnest young men, who have offered their all and given much, and who now yearn to be granted their citizenship again at the hands of their Government that they may return to their homes and loved ones and resume their civilian life and participate with those at home in shaping the destiny of the United States, to them the greatest country on all the globe. They believe that they have earned that reasonable consideration from the folks at home that would demand and accomplish their severance from the Army with the very least possible delay consistent with the real needs of our Nation at this time. Knowing that the large majority of them are farmers and stock raisers, and that others of them need have no apprehension as to securing employment after being discharged, they are interested in becoming producers instead of very expensive consumers in a far-distant land, and they think along these lines largely because they realize that upon the soldiers now in service and others of their generation will fall much of the burden of meeting the expenses of this war.

Considering the matter from the standpoint of a citizen of the United States just returned from France and familiar with the Thirty-sixth Division as at present located, it would not be unreasonable, nor would it be unpatriotic, on the part of the people of Texas and Oklahoma to urge the return home and demobilization of one of the divisions—either the Thirty-sixth or Ninetieth—at the very earliest possible time commensurate with the actual military needs of the United States, and it certainly would be gratifying to be able to meet part of the farming difficulties of these two far Southern States, where plowing is now in progress for this year's crop, with the men from one of those divisions. As to which division the department might choose to send home, if either can now be spared, to one familiar with the location of each division it would seem reasonable to suppose that the Thirty-sixth would be chosen as the first to return to the States. It is several hundred miles nearer the port of embarkation; it would have to be moved several hundred miles from its present location over into Germany should it be substituted to occupy the sector now held by the Ninetieth; it would have to be "cleaned up" and reequipped; and then, finally, when the peace pact is signed, the Thirty-sixth, if substituted for the Ninetieth at the extreme front, would probably be brought back over the route it would take going up, entailing over 400 miles double travel on the Thirty-sixth, while the time required to make such a change or substitution would probably run into months and accomplished at what might be a useless expense, when it is considered that there can hardly be any preference on the part of the people at home as to which of said divisions is released from military duty first.

In conclusion I wish to state and emphasize the statement, that I have been on the ground and given very careful thought as to what is right and proper for the people at home to do, or suggest being done, for the Texas-Oklahoma men constituting the two divisions in the American Expeditionary Forces and my own humble opinion is that the War Department has done all that has been reasonably possible to be done for the welfare of these troops. I believe that the department is worthy of commendation for having no worse conditions than now prevail with the 36th Division and I firmly believe that it would really be a mistake and waste of money and time to attempt to better existing conditions with that division so long as it is necessary for it to remain in France.

Climatic conditions do not give way to man's desires, therefore, rain and mud must be contended with and men on duty must be exposed to it and as long as the division exists the duties of the soldier must be performed, rain or shine. It is a wonder to me that fuel has been attainable and distributed as well as it has to the 36th, under existing circumstances.

The lice that torment and humiliate the men were acquired at the front, whence they were known to exist, even before the United States declared war, in uncountable billions, beyond the power of man to destroy and the millions of soldiers who have come back through France must have left these pests in most every billet in the interior of France that will perhaps require years of peace-time effort and equipment to eliminate.

Practically every acre of France is devoted to intensive farming, except just room enough for roads, canals, timber areas, villages and cities, so that, in the interior especially, it is not practicable to erect tents or barracks for Army camps; such camps would become quagmires and seas of mud even before completed, so that the billet even in barns and like buildings along or near macadamized roads or streets is far more preferable than tents or barracks in fields that become mud ponds.

The laws, customs, and habits of France are as firmly fixed upon the French people as are our laws, customs, and habits fixed upon us, and, while the French have certain wholesome regulations that have for their object the protection of the soldier from vice and intoxication, for the United States to undertake to remodel French laws, customs, and habits to even approximate those of Texas and Oklahoma would seem as ridiculous to the French people and government as would a proposal of France to have Texas and Oklahoma adopt French laws, customs, and habits.

It certainly does the heart of an American good to find, as I did, that every American soldier he meets abroad is more in love with "the dear old U. S. A." than ever before. I found no boasting among those who had been "in the thick of it"; in fact, was forced to patiently wait and listen to conversations between men who had been over the top, and among men who had dared as terrible dangers in getting supplies and munitions up to the trenches, to gain information as to what our men really did, and there I heard what would be termed, ordinarily, hair-raising experiences spoken of and somewhat detailed in a manner that impressed me that none of them felt that it was a matter to be exaggerated or treated in any other way than as a serious duty performed to the best of the ability of the participant, at a great cost of comrades, who "paid the last full measure of their devotion," and then to see these great, strong young fellows when the conversation would, as it always did, revert to home, to see them search for some little memento or photograph that would take their thoughts and hearts back across the ocean, and to know that, while none of them ever entertained a thought of shirking any duty due the homeland, how very earnestly, indeed, each one longed for the day when he could set his face toward the West under orders to return to the dearest place on earth, resolved me to lay their case before their home people and to say to their home people, "Be sure that those boys shall know that you exerted every honorable, patriotic effort to have them returned home just as soon as it was possible to spare them from overseas, and that a real welcome awaits them when they arrive."

I further suggest that every honorable effort be made immediately to see that Congress enacts the necessary legislation for a new Army to take the place of the men now overseas, and such a bill having been reported and well on its way, Congressmen and Senators should be induced to hasten its passage to the very utmost and to eliminate useless debate and red-tape procedure; in other words, let's show fully as much real zeal in getting our citizens home as we did in getting them overseas, and we shall have the everlasting praise of those citizens.

Respectfully,

R. E. JOHNSON.

On February 14, not having received any satisfactory reply from the War Department, I sent to the Secretary of War the following telegram:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 14, 1919.

Hon. NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.:

Since writing yours 11th will you kindly advise whether you have yet received the definite information concerning the Thirty-sixth Division requested in my letter 7th?

THOMAS L. BLANTON.

I have received from the Assistant Chief of Staff the following letter dated February 14, but which, as shown by the envelope, was not mailed by his department until February 17, four days later, wherein he attempts to answer in general terms the statement from Mr. Johnson, but he does not show that any information whatever has been received from France since my letter of February 7.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF STAFF,
Washington, February 14, 1919.

The Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: The Secretary of War directs that I acknowledge receipt of your letter of February 7, relative to the Thirty-sixth Division, and to inform you as follows:

The Thirty-sixth Division is located in one of the areas assigned by the French authorities for the occupancy of our troops. Each division is assigned an area of sufficient billeting capacity to accommodate it. The troops are housed in buildings or billets according to the universal European custom, and not in tents. According to the French custom, all the buildings which are fit for sheltering troops in each area have noted on them by the French authorities the number of officers, men, or animals that they are expected to accommodate. Officers very frequently are alloted beds, and in many cases the noncommissioned officers and privates. Frequently the accommodations in the areas are so limited that officers use their own camp cots, while at one town accommodations were sufficiently ample to assign rooms and beds in a hotel at a fashionable watering place to the privates.

It is true that the billeting accommodations in the area now occupied by the Thirty-sixth Division are not as extensive as those in some other areas, and it is true that an application to the French to add a fairly large town to this area was disapproved by them for reasons which appeared correct. There are many reasons connected with French internal administration which fix the limits of the billeting areas and their character depends entirely on the section of the country in which they are located. It has not been the practice for divisions to continually remain in one area, and no injustice or unnecessary hardship is inflicted on any division.

The mud can not be denied. It is everywhere. A mild winter, with incessant rain and dampness, has made the ground soft. The villages have no sidewalks and even on the hard, paved roads a slime of thin mud remains throughout the winter. Steps were taken at the headquarters of the corps to which the Thirty-sixth Division belongs to procure "duck boards" to lay on the ground in the muddiest places, by sending trucks to the depots of supply, and even far forward to the abandoned trenches, but no amount of "duck boards" can adequately combat the mud nuisance.

Such sickness as exists is chiefly attributable to the continued dampness and lack of sunshine. It is true that barns and outhouses are used, from necessity, as billets. The report that men are required to sleep in chicken houses conveys an exaggerated impression. Life in French villages is very primitive; steaming manure piles are in the streets and at the front doors of the houses, which are overrun with chickens, that have access to many buildings. Some buildings might appear to be chicken houses that actually are not.

In the matter of "cooties" every effort is made by encouraging bathing and the use of delousing machines to keep the men free from such vermin, which, of course, exist, though not to such an extent in the areas as at the front.

In regard to the men's getting home, it has been the fixed policy of the War Department to refrain from interfering with Gen. Pershing, who is given a free hand in designating the troops to return. This action is necessary because of the many problems still confronting him overseas, and were the War Department to embarrass him in the solution of these problems the result might be detrimental to the welfare of the country at large. Gen. Pershing has not yet designated the Thirty-sixth Division for return.

I trust that in my desire to furnish you a full and frank description of things as they exist I have not trespassed too much upon your time. It would be most desirable if the people of this country could realize the difficulties connected with bringing all the men home at once and, by counseling patience on the part of their loved ones, render the Nation a distinct service.

Sincerely, yours,

HENRY JERVEY,
Major General, United States Army,
Assistant Chief of Staff, Director of Operations.

I want to state that it does occur to me that when complaint is made by a Member of Congress to the War Department with respect to the conditions which surround a whole division of American soldiers in France, that complaint made on February 7 and this is February 19, that the War Department in that length of time could furnish some definite information concerning the condition of that camp. And I am making this criticism in the hope that the department will take some definite and immediate steps to see that these boys are given every care and every attention, and that the place will be surrounded by every comfort which the War Department is able to give to them.

I take it that these men hold us responsible in a way. We placed them there, and they are looking to us to see that they get proper treatment. No private over there is allowed to complain. We have learned by this time that if a private makes a complaint he is court-martialed. I am in favor of this Congress taking some steps to see that a private soldier in the Army can make a proper complaint to his Congressman, and that his Representative can go to the War Department and place the facts of that particular case before the War Department, and obtain justice for his constituent, without having that particular soldier drawn up and court-martialed and punished for it. If he can not look to his Representative, to whom can he look? His Representative is the only person on God's green earth to whom he can look for redress of any wrong, and I hope the War Department will take some action with respect to this Thirty-sixth Division. It is composed largely of Texas and Oklahoma volunteers, who have gone there willingly. As long as the war lasted they were willing to stand knee-deep in the mud, and fight in cootie-infested trenches, and bear all the hardships incident to cruel warfare; but now that the fighting is over, I do not think they should be billeted within 125 miles of Paris under the conditions acknowledged to exist in this camp.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That expenditures for carrying out the provisions of this act shall not be made in such manner as to prevent the operation of the Government arsenals at their most economical rate of production, except when a special exigency requires the operation of a portion of an arsenal's equipment at a different rate: Provided, That no part of the appropriations made in this act shall be available for the salary or pay of any officer, manager, superintendent, foreman, or other person having charge of the work of any employee of the United States Government while making or causing to be made with a stop watch or other time-measuring device a time study of any job of any such employee between the starting and completion thereof, or of the movements of any such employee while engaged upon such work.

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LUNN: Page 10, line 19, after the word "work" strike out the period and insert the following: "nor shall any part of the appropriations made in this act be available to pay any premium or bonus or cash reward to any employee in addition to his regular wages, except for suggestions resulting in improvements or economy in the operation of any Government plant."

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take up the time of the committee. This amendment is intended simply to make this act conform with the language adopted in the Army bill and recommended by the Committee on Military Affairs. If there is opposition, I want to speak upon the amendment at more length. I do not think there will be opposition.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I will simply state that this section of the bill as reported is exactly in the language carried in the fortifications act for the current year. The amendment of the gentleman from New York was not called to the attention of the subcommittee or to the attention of the full committee. There was no objection to the language as carried in the current law when the bill was passed at the preceding session of Congress.

Personally, I have no objection to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, but that is a matter to be left for the judgment of the House.

Mr. LUNN. A year ago, when the bill was introduced, the fortifications bill, it was a large bill, and I think it was passed in an hour's time. I understand this subject, and only half of it was covered in the bill of last year. I understand that the House wants to continue the same policy that they have followed for the last few years.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. LUNN. A division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 7, noes 14.

Mr. LUNN. I make the point of no quorum, Mr. Chairman. This is an important matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count.

Mr. LUNN. If there is any other way in which I can bring this to a vote of the House under the circumstances, I would take it, but there is no other way that I know of.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The gentleman can move to recommit the bill.

Mr. LUNN. I am not opposed to the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If any gentleman is opposed to it and says so, he has the preference; but if nobody qualifies to that extent, then the gentleman would have as much right to offer the motion to recommit as anybody else.

Mr. LUNN. I do not desire to consume the time of the committee or to make the point of no quorum, if there is any legislative way to have us continue as we have continued for years in this matter.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the gentleman will not make the point of no quorum, I will recognize him when we get back into the House, to make a motion to recommit, unless somebody qualifies up and down. [Applause.]

Mr. LUNN. I withdraw the point of no quorum.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 3, line 19, for the purpose of offering an amendment. I asked the chairman of the subcommittee about what time the general debate would close, and he said about half past 6. I got in here at a quarter after 6 and they had passed this section. I make that statement for the benefit of the committee. I have an amendment that I desire to offer. I trust the chairman of the committee will not object.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I take it, the gentleman does not mean to make the point of no quorum?

Mr. OVERSTREET. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to return to line 19, page 3, for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman offers his amendment, how much time does he propose to take on it?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Five or six minutes.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman take the vote in the committee here now?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. OVERSTREET: Page 3, line 18, after the figures "$544,000," insert: "For protection of the shores of Fort Screven, Ga., $160,000."

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of my amendment is to authorize the expenditure of the sum of $160,000 for protection of the shore of Fort Screven, Ga. The Chief of Staff of the Army has been informed that the Government reservation at this point was liable to great damage owing to the rapid encroachment of the sea, and ordered a survey and report to be submitted showing the true status of the matter. The local engineer recommended the expenditure of $160,000 for the purpose of protecting the shore against the washing of the waves, and further recommended that this sum be expended in the construction of jetties to be built in accordance with recommendations made in the report. At the hearing before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations Gen. Winslow, of the Board of Engineers, when asked if he considered this an important piece of work, replied that personally he had no opinion on the subject, as he had not seen it, but said that he simply knew the report showed the situation is considered very serious. Upon this statement alone of Gen. Winslow the committee struck this item out of the original draft of the bill. I desire it reinstated.

I respectfully submit, gentlemen of the House, that the item of $544,000 carried in this bill for the protection of the reservation at Sandy Hook is a parallel case with this, and if one is allowed the other should be allowed also. Gen. Winslow said he was not familiar with the Fort Screven project and could not recommend it for that reason. If it was necessary for Gen. Winslow to inspect the situation at Fort Screven in order for him to pass upon this question intelligently, then I submit it was his duty to visit Fort Screven and see for himself. As I have already stated, the local engineer's report shows something ought to be done to keep the shore from washing away, and therefore a prima facie case was made out in favor of the appropriation asked for in my amendment, and it was up to Gen. Winslow to negative this showing by a positive statement.

I have in my hand a memorandum furnished me by the Chief of Coast Artillery, and it shows that the value of the buildings alone at Fort Screven is $801,895, besides the land, armament, and other equipment, and it does seem to me, in view of all these facts, that the committee should adopt the amendment. In addition to this, I have recently received from the former mayor of Tybee a letter, in which he says the situation there is very serious, and unless something is done a large number of houses will soon be washed into the sea. He says a number of buildings have already been moved back, in some instances 50 and in some 100 yards to prevent their being washed away.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I happen to know something about Tybee Island and that encroachment. It seems to have been caused by the digging of a new channel on the south. It has changed the whole current there so that they do not know how to control it at all. I do not know whether jetties will take care of it.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Several years ago some jetties were constructed at Fort Screven or out some distance from the shore line. These jetties were built of rock of various sizes. Some of the stone used in the jetties proved to be too small to remain in place under the action of the sea. One of these jetties in particular, so the report shows, proved practically adequate for the purpose, and is now intact. And the local engineer recommends that new jetties be built of stone of no less size than the material used in the successful jetty referred to.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I understand that the new channel has caused such a change in the currents that they do not know how to control them.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I am not an engineer, and, of course, I do not know how best to control the situation the gentleman from New Jersey speaks of, but I desire the amendment adopted and I would suggest that the Government engineers will know best how to use the appropriation provided for in the amendment.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I am in sympathy with the gentleman so far as the situation at Fort Screven is concerned, but the committee felt that it had not sufficient information on it to submit a recommendation to the House. Gen. Winslow said positively he had no knowledge of the matter and he only relied upon the report furnished him; that he personally knew nothing whatever about it. Under the circumstances the committee felt it could not recommend to the House the appropriation of $160,000 at Fort Screven.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I wish to say in reply to the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee and the chairman of the subcommittee, that the report shows only two questions were asked Gen. Winslow. He said personally he did not know because he had not visited Fort Screven, and when asked if it needed protection he said the report shows the condition was very serious.

I sincerely hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, the amendment is to put in an item of $160,000 for the repair of this sea wall at Fort Screven. The only person that appeared before the subcommittee was Gen. Winslow, and he said he knew absolutely nothing about it. He brought certain photographs to show us the condition and a report made by an officer detailed there, and the officer says in this report:

I very recently made a visit and noticed the effect of the high tide while there was a strong east wind and considerable sea.

And then he says:

The photographs show a worse condition than that which actually existed.

Which convinced the committee that conditions were improving instead of getting worse; that the tide was bringing in the sand and doing just the very thing that the appropriation of this money would do, and that was to protect the island. There is no use in throwing away $160,000. The item was not urged very strongly by the War Department itself.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. OVERSTREET) there were 8 ayes and 18 noes.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers are demanded.

Four Members rose, not a sufficient number, and tellers were refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to section 4 and allow me to place in the stop-watch provision the language I have heretofore offered, and which was adopted by the Military Affairs Committee. If the chairman objects, I do not want to force a roll call.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. I object.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House without amendment, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CLARK of Florida, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 15979, the fortifications appropriation bill, and had directed him to report the same back without amendment, with the recommendation that the bill be passed.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. OVERSTREET, by unanimous consent, was given leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 51 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, February 20, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting supplemental estimate of appropriation, required by the National Bank Redemption Agency of the Office of the Treasurer of the United States, for additional force for the last four months of the current fiscal year and for the fiscal year 1920, the same to be reimbursed by the banks (H. Doc. No. 1818); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of War, submitting an estimate of appropriation to pay a claim for damages by collision, river and harbor work, which has been adjusted and settled by the Chief of Engineers, United States Army (H. Doc. No. 1819); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of Labor, transmitting an item of repeal of certain appropriations for housing war needs, together with an authorization in connection therewith, for incorporation in the sundry civil act (H. Doc. No. 1820); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 20, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we call upon Thy name because we are seekers after the truth. We are not afraid of the truth. With all our splendid traditions and all our inheritance of faith and character, with a passion that God has given to us out of the past for the things that are highest, we are not afraid to face the truth. We pray that that equipment for service that comes from the God of Truth may be given to each one of us that we may perform our duties as in the sight of God and receive Thy blessing upon a service well done. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. VARDAMAN and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. LEWIS. The senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] is absent on important public business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 195) providing for the filling of a proximate vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than Members of Congress, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 15979) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, and for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further transmitted to the Senate resolutions on the life, character, and public services of Hon. JAMES H. DAVIDSON, late a Representative from the State of Wisconsin.

The message also transmitted to the Senate resolutions on the life, character, and public services of Hon. WILLIAM A. JONES, late a Representative from the State of Virginia.

The message further transmitted to the Senate resolutions on the life, character, and public services of Hon. EDWARD E. ROBBINS, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania.

The message also transmitted to the Senate resolutions on the life, character, and public services of Hon. JOSHUA F. C. TALBOTT, late a Representative from the State of Maryland.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have petitions signed by over 5,000 citizens of the State of Washington urging the passage of the bill which I introduced to deport alien slackers. In connection with these petitions I wish to read an extract from a telegram which I received from one of the principal draft officers in our State, in which, among other things, he says:

State Department now trying interfere with our legislature passing bill prohibiting alien slackers in public offices.

It seems to me that the State Department is going a long ways out of the way to prevent the action of the legislature in matters of this kind.

I present these petitions and ask that they be referred to the Committee on Immigration, which, I hope, will take action as soon as possible in reference to the measure.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The petitions will be so referred.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I present a petition signed by about 45 citizens of South Dakota relating to the maintenance of the guaranteed price of wheat. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Farm, Stock and Home.]

WHEAT FARMERS MAY HOLD THE BAG.

There is a great deal of fog in the public mind about the guaranteed wheat price for 1919. The presidential proclamation set the price for all wheat grown in the United States during the year 1919 that is delivered prior to June 1, 1920, at $2.20, Chicago. This was subsequently revised to $2.26 to offset the raise in freight rates.

So far all is well, but unless Congress acts quickly and makes provision for the continuance of the United States Grain Corporation there will be no means of carrying out this guaranty. This statement has been questioned, but under date of December 27 Secretary Houston wrote:

"Up to this time no agency of the United States has been created and charged with the duty of making effective the guaranteed price under this proclamation.

"The carrying out of the guaranteed price of wheat 'harvested in the United States during the year 1919 and offered for sale before the 1st day of June, 1920,' fixed by the President's proclamation of September 2, 1918, in pursuance of the direction of the act of Congress of August 10, 1917, presents a much more difficult situation, of which Congress should be advised, and such agencies should be created and appropriations made, by Congress, as will insure the carrying out of the guaranteed price 'to every producer of wheat,' in its integrity."

There is a very strong effort being made, through telling how much carrying out this guaranty is going to cost, to induce Congress to let the necessary legislation go by default. "The only weekly farm paper in Minnesota" is aiding these efforts by parrotlike repetition of these statements. Farm, Stock and Home sent the following telegram to farm papers in the big winter wheat sections:

"Secretary Houston says unless Congress acts 1919 wheat price guaranty can not be carried out. This is most vital to your section, where wheat is already sown. We are sounding the alarm and asking subscribers to sign demand for legislation. Quick work vital."

Now, then, it is up to each farmer to personally offset the vicious propaganda that is being carried on to defeat the wheat price guaranty by protesting to Congress. There are only 48 days left of the present session of Congress from the date of this issue of Farm, Stock and Home. Send this petition when filled out to Farm, Stock and Home, and we will do the rest.

Do it to-day.

H. N. OWEN,
Publisher Farm, Stock and Home, Minneapolis, Minn.

I demand that Congress pass the necessary legislation to carry out the terms of the President's proclamation on the guaranteed wheat price for 1919.

Chairman securing these names will please sign his name here:
Name, N. G. Brito.
Post office, New Effington.
State, South Dakota.

Mr. SPENCER. I present a petition of the officers of the National Shakespeare Federation, praying for the appointment of a commission to secure a site and perfect the plans for a national Shakespeare peace memorial in the city of Washington, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on the Library.

The petition is as follows:

Petition to the Senate of the United States.

We, the undersigned, officers of the National Shakespeare Federation, hereby respectfully petition the Congress for the enactment of a law providing for a commission to secure a site and perfect the plans for a national Shakespeare peace memorial in the city of Washington, D. C., to commemorate the services and perpetuate the memory of the men and women who gave service or their lives in the defense of liberty and the cause of justice in the great war.

The said commission to consist of the following: The President of the United States, the chairman of the Senate Committee on the Library and the chairman of the House Committee on the Library, the Secretary of War, and the president of the National Shakespeare Association.

The construction of the national Shakespeare peace memorial building to be upon such a site and at such cost as shall be determined by the commission and approved by the Congress.

Respectfully submitted.

JOHN TEMPLE GRAVES,
President.
MARY E. CRAIGIE,
First Vice President.
H. H. WHEATON,
Corresponding Secretary.
H. D. FRUIT,
Chairman of Library Committee.

Mr. MOSES presented resolutions adopted by the congregation of the Union Church of South Wolfeboro; of the congregation of the South Parish, of Charlestown; and of the Review Club, of Manchester, all in the State of New Hampshire, favoring the establishment of a league of nations, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the faculty of the State Normal School, of Plymouth, N. H., praying for the establishment of a department of education, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of the Central Labor Union of Portsmouth, N. H., praying for the continuation of the United States Employment Service, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a number of petitions from various counties in Illinois on the subject of the importation of corn. I ask that the body of one be printed in the RECORD and that the others be merely noted.

The body of the petition is as follows:

ARGENTINE CORN PROTEST.

FEBRUARY 13, 1919.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

The undersigned growers of corn desire to direct your attention to the injustice which is being done to American farmers through the importation, free from duty, of corn from Argentina. The present tariff, going into effect October 3, 1913, placed corn upon the free list. In the first nine months following that date there was imported 11,843,193 bushels of corn, of which 11,123,281 bushels came from Argentina. This corn found a market along our Atlantic and Gulf seaboard, thereby displacing from our own domestic market an equal amount of American-grown corn. The effect of this invasion of the American market by Argentine corn is shown by the fact that in September, 1913, cash corn sold in Chicago as high as 78¼ cents and in the following February as low as 61 cents. The world war then came on and so disorganized all world commerce and shipping that but little corn could be brought in while it continued. In December, 1918, however, the Food Administration removed all restrictions against the importation of Argentine corn, and the price of American corn declined 15 cents a bushel upon the mere threat of renewal of Argentine imports.

Under normal conditions of ocean shipping corn can be brought from Argentina to New York or New Orleans at no greater cost of transportation than the present rail cost of shipping it by rail from central Illinois to the same points. It follows, therefore, that American farmers, in order to hold the seaboard markets of this country, must be prepared to sell their corn at as low a first price as can the Argentine farmer. The injustice is manifest when it is recalled that it has always been the policy of the United States to so maintain its tariffs as to prevent home competition upon a basis that reduces the American scale of living. Argentina, by reason of low wages and the low scale of living of its farm labor, can produce corn at a figure with which we can not compete except by a similar lowering of wages and standards of living.

The undersigned respectfully urge that the tariff duty of 6 cents per bushel be restored upon corn.

Mr. SHERMAN presented memorials of sundry citizens of Streator, Mineral, Grand Ridge, Sheffield, and Ransom, all in the State of Illinois, remonstrating against the importation free of duty of corn from Argentina, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of sundry employees of Rock Island Arsenal, Ill., praying that the Government manufacture in its own shops the equipment, etc., used in the War, Navy, mercantile marine, Postal Service, etc., instead of letting large contracts to private concerns and corporations, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LODGE presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Lowell, Mass., praying that the return to private ownership of the telephone and telegraph lines be deferred until Congress shall have studied the question and determined upon a safe procedure to be followed in the future, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of the Board of Aldermen of Somerville, Mass., praying for the establishment of a league of nations, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a memorial of the Sunday School of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Romulus, Mich., remonstrating against the proposed prohibition on importation of various kinds of trees, shrubs, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Kalamazoo, Mich., praying for the proposed five-year extension of Federal control of railroads, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Middleville Brotherhood, of Middleville, Mich., praying for the granting of six months' additional pay to honorably discharged soldiers and sailors, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the local draft board for Oceana County, Mich., praying for the deportation of those aliens who, in order to escape military service, dropped their first citizenship papers, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of North Star, Mich., praying for the establishment of a league of nations, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Adrian, Mich., remonstrating against the establishment of a department of education, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of Local Grange No. 67, Patrons of Husbandry, of Charlotte, Mich., praying for national prohibition, which was ordered to lie on the table.

WORK OF THE PHILIPPINE LEGISLATURE.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I have here a report of the Acting Governor General of the Philippine Islands concerning the action of the Legislature of the Philippine Islands in which a review is made of the excellent work that has been done by those legislative bodies. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MANILA, February 12, 1919.

SECRETARY OF WAR,
Washington, D. C.:

February 10. Yesterday morning the regular session of the Philippine Legislature was ended, and it is with great satisfaction that I am able to inform you that the labors realized during this session will be of great and lasting value to this country and unsurpassed by any previous session in their permanent influence upon its general welfare. Anticipating detailed information of all the legislation just enacted, which will be forwarded later, I desire to call your attention to some of the most important measures adopted, and to the spirit and character shown by the legislature during the last two years. The most important measure, in my judgment, is that by which over ₱30,000,000 was appropriated for the extension of universal free education to all the children of the islands. This act is of prime importance, not only because it provides funds for a term of years sufficient to extend a primary education of seven grades to all the children of school age but also because it enables the bureau of education to prepare and carry into execution a complete and systematic development of the existing excellent educational plan which lacked only extension over the entire field. Furthermore, it is a means of incalculable value for the welfare of the Filipino people, since it will banish illiteracy, establish permanently English as the common language of the land, afford a firm foundation for democratic institutions, and insure order and stability to the insular government. The adoption of this thoroughly American educational measure will tend greatly to lift the moral responsibility incumbent on the United States to secure a firm and orderly government, and aside from the differences of opinion which may have existed among American statesmen in the past, it has been advocated by all Americans from the beginning of the occupation that universal free education of the masses should be an essential characteristic of our national policy in the Philippines. Inasmuch as when Congress considered paragraph 2, the acts of July 1, 19, and of August 29, 1916, much discussion was had about the political capacity of the Filipinos, I feel that I discharge a duty of conscience to call your attention to the fact that this enlightened measure was passed by the legislative department of the government, which, as you know, is composed entirely of Filipinos. By this law of universal free education the all-Philippine Legislature in the last two years has provided for doubling the quantity of the educational work effected in almost two decades of previous American occupation. Under the financial support previously given, it was necessary to turn away from the doors of the schoolhouses one-half of all the children of the islands. In five years all the children of the land will receive educational advantages. Besides this, the salaries of all municipal teachers will be increased 30 per cent. In addition, I direct attention to the fact that at the session of 1917–18 two normal schools were established and 2 more were established at the session just adjourned, all to be located by the secretary of public instruction, making, with 2 already existing, 6 such schools; also 4 agricultural schools were established in the session of 1917–18 and 3 more this year, making 17 in all. The College of Agriculture has just had its appropriation largely increased and an experiment station has been established in connection with it. The appropriation of this year for the university far exceeds any former appropriation. In addition to all this, the appropriation to the bureau of education for this current calendar year exceeds by ₱3,000,000 any former appropriation. Furthermore, legislative appropriation was made for pensioning 150 young men and women to be trained as specialists in the colleges of America and elsewhere, and they are expected to sail on August next. The heroic and unselfish work of American teachers, many of whom lost life or health, deserves, and should receive, the very highest praise, but it would be particularly unjust and unfair for me, as head of the department of public instruction, not to recognize and make known the work of Filipinos in this regard. Of the present teaching force of over 14,000 less than 3 per cent are Americans. The number of American teachers is gradually growing less as Filipino teachers are trained to take the important positions which they held.

Other important laws just passed provide for the increase of food products which, strange to say, in this land of wonderful soil wealth, are imported in large quantities from abroad; also legislation was effected for a geological survey of what are considered commercial oil fields, for the extension of the lines of the Government Railroad Co., for the revision of the internal-revenue law, with a view of making more effective its provisions, for the establishment of a Philippine income tax, for the extension to the mountain Province of the existing provincial and municipal organizations hitherto extended to Mindanao and Sulu, for constituting a metropolitan district for the extension and conservation for the water supply for Manila, and for a comprehensive sewer system. In addition, an appropriation was made for the erection of a mausoleum at the grave of William A. Jones in Virginia to express the grateful memory of the Filipino people for his generous and altruistic services to this country. With the object of organizing the production of the islands, developing its natural resources, establishing new industries, and, in general, stabilizing prices and making a fair market for the raw and manufactured products of the Archipelago, the legislature passed, by a unanimous vote in both houses, a law creating the National Development Co., with a capital of ₱50,000,000, of which the Governor General will be the chairman of the board of control; also a law was passed extending to June 30 next the time in the Osmeña Retirement Act, with the object of including in its benefits all employees, mostly Americans; some of these employees had continued until now in the public service and were in such service at the time of the passage of the original act, but did not then resort to the law, preferring to continue, and others had not served the time specified, so that they were unable to take advantage of it. Many faithful employees of the government had requested this, as expressed by memorials, and this action of the Philippine Legislature is a generous manifestation of its appreciation of the valuable services rendered the government by Americans. There are other important measures which will be duly reported.

The capacity for initiative and the constructive spirit evidenced by the legislature, the first organized under the Jones law, is worthy of great commendation. Its capacity to investigate government problems and to act expeditiously, but with due caution, is certainly unprecedented in history, considering that for three centuries this people had practically no political rights and were debarred from the benefits of education. American legislative practice and procedure has always been examined and with few exceptions followed. As indicative, however, of their independent frame of mind, it may be noted that a single legislative committee has had charge of both appropriations and ways and means since 1907, and under the provisions of the Jones law has adopted substantially the basic principles of the English budget system, instead of maintaining a rigorous application of the theory of the separation of governmental powers as far as the legislative and executive departments are concerned, the latter directed by an American. This legislature has given to the secretaries of the various departments the right to appear before either house to defend publicly the measures proposed by the executive or to oppose measures originated in such houses. Finally, as one of the representatives in these islands of the United States, I wish to attest the patriotism of the Filipinos and their loyal attachment to the United States Government. This legislature, which has just terminated its sessions, has acted with judgment and prudence in what it has done and left undone during its term now drawing to a close, and should be credited for the wisdom with which it has guided and directed the Filipino people in the paths of order and tranquillity during these recent years of almost universal turmoil and unrest. Perfect peace prevailed here, and all provincial and municipal government instrumentalities of force have had no function to perform.

YEATER,
Acting Governor General.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 5566) for the relief of the claimants of certain unsurveyed lands in Mississippi County, Ark. (Rept. No. 746); and

A bill (H. R. 12082) authorizing the sale of certain lands in South Dakota for cemetery purposes (Rept. No. 745).

Mr. HITCHCOCK, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, to which was referred the bill (S. 5512) to amend the Federal farm-loan act, approved July 17, 1916, reported it without amendment (Rept. No. 748).

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill (S. 5555) to amend the war-risk insurance act, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 749) thereon.

INDIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. ASHURST. I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to report back favorably, with amendments, the bill (H. R. 14746) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and I submit a report (No. 747) thereon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

TOMBIGBEE RIVER BRIDGE, MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I wish to report two bills from the Committee on Commerce, and I shall ask unanimous consent for their immediate consideration. They are local bills for Mississippi, and they have the approval of the department.

First, from the Committee on Commerce, I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 14555) granting the consent of Congress to the board of supervisors of Itawamba County, Miss., to construct a bridge across the Tombigbee River at or near Barrs Ferry, in said county, and I submit a report (No. 736) thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the board of supervisors of Itawamba County, Miss., and their successors in office, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Tombigbee River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Barrs Ferry, in the county of Itawamba, in the State of Mississippi, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PORT OF GULFPORT, MISS.

Mr. VARDAMAN. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 5999) for the establishment of Gulfport, Miss., as a port of entry and delivery for immediate transportation without appraisement of dutiable merchandise, and I submit a report (No. 737) thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the privileges of the first and seventh sections of the act approved June 10, 1880, governing the immediate transportation of dutiable merchandise without appraisement be, and are hereby, extended to the port of Gulfport, Miss.

Mr. SMOOT. From what committee is that bill reported?

Mr. VARDAMAN. From the Commerce Committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Similar bills in the past have always gone to the Finance Committee. I do not know why this bill should have gone to another committee.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I am not familiar with the custom in reference to the matter.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that every bill creating a port of entry of which I have known has been referred to the Finance Committee. However, I am not going to object.

Mr. NELSON. I will say that, while I do not know what the custom now is, I know that for many years, during the time I was chairman of that committee, such bills were referred to and reported by the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SMOOT. They may have been referred to two separate committees; and so I make no objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MAHONING RIVER BRIDGE, OHIO.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 12995) granting the consent of Congress to the Youngstown Sheet and Tube Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a combined bridge and dam across the Mahoning River, in the State of Ohio, and I submit a report (No. 744) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONNECTICUT RIVER BRIDGE, MASSACHUSETTS.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 13369) to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across the Connecticut River, between Springfield and West Springfield, in Hampden County, Mass., and I submit a report (No. 743) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 13393) to revive and reenact the act entitled, "An act to authorize the city of South Sioux City, in the State of Nebraska, to construct a bridge across the Missouri River between the States of Nebraska and Iowa," approved April 22, 1912, and I submit a report (No. 742) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MONONGAHELA RIVER BRIDGE, PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 13427) granting the consent of Congress to the county of Allegheny, Pa., to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Monongahela River at or near the borough of Wilson, in the county of Allegheny, in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and I submit a report (No. 741) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OHIO RIVER BRIDGE, PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 13647) granting the consent of Congress to the county of Allegheny, Pa., to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Ohio River at or near McKees Rocks Borough, in the county of Allegheny, in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and I submit a report (No. 740) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALLEGHENY RIVER BRIDGE, PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 13648) granting the consent of Congress to the county of Allegheny, Pa., to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Allegheny River at or near Millvale Borough, in the county of Allegheny, in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and I submit a report (No. 739) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALLEGHENY RIVER BRIDGE AT PITTSBURGH.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 13649) granting the consent of Congress to the county of Allegheny, Pa., to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Allegheny River at or near Sixteenth Street, in the city of Pittsburgh, county of Allegheny, in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and I submit a report (No. 738) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. NELSON:

A bill (S. 5642) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the Fort Ridgely State Park, Minn., three captured German cannon or fieldpieces;

A bill (S. 5643) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to Waldorf, Minn., a captured German siege mortar; and

A bill (S. 5644) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate captured German cannons or fieldpieces to the municipalities of Mankato, Chisholm, and Wright, in the State of Minnesota; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 5645) for the relief of Charles W. Johnson; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SHERMAN:

A bill (S. 5646) to purchase a painting of Abraham Lincoln; to the Committee on the Library.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. McKELLAR. I introduce a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Woman Suffrage.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 226) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Woman Suffrage, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article be proposed to the legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of said legislatures, shall be valid as part of said Constitution, namely:

"ARTICLE ——.

"SECTION 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote in any State, the legislature of which shall have voted for the ratification or adoption of this article of, or amendment to, the Constitution of the United States, shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex: Provided, That no married woman shall be entitled to vote who would not be so entitled if she were a single woman.

"SEC. 2. Congress shall have power, by appropriate legislation, to enforce the provisions of this article."

AMENDMENTS TO ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CALDER submitted an amendment providing that all retired officers of the Army who have been on active duty throughout the past emergency shall be promoted to the rank to which their length of service entitles them, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment relative to enlistments in the National Guard, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—CHARLES ST. JOHN NEELD.

Mr. POMERENE. On December 11, 1918, I introduced a special pension bill (S. 5173) granting a pension to Charles St. John Neeld. The young man has since died, and I want to request the return of the papers that were filed with the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. No adverse report was made on it?

Mr. POMERENE. I do not believe any report was made on the bill; but I shall have to verify that, as I am not sure about it.

Mr. SMOOT. If no adverse report was made on it, the order is all right.

Mr. POMERENE. I will have to inquire about it.

Mr. POMERENE subsequently said:

If I may have the attention of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], I wish to say that I have made inquiry about the bill to which I called the attention of the Senate a moment ago and I find that no report whatsoever has been made upon it.

Mr. SMOOT. Then there can be no objection whatever to the withdrawal of the papers.

Mr. POMERENE. I ask for the adoption of an order to withdraw the papers.

The order was reduced to writing and agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw from the files of the Senate the papers accompanying the bill (S. 5173) granting a pension to Charles St. John Neeld, no adverse report having been made thereon.

ENLISTMENTS IN THE ARMY.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5279) to authorize the resumption of voluntary enlistments in the Regular Army, and for other purposes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House and request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. HITCHCOCK, and Mr. WARREN conferees on the part of the Senate.

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5038) extending the use of the special fund for vocational education provided by section 7 of the vocational rehabilitation act, approved June 27, 1918, and authorizing the Federal Board for Vocational Education to accept gifts and donations for specific purposes, which were, on page 1, line 5, to strike out "is" and insert "together with the items of appropriation made by said act, are". On page 2, line 2, after "employment," to insert "and for supplementing any or all of the other items of appropriation made by said act"; on page 2, to strike out lines 3 to 19, inclusive, and to amend the title to read as follows: "An act extending the use of the special fund for vocational education provided by section 7 of the vocational rehabilitation act, approved June 27, 1918, and for other purposes."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I have conferred with a number of the members of the Committee on Education and Labor, to whom this bill and the House amendments were referred, and while we regret that the House has stricken out the provision which broadened the opportunity of gifts to this fund, we think, in view of the advanced time of the session, that it is best not to ask for a conference, but to concur in the action of the other House in amending the bill. I therefore move that the Senate concur in the House amendments.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I shall have to ask the Senator from Georgia to explain the House amendments or else I shall have to ask that the bill be read as proposed to be amended.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to have the bill read as proposed to be amended.

Mr. SMOOT. I certainly do not understand what effect those amendments will have upon the bill itself, and I therefore ask that the bill be read as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill as it will stand with the House amendments.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I desire—that the bill shall be read as it will stand with the House amendments.

The Secretary read the bill as proposed to be amended, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the special fund for vocational education, authorized by section 7 of the vocational rehabilitation act, approved June 27, 1918, together with the items of appropriation made by said act, are hereby made available, in addition to the purposes therein prescribed, for such other expenses as in the discretion of the board is deemed necessary and proper for the payment of necessary travel, lodging, subsistence, and other expenses of disabled men while under investigation by the board to determine their eligibily for training under the act, and the purchase of supplies, equipment, and clothing for disabled men when ready to enter employment, and the traveling expenses of such men to place of employment, and for supplementing any or all of the other items of appropriation made by said act.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the House amendments.

The amendments were concurred in.

REGENT OF SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 195) providing for the filling of a proximate vacancy in the Board of Regents in the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than Members of Congress, which were, in line 5, to strike out "will occur" and insert "occurred"; and to amend the title so as to read: "Joint resolution providing for the filling of a vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, of the class other than Members of Congress."

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 15979. An act making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, and for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

OIL AND GAS LANDS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there concurrent or other resolutions? [A pause.] Morning business is closed.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the bill (S. 2812) to encourage and promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2812) to encourage and promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, this bill has passed the Senate three times. It has passed the House of Representatives three times.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, this is such an important measure that I should very much like to hear the speech of the Senator from Nevada, but there is so much confusion on the floor that we can not hear him.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I consider this bill of great importance. I desire to make a brief statement with regard to the conference report. I assume that the Senate will support the bill as it passed this body, unless it has been changed to such an extent that it is contrary to the sentiment of the Senate.

Let me say at the start that I think there is some misunderstanding with regard to the conference report; and as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] has been kind enough to indicate his interest in the matter, I desire to say that I shall welcome any question that he may propound to me with regard to the subject.

As I have heretofore said, this bill has passed the Senate three times, and it has passed the House three times, but this is the first time that the two bodies have ever been able to get together in an agreement.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KENYON. But the bill has not passed either the House or the Senate in the form in which it is now presented to us, has it?

Mr. PITTMAN. I really do not understand what the Senator means.

Mr. KENYON. I mean that as it passed the House it was entirely a leasing proposition, was it not?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. And as it is presented to us now it is not only a leasing proposition, but a sale proposition. Now, what is the difference between the form in which the bill passed the House and the form in which it passed the Senate?

Mr. PITTMAN. I will try to explain it. If I should answer the question asked by the Senator by "yes" or "no," it would be misunderstood. I will say frankly at the start that, so far as coal lands are concerned, the Senate provided for either the sale or the leasing; that, so far as oil lands are concerned, the Senate provided solely for the leasing of oil lands, and the House provided solely for the leasing of oil lands. The conferees have agreed upon the provisions of the Senate bill for the sale or leasing of coal lands. Does that answer the question of the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. KENYON. I do not know that it does exactly. The Senator made the statement that this bill had passed the House and also had passed the Senate, I think he said, two or three times. I do not understand that the bill, as it is embodied in the conference report now as the result of the conference, ever passed either House until the conference report was adopted by the House.

Mr. PITTMAN. The bill now before the Senate as embodied in the conference report is substantially the same as the first bill that passed the House of Representatives.

Mr. KENYON. That answers part of my question. Then has a bill ever passed the Senate practically identical with that passed by the House?

Mr. PITTMAN. Not identical. The bill that passed the Senate, to be frank with the Senator from Iowa, was what might be considered more favorable to claimants of oil lands under prior laws. That was the only difference. Both bills, so far as oil, sodium, phosphate, and the other minerals with regard to which it deals are concerned, are leasing propositions; in other words, with the exception of coal, the principle of leasing, thus reserving to the Government the control, is maintained in the bill. As to coal, it was urged upon the Senate that there were 44,000,000 acres of coal land; that there was a surplus of coal; that it required a great deal of money to develop coal; and that the leasing system would not develop it. Consequently there was an optional provision placed in the bill that coal lands might be either purchased or leased, at the option of the person desiring to develop the coal lands, limiting the amount, however, that may be purchased.

Mr. KENYON. That was placed there by the conferees?

Mr. PITTMAN. No, sir; it was placed there by the Senate. The reason for that was this: It was contended before the Senate at the time that provision was adopted that the existing law failed to develop the coal lands of this country, resulting in a monopoly in favor of those who have coal lands. Why? Because coal lands had to be sold at a price fixed by appraisers, and that appraisement was fixed by geologists, and those geologists in every case, having a total disregard to the business conditions, fixed a price so high that nobody ever wanted to buy the land.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, under the provisions of this conference report that same practice is to be followed, is it not?

Mr. PITTMAN. No, sir.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like the Senator to point out why it will not be followed. There is no change whatever in the existing practice of the department made by this conference report.

Mr. PITTMAN. Possibly the Senator will save me time by showing where the report does that.

Mr. SMOOT. I will show the Senator, Mr. President, where it does.

Mr. PITTMAN. It is very kind of the Senator to do that; but it is not the case.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator say in a word how a sale of the coal under the pending conference report is to take place?

Mr. PITTMAN. With pleasure, as the Senator desires to have that information. Under the existing law with regard to coal—and the House reenacted the sale clause of the existing law with regard to coal—it is provided that 160 acres of coal land may be sold to a citizen at not less than the appraised value. Is that clear? Under the pending bill it is provided that coal lands may not be sold for less than a certain price, but at a price fixed by competitive bidding. That is the distinction.

Mr. SMOOT. But all of it can be——

Mr. PITTMAN. I am coming to that; I want this point made clear, and then I will come to that.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well.

Mr. PITTMAN. The distinction is this: Do not for one moment think that the House ever passed a bill that did not provide for the sale of coal lands. That has been charged, but it is not true. The House provided for the sale of coal lands—no one will deny that—and they provided for the sale of coal lands under the existing law at the appraised value. The pending measure provides for the sale of coal lands at the value established by competitive bidding; that is the only distinction. Now, what is the difference? In one case a geologist fixes a price which is impracticable; in the other case, business men fix the price by competitive bidding. I know what is in the mind of the Senator from Iowa—and it was in the mind of the committee—that there might not be fair competition in the bidding; it is possible that the real value might not be determined by that method; but there is reserved in the very act that the Secretary may refuse to accept any bids which he considers unfair.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator's conception of the word "unfair" as used in this report.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, "unfair" is a word that has been used in connection with every condition of life. I have heard of businesses that were unfair. I have heard of enterprises that were unfair. I have heard every character of enterprise of life spoken of in that connection as unfair. I think it is the broadest term, if the Senator will permit me—and I understand the reason of his question—that can be used.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, does the Senator then think that the word "unfair" in his definition would be synonymous with the word "unreasonable"?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do.

Mr. LENROOT. In other words, a bid might be entirely fair, so far as good faith is concerned; but, if the Secretary should be of the opinion that the land was worth more than the bid, under this language does the Senator think that he could reject the bid?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do; and I will say frankly to the Senator from Wisconsin that such was the idea of the committee. Every member of the committee, as I understand—and I think the Senator from Utah will bear me out—mentioned that very subject, that in the end the Secretary of the Interior could say that any bid was unfair to the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator, I think, states that correctly as far as the members of the committee are concerned; but that very fact goes to allow the Secretary of the Interior to reject any bid that may be made, in case it does not conform to the report made by a geologist in his department as to the value of the coal land. In other words, in my State we have coal land valued at $475 an acre. That land can be put up by competitive bidding for sale; and, supposing that it was a fair competitive bidding, and the highest bidder bid $300 an acre, the Secretary of the Interior has a perfect right to reject that bid.

Mr. PITTMAN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly what is stated in this bill. Therefore, Mr. President, while the wording is entirely different from the present law, the result of the competitive bidding is exactly the same, because the Secretary of the Interior has a perfect right to reject any and all bids.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I have the very highest respect for the opinion of the Senator from Utah with regard to these matters, but I am compelled to differ with him in regard to the construction. While it is true that the Secretary of the Interior may use his discretion to refuse to make any sale, there is a distinction in this, that under the old law he was arbitrarily bound by the determination of one witness, the appraiser, while under the present law he may accept the testimony of a dozen witnesses in forming his opinion as to the value. That is the distinction.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. PITTMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to read a telegram that I received this morning from the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN]. I suppose he sent it to me with the idea that I should acquaint the Senate with his view upon the pending matter. He wires:

Regret my unavoidable absence, as I am much interested in oil-lands leasing bill, a compromise measure which will be accepted by operators as a settlement and help to restore normal industrial conditions. May I not ask you to be present and consider it when called up by Senator PITTMAN to-morrow, Thursday, immediately on convening of Senate?

I thought it was fair to the Senator from California for everybody to know his views upon the subject, as everybody knows how active he has been in connection with this sort of legislation.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, may I have the attention of the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Wisconsin? I am particularly interested right now, before I pass from this statement, to have the attention of the Senators, because if I am in error or if I have misunderstood anything I want their correction.

I take it that the present bill does not change existing law with regard to coal, except in this respect, that under the existing law the Secretary is bound by the appraisement of a geologist, and under the proposed law he accepts the evidence of the geologist.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator whether under the existing law he is bound, except as he chooses to be bound, by the appraised value? The only thing there is in the existing law is the minimum price.

Mr. PITTMAN. He is bound just exactly as the Senator has stated.

Mr. LENROOT. But the minimum is fixed in the law at the same rate that is fixed in this proposed legislation.

Mr. PITTMAN. But there is a further proviso that it shall not be sold for less than the appraised value.

Mr. LENROOT. I think the Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. PITTMAN. I think not.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; the Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I know, from my own investigation, that there have been coal lands sold in my State for less than the appraised value. It has been brought about by a compromise between the purchasers and the Secretary of the Interior. I have never objected to that, and I do not object to it now. All that I stated in the first place was that the result of this provision is exactly the same as existing law.

Mr. PITTMAN. Oh, well, Mr. President, I will accept the statement of the Senator that it is the same as existing law, because it is not a material section of the bill. If it is the same as existing law, it is the same as the House provision. I think it is a little more flexible; but whether it is or whether it is not, it is not a material provision.

Now, as to the oil.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, before the Senator passes from the coal-land provisions, he stated, as I understood him, that the coal-land section of the conference report was the same as the bill passed by the Senate.

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. I want to ask the Senator whether, in both the Senate bill and the House substitute, so far as leasing is concerned, the Territory of Alaska was not excluded?

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I understand the purpose of the Senator's question, of course; and therefore I might as well answer it directly without waiting.

The bill passed by the Senate included Alaska. The bill passed by the House expressly included Alaska in the leasing provision. Nine out of ten of the conferees—and the conferees of the House represented the progressive element of the Congress—voted to include Alaska, and I will tell you why. Listen to this letter——

Mr. LENROOT. Before the Senator reads that——

Mr. PITTMAN. I am going to tell you why.

Mr. LENROOT. I want to ask the Senator a preliminary question. By what authority did the conferees include Alaska?

Mr. PITTMAN. I have already stated by what authority—because the bill provided for the leasing or disposition of all coal and oil lands of the United States.

Mr. LENROOT. Outside of Alaska.

Mr. PITTMAN. Not in the Senate bill.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, I have it here.

Mr. PITTMAN. Well, then, I will ask the Senator to read it.

Mr. LENROOT (reading)—

That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to lease any deposits of coal or lignite owned by the United States, outside of the Territory of Alaska——

Mr. PITTMAN. In the Senate bill?

Mr. LENROOT. That is the Senate bill. The House bill reads:

That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to, and upon the petition of any qualified applicant shall, divide any of the coal lands or the deposits of coal, classified and unclassified, owned by the United States otuside of the Territory of Alaska.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I hold in my hand the comparative print of the two bills. As to coal, the Senate bill reads as follows:

COAL.

SEC. 2. That any citizen or any association composed of persons severally qualified by law to enter coal lands, or any corporation incorporated under and by virtue of the laws of any State or Territory, or any municipality of any State or Territory, shall, upon application to the register of the proper land office, have the right to enter by legal subdivisions any quantity of vacant coal lands of the United States within any State or Territory of the Union not otherwise appropriated by competent authority, not exceeding 2,560 acres.

Mr. LENROOT. I was referring to the provision in regard to the leasing of coal land.

Mr. PITTMAN. I am referring to the provision covering coal land.

Mr. LENROOT. The section to which the Senator now refers covers only the sale. The next section covers the leasing; and section 3 in both the Senate bill and the House bill expressly excluded the Territory of Alaska.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, that is a point of order that the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin, in his effort to defeat legislation on this subject, is now urging upon the Senate in an indirect way.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator has not made the point of order. The Senator was inquiring.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator is getting ready to do so.

Mr. LENROOT. No.

Mr. PITTMAN. It is one of the theories, I assume, of the other side of this Chamber, which the Senator will develop in proper time.

Mr. LENROOT. Let me say to the Senator that the Senator from Wisconsin has not up to this time expressed any opposition to the bill. He is inquiring for information in the utmost good faith.

Mr. PITTMAN. I am very glad to hear it.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I thought the Senator invited us to inquire for information. That was my only purpose. That does not mean that we are opposed to the proposition at all.

Mr. PITTMAN. I assure the Senator from Iowa that any time he asks a question I shall be very pleased to try to answer it. What I meant was that it was developing an argument which is apparent to all of us, and that is the reason why I made that remark. I wanted to deal with facts and not with a technical argument.

Now, I trust that there is no further question with regard to coal.

The same provision with regard to coal now exists that existed in the House bill, except that in the House bill some contend that the Secretary is bound by the appraisement, while others contend that he is not. In the Senate bill it is clear that he may use the appraisement as evidence. Now, that is all.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, the Senator started to tell us, before he was diverted, the reason for this change as to Alaska. Will he please tell us?

Mr. PITTMAN. I thank the Senator from calling my attention to it. I was diverted. I ask that the Secretary read this letter from the Secretary of the Interior, which moved the committee to act in the matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. Reading from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 18, page 3707:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 1, 1919.

Hon. SCOTT FERRIS,
Chairman Public Lands Committee,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. FERRIS: On December 10, 1917, you transmitted a copy of resolutions passed by the Cordova, Alaska, Chamber of Commerce with reference to the pending general leasing bill, and particularly with reference to deposits of coal and oil. One of the matters urged was that the pending bill be modified so as to make its provisions relating to the sale of coal lands applicable to Alaska. In my reply of January 4, 1918, I advised you, in effect, that the reason this provision was not included was that there is now a special leasing law applicable to that Territory, enacted October 20, 1914 (38 Stat., 741), and that this law has not been in operation long enough for the department to determine whether it will be successful and adapted to the development of Alaska's coal resources.

Since the above letter was written there has been further opportunity to learn whether the Alaska coal-leasing bill is suitable to conditions in the Territory, and I have concluded that it is not entirely so. There has been but little inquiry for these lands and only limited development.

Four leases were granted under the present law, and but two of these were able to finance the small operations thus far begun.

After further study of the situation, I have come to the conclusion that perhaps the field would be more inviting to coal operators if title were granted as in the States, especially since Alaskan operations are so far away from the bases of labor and supply.

I therefore recommend that Alaska be placed on the same footing as the States in the pending bill, and that operators in that field have the same choice of lease and purchase as accorded elsewhere. Otherwise Alaska coal lands will remain in a disadvantageous position.

The Territory of Alaska is now included in the oil provision of the bill, this giving it the same law as the States, which will be an advantage in the administration of the law, because the same rulings would apply to both the States and the Territories, and will obviate the necessity of administering and construing two different laws on the same subject.

I am therefore of the opinion that not only would it be in the interest of the development of the Alaska coal lands to have the provisions of the pending bill made applicable to Alaska, but that it would also be conducive to good administration of the laws.

Cordially, yours,

FRANKLIN K. LANE, Secretary.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, that is the reason why the conference committee unanimously, I believe, agreed to confirm the provision of the Senate bill for the optional privilege of the Secretary to sell coal lands in Alaska, as well as to lease them. I think that answers that question.

I was one of the most ardent supporters of the leasing bill for Alaska. I hoped that it would succeed, and I still believe it may succeed. I know, however, Secretary Lane was an ardent supporter of the leasing system, and when he came to us and asked us to adopt the Senate provision giving him the power to sell a limited quantity of that coal land, we did it. That was all.

Now, as to the oil. The Senate, in dealing with the oil situation, did not disturb that portion of the public domain which was reserved for the benefit of the Navy. The Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of the Interior reserve certain of the public lands which were supposed to carry or did carry oil for the use and benefit of the Navy. In our bill providing for the leasing of oil lands we eliminated all that land. The House, however, incorporated in its bill a provision for the development of those Navy reserves. The provision in the House bill was that the claimant of an oil well, or rather the claimant of a mining claim under existing law who had developed an oil well that was producing, should have the right, upon the surrender of all claim of title to the mining claim under existing law, to a lease of the well.

That provision was drawn by the Secretary of the Navy, the Attorney General, and the Secretary of the Interior. We adopted that in toto. In other words, as far as the Navy reserves were concerned, we have adopted everything that the Department of the Navy, the Interior Department, and the Department of Justice have asked us to adopt. As far as the Navy reserves are concerned, we reached a compromise. The House bill provided that outside naval oil reserves where a man had developed an oil well in good faith, without fraud, upon the public domain under the belief that he was doing it under existing law, he should have a right to a lease on the claim, provided he surrendered all claim of title, at a royalty of not less than one-eighth, to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior, both as to past royalty and as to future royalty.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield for a question there?

Mr. PITTMAN. Just let me finish this statement. The Senate bill provided expressly that the royalty should be a fixed amount, one-eighth, as to past production and future production. The compromise was that as to past production, which had probably been expended in the form of dividends or costs of new developments, there should be a fixed royalty of one-eighth, and as to the future royalties under the lease it should be not less than one-eighth and as much more as the Secretary of the Interior should state. That was the compromise and that is the bill of the conferees.

Now, that is dealing with developed wells. Of course, it was necessary to deal with the discovery of new oil fields. The real object of this bill is to open up other oil fields. I want to say to the Senate to-day that unless other oil fields are opened up and discovered in this country we will not have sufficient oil to supply our domestic needs and our Navy and our proposed fleet. I want to say to the Senate to-day that unless there are some oil fields discovered, the natural resources consisting of oil will be a thing almost of the past in 10 years from now.

The chief object of this bill was to discover down under the earth new oil fields that we might break the existing monopoly and that we might enrich the resources of this country. In that the House bill and the Senate bill differed. The Senate bill provided that there might be 2,560 acres of public land set aside for prospecting purposes if it was over 10 miles from an existing oil well, and 640 acres if it was within 10 miles. The House bill provided that it should be 64 acres. We compromised upon 1,280 acres as to the prospecting area.

The House bill provided for a preferential right to lease the whole area within the permit if oil is discovered. The Senate bill provided for a patent to one-fourth of the land in the permit area, with a preferential right to lease the balance of the area. They agreed finally that to grant a patent to one-fourth of the area, as provided in the Senate bill, would protect the poor prospector against the greed of the promoter better than the House bill, and we adopted it.

Every provision against dummy locators and fraud contained in the House bill, which was approved by the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of the Interior and the Attorney General, was incorporated in this bill.

Men, in fact, a man who is not a Member of either this body or the House of Representatives, who occasionally casts his eye over legislation, who knows nothing about this legislation, has said that the House bill was all right, but the Senate bill was bad, and he wrote letters to public men before the conference report was made. The conference report adopted every provision against fraud that was in the House bill. The only provision that they did not adopt was to declare that that man himself was a fraud.

Now, what is there about the bill that you do not like? For six years we have tried to open up all these lands. We have met with the House three times to try to agree on a bill. We finally agreed on a leasing bill, nothing but a leasing bill, as far as oil was concerned, absolutely within the discretion of the Government. Every discoverer of oil is totally at the mercy of the Government. We agreed on a leasing bill whereby those who have made these great rich naval reserves give up everything except the right to take the oil out of the wells they have sunk and pay the Government such royalty as the Government may take.

We have agreed on a bill as far as the naval reserves are concerned that was drawn by the Navy Department. We have agreed on a bill as far as the fraud terms are concerned that was approved by the Attorney General. We have agreed on a bill that takes everything away from the man who risked his all to find an oil well except the bare opportunity of getting his money back.

Is there any use in arguing this question any further? The conference report was printed in the RECORD days ago so that people could read it and understand it. We have done the best we could in six years. We have done the best we could since May to get together on some kind of a bill and open up these lands. We have worked conscientiously and hard on it, and nine men have agreed on this bill. The five men from the House were intense advocates of the leasing system, intense advocates of Government monopolization of these resources, and when they agreed to it, when they staked their reputation on it, when the House on a fight, on a debate, voted 322 to 109, can there be any question about the sincerity of this thing?

I do not know what more to say. Anyone can kill this report by talking. We all know that. I do not think there is any such intention. We are right here in a jam at the end of the session when the appropriation bills are crowding on us. I should like to go further into it. I will answer questions that may be asked of me, but I refrain from going further into it because I believe everybody wants a fair, square vote on the bill.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do.

Mr. LENROOT. I called the Senator's attention a little while ago to section 3 of both the Senate and House bills excluding Alaska. I wish to say that I have since discovered that section 29 of the House bill does refer to Alaska in certain cases of leasing. It is only fair to call the Senator's attention to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I refused to sign this conference report. Having done so I think it no more than right that I should call the attention of the Senate to some of the reasons for my refusal.

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] says this bill has passed the Senate three times and the House three times. Mr. President, a bill has passed the Senate three times and a bill has passed the House three times, but the bill as reported in this conference report never passed the House until the conference report was adopted by it the other day and it has never passed the Senate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Before the Senator takes his seat I should like to ask him to indicate clearly the portions of the conference report which were never considered by the House or by the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I will come to that before I get through with my remarks.

It is true, Mr. President, that there is a provision in the bill as reported by the conference for leasing and for selling coal lands in the United States under certain conditions, but as far as the sale of coal lands under this bill is concerned there is no material difference from existing law. There is a difference from the wording of the law, but the result will be no change whatever.

In order that I may be perfectly fair in this matter and in order that the Senate may know just what I mean I want to read that part of the report relating to this matter. It will be found, beginning on page 2 of the bill, section 2, under the heading of coal. It reads:

> That any citizen or any association composed of persons severally qualified by law to enter coal lands, or any corporation incorporated under and by virtue of the laws of any State or Territory, or any municipality of any State or Territory, shall, upon application to the register of the proper land office, have the right to enter by legal subdivisions any quantity of vacant coal lands of the United States within any State or Territory of the Union not otherwise appropriated by competent authority, not exceeding 2,560 acres, upon payment to the receiver of not less than $10 per acre for such lands where the same shall be situate more than 15 miles from any completed railroad, and not less than $20 per acre for such lands as shall be within 15 miles of such railroad, and the Secretary of the Interior shall offer such coal lands and award the same through advertisement and competitive bidding, reserving the right to reject any and all bids which he may deem to be unfair.

Mr. President, to-day the Secretary of the Interior, through the Geological Survey, has made an examination of all coal lands withdrawn from entry, and if the examination is not made at the time a citizen of the United States desires to enter coal land, a request is made for an examination for the purpose of determining the value per acre of said land. When the Geological Survey makes a report upon the value of the land, then if the entryman desires to purchase at the valuation reported by the Geological Survey he has a right, or he and his associates, to enter 640 acres of coal land and purchase the same, provided the price per acre is agreed upon. But it is not mandatory upon the Secretary of the Interior that the price fixed by the Geological Survey shall be paid for the coal land. As I stated to the Senator from Nevada, I know of compromises that have been made and the lands have been purchased.

Mr. President, we do not want to deceive ourselves in relation to this provision. It simply means that if the Secretary of the Interior does not want to sell any coal lands in the United States they are not going to be sold any more than they are to-day.

The Senator from Nevada says that the reason for the sale provision is that there is a surplus of coal lands in the United States of 44,000,000 acres, and that without the sale provision the present coal operators in the United States will have a monopoly of the production and sale of coal to the consumers in all parts of the United States. Mr. President, there is no difference to-day in the sale of coal lands in the United States from those in existence 10 years ago. I remember 10 years ago it was stated upon the floor of the Senate that in 28 years every pound of coal in the United States would be exhausted; and now we are told that every gallon of oil in the United States will be exhausted in 10 years.

There are coal fields and there are oil fields undiscovered in all parts of the United States, I have no doubt. Doubtless there is enough coal in the State of Utah alone to furnish the United States all the coal that will be needed for 100 years to come.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, if the Senator from Utah will allow me, I will state that the Geological Survey has stated that there are in the public lands of the State of Colorado 371,000,000,000 tons of coal—enough to supply the entire world at the present rate of consumption for 300 years—and Wyoming has even more than has Colorado.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, what the Senator from Colorado has stated is true. I do not know whether Colorado has a larger quantity of coal than has the State of Utah, but I rather think it has. However, when the statements were made that we should not have coal enough to last the United States for 28 years—and those statements were made 12 years ago——

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I will yield to the Senator as soon as I finish this sentence.

Twelve years ago the same department of the Government which submitted figures to Congress and to the people of the United States to prove that statement beyond a doubt now says there is enough coal in the State of Colorado alone to last the United States for 300 or 400 years.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That there is enough to last the entire world for that length of time.

Mr. THOMAS. We shall not have an opportunity to develop our coal lands for a thousand years under the operation of existing laws.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I desire to ask the Senator from Utah if he would favor the Senate with the name of that prophet?

Mr. SMOOT. There was more than one; there were several prophets. That prophecy was sent from one end of this country to the other. In fact, I know of people in the United States who were alarmed and who began to wonder how their children who were born in the future would be kept warm.

Why, Senators will remember when the coal-leasing bill for Alaska was before this body. I admit that I voted for that bill, but in voting for it I said at the time that perhaps it was just as well to try out this system "upon the poor people of Alaska" before entering upon it in the United States. Now, we have a letter, which has been read from the Secretary's desk, signed by the Secretary of the Interior, admitting that the lease system is a failure and asking that Alaska be included in this bill. Mr. President, if it is a failure now, it will be a failure under this bill.

The sale-of-coal provision under this bill does not amount to a pinch of snuff as far as changing existing conditions. The Senator from Montana made this chamber ring with his declarations that there were men then in the District, at the very time that we had the bill under consideration, with millions of dollars to open up the coal fields of Alaska; that, if we would only pass the legislation, he knew of men praying daily for its passage so that they could send their money to Alaska and relieve the stricken people of the troubles and the trials that they were laboring under because of the lack of coal.

It was reported at the time that coal was within a few hundred feet of the homes of people in Alaska; but the people could not take a bucket full of coal that was actually in sight—not a thousand tons or a million tons, but hundreds of millions of tons—and yet not a bucket full of it could be used by the freezing people of Alaska.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I received, and I suppose perhaps the Senator himself did, a communication from one of the commercial bodies in an Alaskan city—I forget the name of it, but it is the terminus of the railroad——

Mr. SMOOT. At Cordova, I think.

Mr. THOMAS. At Cordova, announcing that the coal consumed by the people there was obtained from the Dominion of Canada, and requesting that the laws be so amended as that people could dig their own coal from veins in their own territory.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I received a copy of the same resolution to which the Senator from Colorado has referred, and I suppose most other Senators did.

When the Alaska leasing bill was before the Senate it was stated that coal was selling in Alaska for $28 a ton, much of it being shipped from the Dominion of Canada and some from as far as the coal fields of Pennsylvania and West Virginia. Upon those statements and knowing, as we thought we did, after the Senator from Montana had stated it time and again, that there were men anxious to put in millions of dollars to relieve that unbearable situation in far-off Alaska, we passed the bill.

What has been the result? The Secretary of the Interior says that there have been four leases made in Alaska since the passage of that law; two of them have never been operated, and the other two leases have been operated so slightly it could hardly be termed the working of a coal mine.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to say to the Senator that it is also reported—how true it is I do not know—by persons in Alaska who claim to know the situation that the properties which have been leased really command the key to the situation in each of the coal fields.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I feel sure they do; but so far as the working of them is concerned, it has not amounted to much.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator if he knows whether the failure of the Alaskan coal-leasing law is due to the law itself or to the drastic regulations made under it by the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. SMOOT. The only way to answer that question is by saying that both the law itself and the unworkable regulations of the department have contributed to the result; and, Mr. President, if this bill becomes a law, I say now that the regulations, which will be written by some clerk in the department, will be such that they will hamper the production of coal wherever mined. The production of coal, where the land is owned by private parties who are operating it to-day, will not have such handicap, so how can any individual or any company undertake at this time to develop coal hampered by restrictions with which his competitor is not obliged to conform and pay a royalty upon every ton produced when his competitor and neighbor is not compelled to pay a royalty?

During times such as we have had for the last two or three years, while the world war has been going on, even the unfavorably situated coal mines of the country have made money. It has not been a question of the price of coal so much as it has been a question of securing production; and the price that has been fixed upon coal to be paid by the people of the United States during these years has not been fixed upon the basis of what the coal could be produced for by those most advantageously situated, but the price has been fixed upon the coal in this country which cost the most to be produced. That was necessarily so. If that had not been the case we could not have produced sufficient coal for family consumption and for commercial and industrial needs of all kinds.

Mr. President, I remember very well when the leasing system was first talked of in the United States. I was positive at that time that if the policy were proposed and there was opposition to it the domain of the Western States would be withdrawn and withheld from development until the people of those States yielded to a leasing system as demanded by the heads of some of the bureaus of the Interior Department. I was told that that would be the policy if it took 20 years to bring it about; and that was 12 years ago.

I remember the late Senator Newlands appearing before the Public Lands Committee not once, not twice, not three times, but, I believe, since I have been a member of the Committee on Public Lands in the Senate—and that has been for nearly 16 years—he appeared dozens of times, and always took the position that the leasing system desired was not for the purpose of making a profit. It was wanted in order to conserve the coal of the country, in order that we may see to it that the mining of coal is carried on in such a way that there shall be no waste, because, unless coal was conserved, our country will be without coal in less than 28 years. All he wanted was a royalty sufficient to pay the examiners who would be sent from the Interior Department to see that the miner used his pick just as some little $1,200 department clerk thought he ought to use it; to tell miners who had done nothing all their lives but mine coal how to mine it; to pay employees in the department to keep a record of all production brought about through the passage of the proposed leasing law. If this legislation becomes a law, it may be depended upon that we will have another bureau in this Government, employing not 10, not 20, not 100 men, but we will have them traveling by the hundreds in every section of the country.

Mr. President, when this bill passed the Senate it provided that one half of the royalties collected upon the production of coal, the phosphate, the sodium, the oil, the gas, or any of the products named in the bill should go to the States in which the oil or coal or sodium or phosphate was produced. It was to go to the maintenance of the schools and the building of roads in the States in which the products were produced. The other half was to go to the reclamation fund for the purpose of constructing reclamation projects in States in which arid lands are located, so that lands worthless to-day could be made profitable and help raise grain and food sufficient to feed the people of the United States and the needy of the world, if necessary. What do we find in this report? That provision has been modified and a sop held out to the people of the different States in the way of a provision that all the money so derived shall go to the reclamation fund, to be expended for reclamation purposes, and at some time in the future, perhaps when our grandchildren's heads are as white as snow, this fund may leak back into the States, to be used for the purpose provided in the bill as it passed the Senate.

Senators, is it right to withdraw up to 50, 60, 70, 80 per cent of the area of a State and not allow the State to impose a dollar of taxation upon same, thus saying that not an acre of such land shall pay a cent of taxes to the maintenance of the institutions of the State; and in case there is discovered coal, oil, sodium, phosphate within the borders of the State, the same shall not be developed or utilized; the same as these very products have been done in all the States, with exception of the public-land States? Not one dollar shall go to the educating of the children of those sparsely populated States. Not a dollar of it shall go to the building of roads, in order that the people of those States may enjoy at least moderately good roads to carry the products of the farm to local markets.

Mr. President, what would the great State of New York or Pennsylvania say, or what would the great State of Ohio or Illinois say, if they had 80 per cent of all their area withdrawn and if the Government placed its hand over it, saying that no man shall enter such withdrawn land unless under a leasing system? Not only that, but the Government prevents the collection of one cent of taxes from said land. Do you think such a condition would be allowed long? It is unthinkable; it is unbearable; and it is a monument to the loyalty of the people of the West that they have not rebelled against it in the past. Now, Mr. President, if this system is adopted we will never get rid of it. That burden is to be placed upon the people of the West, to carry as long as we live there. It is wrong; it can not be defended; and the day will come when there will be a change, but it will take a long time, no doubt.

The Secretary of the Interior to-day admits that the whole leasing system in Alaska was wrong; that it has been a failure; and I predict now that the same system of leasing of the public lands of the United States will be a failure.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, if it should turn out to be a failure, we would be in no worse condition then than now, would we? And if it is demonstrated that it is a failure, the result would be that other legislation would be enacted in order to give development.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator who has just interrupted me has stood upon this floor for years past, and I have listened to his voice ring out as the clarion notes of a man who was absolutely convinced in his soul that he was doing his people a service and standing up for their rights by asserting that the leasing system is anything but American in principle.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I agree to that now.

Mr. SMOOT. If I felt the same as the Senator has said he felt time and time again upon this floor, I would never change my attitude on the demand of the head of any department. I say that you can not compromise with that which is right at any time. If it is right, it is right; if it is wrong, it is wrong; and the Senator knows that that is the case, not only with individuals but with nations as well.

I recognize the truth of the old saying that a lie can travel around the world while truth is putting on its boots; but finally the time will come when truth overtakes the lie, when the right overtakes the wrong. In the great plans of the Jehovah it has been decreed that ultimately right will prevail.

Mr. President, I would prefer to say to my people: "Bear your burdens a little longer; there is help coming." I have not any doubt but that we could pass through the Senate of the United States to-day a bill giving to the States of the Union all the public lands in the States. I doubt very much whether such a bill could pass the House, but the sentiment in favor of it is growing, and when the people of the United States understand what the people of the West have passed through for the last 15 or 20 years I have too much confidence in the good judgment and absolute justice of the American people to think for a minute that they will not rectify the wrongs done.

Mr. President, the royalties to be collected in the first place, as I stated, were to be just sufficient to pay the expenses of administering the law. Have we not been here long enough to learn that whenever there has been created in the Government of the United States a division or a bureau every dollar that they can put their hands on in any way goes to the enlargement of the powers and the increasing of the employees within that bureau or division? I could stand here and recite case after case showing this to be absolutely true. I know that there have been statements made upon the floor of the Senate, when a new bureau was to be created, that at no time in all the history of the country would it require more than $25,000 a year. It would be started with an appropriation of $10,000, and we find those bureaus growing every year, and some of them are now asking for appropriations of about $1,000,000 a year. Some of them last year, because Congress would not appropriate all they asked for, went to the President of the United States for money, and he gave them from the $100,000,000 fund that was given him to carry on this war $100,000, $150,000, $200,000 in some cases. The amounts advanced had no more to do with carrying on this war than if I had given $10 to some poor person out in the Western States to keep cold and hunger away from him.

In the Senate bill it was provided that there should be a minimum royalty charged, and we also provided that there should be a maximum royalty charged. If there is one thing that has been brought forcibly to the attention of the Senate whenever the leasing system has been brought forth, it is that under such provision it is impossible to secure money for the development of new properties. I know that the laws generally say "under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior"; but the Senate decided that there should be a minimum royalty of one-eighth, or 12½ per cent, upon all the oil or coal produced, and they also provided that under no conditions should there be more than a certain percentage charged as royalties. Under this conference report we still maintain the minimum charge, but the maximum-charge provision is eliminated.

In other words, if a man desires to improve or develop an oil well or a coal field, he goes to his banker and asks for assistance; and I want to say to you that the men who undertake such a project are generally men who have not the means to develop it. They have to borrow the money to do it. The banker says, "What title have you to this land?" "None whatever." "Is there any chance for you to get title to it?" "None whatever." "Under what conditions are you going to develop it or work it?" "Well, there was a law passed imposing a minimum rate of royalty of one-eighth." The banker would say, "What about the maximum royalty?" "Oh, there was no maximum royalty fixed. The conference took that out." "Do you mean to say that the Secretary of the Interior can say to you that your maximum royalty shall be 50 or 60 or 70 per cent?" "There is nothing in the law to prevent it." "Well, I do not believe we want to risk any money upon any such proposition."

Mr. President, that has been the case in revocable permits that have been granted by the Department of the Interior for years in the delevolpment of water powers. Who will advance money for the development of a water power with a revocable permit, under which some $1,200 clerk in the department can go out and tell the man who is developing that power, and putting all he has and all that he can get from his friends into it, that he has violated some provision or regulation of the department, and therefore might lose all that he has?

Mr. President, I had hoped that when a leasing bill came into this body or when the conference report was to be adopted it would be a workable proposition. I want also to admit my humiliation, as one of the conferees. I never expected to see conferees sit around a table and agree among themselves to a provision for certain sections of a bill and then have it suggested that some member of the conference take it down to the Secretary of the Interior and see if he would approve it. I never expected to have another conferee sent to another department, and another conferee sent to still another one, asking the heads of these departments of the Government to please approve of what the conferees had agreed to. Is it any wonder that the people are losing confidence in the Members of the Senate and the House of Representatives, their representatives who are sent here to represent them?

What I think ought to be done is for the conferees to agree upon the differences between the two Houses, and if Congress approves of the action of the conferees, let it go to the President of the United States, and if his Cabinet members do not approve of the action of Congress let him veto it, as he could any other proposed law. I would not spend the time in cabling to Paris to find out whether the President was in favor of a certain proposition or not. The President of the United States is not the legislative body. That duty devolves upon us and not upon the members of the Cabinet or the President of the United States.

Mr. President, I am getting tired of having men from all the departments interested in legislation haunting the offices of Senators morning, noon, and night, begging them to support pending legislation. I had an experience this morning by being informed by a delegation that if I did not vote for a certain proposition all the organizations of my State would be notified and that my election would be put in jeopardy. Mr. President, I did not spend any time with that delegation. I told them that whenever the people of Utah tired of my actions on legislative matters that affect the country and the State which I in part represent, they would defeat me.

But I do not propose, Mr. President, to stand here as a Senator of the United States and not only have the heads of departments but the employees of the departments interested in legislation that affects them personally dictate to me how I am going to vote on any question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 14078) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes.

Mr. PITTMAN. I will ask the Senator from Alabama if he will agree to temporarily lay aside the appropriation bill for a little while and see whether we can not dispose of the conference report.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the Senator if I had any assurance that the conference report could be disposed of in half an hour, or an hour, or something like that, I would very willingly agree to lay the appropriation bill aside, but without an assurance of that kind I do not feel justified in laying the supply bill aside for what may be a long debate.

Mr. PITTMAN. I will say to the Senator, of course, I could not give him that assurance. I do not know. There are Senators here who desire to speak on it, but I think possibly they might be willing to have a vote within half an hour.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator can give assurance that we can get a vote in half an hour I am willing to lay the bill temporarily aside, but I do not think I would be justified in laying it aside for a longer time than that.

Mr. PITTMAN. I will say to the Senator that I have no intimation that any Senator desires to kill the conference report by talking upon it.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that it will take me at least half an hour to complete my remarks.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand some other Senators desire to discuss the conference report. They have so informed me. I think it would take several hours, and under those circumstances I would not be justified in laying the supply bill aside.

Mr. PITTMAN. I would ask the Senator to at least agree to temporarily lay it aside until the Senator from Utah can finish his very interesting speech on this subject.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to accommodate the Senator from Utah, but I do not know how long he would take, and it would simply delay the supply bill. The conference report is not going to come to a final conclusion, I am sure, to-day.

Mr. PITTMAN. I can not possibly believe that the Senator from Utah would talk solely for the purpose of killing the bill. I think possibly his intention is to enlighten us on the subject. If it is, I should dislike very much to see him discontinue his argument all at once.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not want to disappoint the Senator from Nevada. I noticed that he was out of the Chamber nearly all the time I was speaking, and I do not think he was very much interested in what I said. Perhaps to-morrow, if the report comes up, he will give me his attention. I assure the Senator I will appreciate it very greatly.

Mr. PITTMAN. I have heard the Senator speak so often before I thought he was really speaking for the benefit of the country, and knowing how much they will enjoy it, and knowing how much the western people in particular will enjoy his speech, I wanted him to go on.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator has made his speech so often that he thinks every other Senator is making the same speech.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14078) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Alabama, who has charge of the pending appropriation bill, whether he intends to insist on continuing our session until some hour in the evening, as was agreed upon by the Democratic caucus some time ago?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think it is absolutely necessary that these supply bills should be passed, at least as many of them as possible. This bill has not got very much that is disputed in it. It carries the salaries for all the great departments, and it ought to be disposed of by the Senate at an early hour. If we can not get through with the bill by a reasonable hour this afternoon, and the Senate will sustain me in it, I am willing to stay here for a night session. Of course, that depends upon whether my colleagues will stay here and furnish the quorum. I can not do it myself.

Mr. THOMAS. I have advocated night sessions since the beginning of this year, because I have felt that without them we would be unable to transact the business on the calendar. The majority so determined formally some time ago, but our determination or conclusion seems to have been honored more in the breach than in the observance. I know we can not get through with the business before us unless we hold night sessions, and having so determined, I, for one, shall insist that the Senate remain in session for a reasonable period after the usual time of adjournment, in order that we may at least make the effort to get rid of the business, or some of it, before us.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the Senator from Colorado that I am in thorough accord with what he says, but I can not control the situation without a quorum here. I believe this bill can be disposed of, if the Senate devotes its time entirely to it, between now and 7 o'clock to-night. If we can do that, I am willing to take an adjournment at that time.

Mr. THOMAS. I think if the Senate finishes the bill by that time—and I hope it will—we then should take up another bill at 7 o'clock and see if we can not dispose of it between that hour and 10 at least.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In that event, of course, the control of the situation passes out of my hands and will rest in the hands of the Senator who calls up the next bill. As far as this bill is concerned, if we are not through with it at a reasonable hour this evening, I shall ask the Senate to stay here for a night session. If I can get a quorum I will stay and try to finish the bill; but if it is impossible to get a quorum nothing will be done except to adjourn. In the meantime I hope the Senate will this afternoon allow us to consider the bill to the exclusion of all other business.

Mr. SMOOT. I am of the same opinion. There are a number of Senators absent who are interested in the bill, and I think time will be saved by suggesting the absence of a quorum. We will get them here and then proceed with the bill. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Baird	Hitchcock	Moses	Smith, Ariz.
Beckham	Jones, N. Mex.	Nelson	Smoot
Brandegee	Jones, Wash.	New	Spencer
Calder	Kellogg	Norris	Sterling
Culberson	Kendrick	Nugent	Sutherland
Cummins	Kenyon	Owen	Swanson
Curtis	King	Page	Thomas
Dillingham	Kirby	Pittman	Thompson
Fletcher	Knox	Poindexter	Townsend
France	La Follette	Pomerene	Trammell
Frelinghuysen	Lenroot	Ransdell	Underwood
Gay	Lewis	Reed	Walsh
Gronna	McCumber	Saulsbury	Warren
Hale	McKellar	Shafroth	Weeks
Harding	McLean	Sheppard	Williams
Hardwick	McNary	Sherman	Wolcott
Henderson	Martin, Ky.	Simmons

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] are detained on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GAY in the chair). Sixty-seven Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill at line 20, page 44, and read to line 2, page 50, the last paragraph read being as follows:

For compensation, to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, of such number of employees as may be necessary to audit the accounts and vouchers of the Postal Service, $481,700.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to ask the Senator in charge of the bill if that is the usual provision in the legislative appropriation bill, carrying $481,700 in a lump sum for the payment of employees to audit the account and vouchers of the Postal Service. Is that a permanent or usual provision?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is the Money Order Division of the Post Office Department.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have heard a great deal of complaint about that division since I have been here.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There has been complaint. War conditions have affected it very greatly.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I did not hear of any complaint during the war; it was prior to that time when I heard the complaint.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the war conditions have affected the volume of the work.

Mr. JONES of Washington. And increased the amount of the item?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Very much.

Mr. SMOOT. Last year there was appropriated for this purpose $297,130. That has been increased to $481,700.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Can the Senator tell me why it is necessary to carry that in a lump sum, and why we do not provide for regular salaried positions?

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator is perfectly right in suggesting such a course, although the excuse given for it is that the changes are made very rapidly, that they are not working continually; and they feel that they can employ the necessary people through a lump sum at a cheaper rate to the Government than by having salaries fixed. I do not agree with that proposition. I think the employees ought to be provided for this work just the same as for the other work in the office of the Auditor for the Post Office Department.

Mr. JONES of Washington. This is a permanent division, is it not?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly; and not only that, but this is a permanent appropriation. It has been going on for many, many years, and it has increased as time goes on.

Mr. JONES of Washington. They do not employ the workers here for a short time and then dismiss them for a while and then reemploy them?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will allow me, I understand that a great deal of it is piecework, and that is the reason why they want this latitude in a general appropriation. But all appropriations of this kind, and there are a number of them, might be improved by a fixed salary. I am in thorough accord with what the Senator says about lump-sum appropriations, but it would be impossible for the Committee on Appropriations, in the time allowed after the bill comes to the Senate, to take up and investigate all those propositions. However, this bill carries in it a proposal for a commission to reorganize all this work. That is the only way by which it can be done. It is impossible for the committee to do it, and I hope the proposal will be adopted, and that it will result in remedying the trouble the Senator complains of.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think the Senator is perfectly right in that. We have corrected from time to time some of the lump-sum provisions by fixing salaries of employees, but I can see how, with a large force like this, it would be very difficult to do it. I think probably the commission which is provided in the bill, if it is enacted into law, will take care of many of these cases and correct what I really think are abuses.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will resume the reading of the bill.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Before going further, I desire to give notice that when the bill gets into the Senate I shall reserve the right for a separate vote upon the Senate committee amendments referring to the Department of State that have already been agreed to as in Committee of the Whole.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 53, line 5, after the word "Commissioner," to strike out "$6,500" and insert "$10,000" and in line 17, after the words "in all," to strike out "$687,870" and insert "$691,370," so as to make the clause read:

Office of Commissioner of Internal Revenue: Commissioner, $10,000; deputy commissioners—2 at $4,000 each, 1 $3,600; chemists—chief $3,000, 1 2,500; assistant chemists—2 at $1,800 each, 1 $1,600, 1 $1,400; heads of divisions—1 $3,500, 5 at $2,500 each, 5 at $2,250 each; 3 assistant heads of divisions, at $2,000 each; attorney, $3,600; law clerk, $2,000; insurance expert, $2,000; railroad expert, $2,000; superintendent of stamp vault, $2,000; private secretary, $1,800; clerks—4 at $2,000 each, 52 of class 4, 60 of class 3, 98 of class 2, 83 of class 1, 76 at $1,000 each, 73 at $900 each; 11 messengers; 21 assistant messengers; 16 laborers; in all, $691,370.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to the end of line 14, on page 54.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to ask the Senator in charge of the bill whether the provision on page 54, from line 10 to line 14, is intended to be a limitation on the amount of money that can be expended in connection with the construction and repair of Coast Guard cutters to $6,800, or whether it is a limitation upon the amount that can be paid for draftsmen?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the Senator from Washington that this item refers to the employment of skilled draftsmen who receive higher pay than other employees under this provision, and the House limited the amount that could be spent for these particular draftsmen. They increased it $1,500, and I think they gave consideration to the amount that was needed for that purpose. They did not want the general limitation to run into the full appropriation. That is the whole object of that language.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Are these draftsmen permanent employees or merely temporary employees?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My understanding is that there is a force which is permanent, but that not all of them are permanent. I think their employment only continues so long as the work lasts. On the other hand, I think there is work of this kind being done all the time.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Alabama will notice that there is a provision on page 53, line 25, for the employment of a draftsman regularly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; and these draftsmen are in addition to that one.

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senate made no change in this particular, and in the House hearings on the legislative bill, on page 380, the item is explained. Mr. BYRNS of the House committee asked the question:

Mr. BYRNS. You are asking for an increase in the authorization for services of skilled draftsmen from $5,000 to $6,800.

Commodore BERTHOLF. Yes, sir; that is to permit us to get more skilled services along that line. We do not ask for an increase in the appropriation, but for authority to expend that portion of the appropriation for these services.

Mr. BYRNS. Your note states that you now have two draftsmen at $2,400 each per annum.

Commodore BERTHOLF. Yes, sir; they are draftsmen, which is a general term. They do work in connection with ship designing and construction work. We must have some more assistance of that kind, and that is why we ask that the sum available for this assistance be increased. We can not get anybody for $1,000 or $1,500.

I think that explains the reason for this language.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I see that in line 25, page 53, provision is made for a draftsman at $1,500; but he seems to be the only draftsman whom we provide for the Coast Guards; and, as I recollect what the Senator from Alabama read, there are two draftsmen who are paid $2,400 a year each. What does this $1,500 draftsman do?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I must say I do not know; I am not informed, outside of the testimony which I have just read; but I presume that he does drafting work, but probably he is not as high a class man as are those who are paid the higher salaries. That is, however, entirely a supposition on my part, for the question has not heretofore been raised.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It seems to me as though the man for whose employment it provides permanently ought to be a good man. Of course, that is a matter which probably will be taken care of by this commission; but I think it is a matter that ought to be looked into.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There is no question in the world that these salaries have grown up for the last 50 years in such a manner that they are out of line. It is impossible for an appropriation committee to straighten them out, and I think that, if we get the proper commission appointed, we may reform the situation very materially.

The reading of the bill was resumed, beginning at line 15, page 54.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 55, line 3, before the word "watchman," to strike out "seventy-five," and insert "eighty"; and, in line 7, after the words "in all," to strike out "$285,310," and insert "$288,910," so as to make the clause read:

Bureau of Engraving and Printing: Director, $6,000; assistant director, $3,500; chief of division of assignments and reviews, $3,000; chief clerk, $2,500; disbursing agent, $2,400; cost accountant, $2,000; medical and sanitary officer, $2,250; stenographer, $1,800; storekeeper, $1,600; assistant storekeeper, $1,000; clerk in charge of purchases and supplies, $2,000; clerks—2 of class 4, 8 of class 3, 14 of class 2, 12 of class 1, 12 at $1,000 each, 15 at $900 each, 15 at $840 each, 3 at $780 each; 9 attendants, at $600 each; helpers—1 at $900, 2 at $720 each, 2 at $600 each; 3 messengers; 7 assistant messengers; captain of watch, $1,400; 2 lieutenants of watch, at $900 each; 80 watchmen; 2 forewomen of charwomen, at $540 each; 35 day charwomen, at $400 each; 94 morning and evening charwomen, at $300 each; foreman of laborers, $900; 4 laborers; 85 laborers, at $540 each; in all, $288,910; and no other fund appropriated by this or any other act shall be used for services, in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, of the character specified in this paragraph, except in cases of emergency arising after the passage of this act, and then only on the written approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, and in every such case of emergency a detailed statement of the expenditures on account thereof shall be reported to Congress at the beginning of each regular session.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Alabama if the language in line 19, page 55, expresses the purpose intended?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In what way?

Mr. SHEPPARD. What do the words "one, one thousand," mean.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That means one clerk of class 3, which is a specific designation of a higher-class clerk; I think one receiving $1,800; he is a statutory clerk. If the Senator from Texas will refer to the back of the bill, he will see what salaries are carried.

Mr. SHEPPARD. What word is supposed to come after the word "one," between "one" and "$1,000"—"one clerk"?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Nothing is supposed to come between those two words. The clerks provided for before that are statutory clerks. When we say "two clerks of class 4," that means two clerks at $1,800 each; one clerk of class 3 means one clerk at $1,600; but there is no statutory designation for a clerk at a thousand dollars, so he is designated as a clerk at $1,000.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Then would it not be better to have the word "clerk" appear after the word "one," so as to read "one clerk, $1,000"?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will look at the language in line 18 he will find it reads "clerks," and a dash, which makes the word "clerks" apply to every other clerk following. It is the same as if it read:

Two clerks of class 4, one clerk of class 3, and one clerk at a thousand dollars.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I see the connection now, Mr. President.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to the end of line 26, page 55.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to ask the Senator from Alabama a question. In line 25 on page 55 there is a provision for a messenger and an assistant messenger, without any compensation named for either. I presume that they both get the same.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They are statutory positions; and if the Senator will refer to the back of the bill he will find the provision for the salaries of assistant messengers.

Mr. JONES of Washington. What especially attracted my attention was the designation "assistant messenger." I had not noticed that expression before.

Mr. WARREN. It is the regular designation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will refer to page 151, section 2, he will see that it designates the statutory pay for this class of work; and where this particular language, "messenger and assistant messenger," is used, they are carried in the bill according to the terms of payment fixed in section 2, page 151.

Mr. JONES of Washington. What does the messenger get?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. A messenger gets $840 and an assistant messenger $720; of course, with the bonus added.

Mr. JONES of Washington. In connection with the messenger and assistant messenger, I wish to ask the Senator what is the difference in the duties of a messenger and an assistant messenger?

Mr. THOMAS. The assistant messenger does the work.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the Senator that he has asked a question that is beyond my ken. I have sometimes gone into a department and found a $1,200 clerk practically running the office and the $1,800 clerks reading the newspapers. The assistant messenger may be the real man on the job or he may be an attendant; I can not tell the Senator. He will have to designate the job and give me an opportunity to go down and make a personal investigation before I can answer that question.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It does not seem to me that we ought to have classifications of "messenger" and "assistant messenger." It looks like the assistant messenger is to assist the messenger, and surely that is not intended.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There are some bureaus and some divisions where they need more than one messenger, or think they need more than one messenger, and so they have two.

Mr. THOMAS. A messenger is apt to get tired sometimes and to need a little assistance.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The provision for the two classes leaves an opportunity for promotion for good work and holds out to the second man the inducement that if he runs far and fast, he may get a higher salary some day.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think that is a very good place for the commission proposed in this bill to begin some work.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the statement just made by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is about the only excuse I have ever heard for the designation "assistant messenger." They do the same identical work in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred as messengers. It is true that sometimes a messenger has a number of assistant messengers under him, but, in the great majority of cases at least, they do the same work. The only difference is that the assistant messenger begins at a lower salary, and, as the Senator from Alabama says, if he does that work well and steps along fast enough he may receive an appointment as messenger.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to ask the Senator if these assistant messengers are under orders from the messengers?

Mr. SMOOT. At times, yes, if there is more than one; but they do not take orders very well, I will say.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not know that I blame them very much. I think it is just a provision to give one man authority over another and make that an excuse for giving him a little bit more pay.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I think that is hardly a just statement. There is the same promotion from assistant messenger to messenger as there is between a clerk of class 1 and a clerk of class 2. We do not give any particular authority to a clerk of class 2 to give orders to a clerk of class 1. Of course they are under the direction of whoever may be at the head of the division; but these messengers are appointed as young men, and, as has been stated, if they do well, they can be promoted so that they get the salary of messengers. It might be said that the same kind of discrimination exists in the case of messenger and assistant messenger as exists between a clerk of class 2 and a clerk of class 1, or between a clerk of class 2 and a clerk of class 3.

Mr. JONES of Washington. A messenger is supposed to be one who runs errands from one place to another.

Mr. WARREN. Not entirely. You will find in some of the divisions a messenger opening the mail in the morning. He has been there long enough and is sufficiently accustomed to the work to open the mail and divide it so that it may go to the different rooms. He has been instructed how to do that work; while the assistant messenger will be on the door to wait on the people coming in and going out, waiting on Senators and Representatives who come to the door, and so forth.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It takes him, I presume, a good while to secure a promotion to a position where he opens the letters?

Mr. WARREN. Why does the Senator say that?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Because we provide for these places annual salaries, and I take it that these men are not promoted very much throughout the year.

Mr. WARREN. Vacancies occur all the time in the place of messenger, as they occur in other positions, so that there is always a potential opportunity for promotion.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Probably there are more vacancies in the position of assistant messenger than there are in that of messenger.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 56, line 15, after the words "Surgeon General," to strike out "$1,800" and insert "$2,000," and in line 22, after the words "in all," to strike out "$92,770" and insert "92,970," so as to make the clause read:

Office of Surgeon General of Public Health Service: Chief clerk, $2,250; private secretary to the Surgeon General, $2,000; principal bookkeeper, $2,000; statistician, $2,000; technical assistant, $2,000; assistant editor, $1,800; librarian, $1,600; clerks—5 of class 4, 6 of class 3, 15 of class 2 (one of whom shall be translator), 19 of class 1, 6 at $1,000 each, 3 at $900 each; elevator conductor, $840; 3 messengers; 3 assistant messengers; telephone operator, $720; 3 laborers; in all, $92,970.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, my recollection is that that amendment was opposed by me in the committee, and I reserved the right to oppose it on the floor of the Senate. I do not think that we ought to grant the increase of $200 in this case. We have not followed the policy of increasing salaries in this bill. We have picked out very few; in fact I think this is about the only one that the committee has raised. I do not remember any others. This man may be entitled to an increase of salary, but there are probably a great many others in this bill who could make just as strong a showing. This employee will get the benefit of the $240 bonus that is provided generally for the clerks. I hope the Senate will not adopt the amendment and single this man out for special consideration.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, the reason the committee agreed to this amendment was that Surg. Gen. Blue came before the committee and represented that the gentleman who holds this place has held it for a number of years; that he not only occupies the position of private and confidential secretary, but, as very often occurs in such positions, he is responsible for a large amount of the routine work of the office which comes under his authority. Eighteen hundred dollars is below the amount which, upon the average, is paid for men of this class; it is below the average that we pay for the work done by our own private secretaries; and the showing was such that the committee concluded that this was an exceptional case.

I will read the statement that Surg. Gen. Blue has made in reference to this matter. It is as follows:

The Secretary of the Treasury, at my request, submitted an estimate for increases in the salaries of my chief clerk and my private secretary. These increases were as follows:

Chief clerk, from $2,250 to $2,750.

Private secretary, from $1,800 to $2,250.

Both of these employees have worked under my supervision with a devotion and ability which could hardly be exceeded. Throughout the period of the war and the still existing influenza epidemic the bureau has been under heavy pressure, and they have labored without ever sparing themselves and without vacations, doing not only their own work but also the work of others who were sick or taken into the military forces. Service of this character, in my opinion, is invaluable to the Government, and I feel that they are both earning far more than their present salaries. Certainly it would be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to replace them with equally efficient men at the existing compensation. My private secretary worked so hard and such long hours during the influenza epidemic that I believe he exhausted his vitality, so that when he finally fell a victim to the disease his case was for a time considered almost hopeless.

If these increases can be allowed it will be in no sense extravagance but true economy, for both of these employees by their efficiency save to the Government much more than their salaries.

It was on the basis of those statements that the committee agreed to this increase, and I think it is wise to leave it in the bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, without questioning the truth of the showing made by the Surgeon General, I still think that this amendment ought not to be adopted. I have no doubt that many of the heads of departments could make the same sort of showing with reference to employees under them. They may not have done so because of their knowledge of what they thought would be the policy of the committee, and probably of Congress itself, in not picking out one man here and another man there and raising his salary. There is not a question that many of the clerks and secretaries during the war have been put under a much greater strain than they were ever before. It is solely for the injustice, as I conceive, that we are doing to so many more that I am opposed to raising the salary in this case.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, this is the only increase that is given to the office of the Surgeon General, I believe. I will say to the Senator that the House, after listening to the testimony, gave the office of the Surgeon General 15 additional clerks. He had asked for more than that; in fact, his office asked for $31,840 additional for the purpose of paying clerks and bookkeepers. I think, however, in view of the statement made and the earnest request of Gen. Blue, that we were very conservative in this matter, although I think the Senator from Washington is right as to the general proposition. I have not any doubt that there are other items in this bill that it is just as necessary to increase as this particular one, and perhaps more so; but I think the Senator did oppose it in the committee, and it was voted in. As far as I am concerned, I do not care whether it remains at $1.800 or $2,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed, and the Secretary read to line 7 on page 58, the last paragraph read being as follows:

For rent of a storage building and the annex to the Winder Building, $9,500.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, referring to the item of $9,500 for rent of storage building and annex to the Winder Building, did we not decide to cut that out?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No. What we did decide to cut out was the rent of the Cox Building, and in addition to doing that we cut out the stables, which I do not think was intended. I have here a letter from Secretary Glass, about which I spoke to the Senator the other day, in reference to the Cox Building, in which he says that to move those files would probably cost more than to pay this rent.

Mr. SMOOT. The only thing about that is we shall have to move them sometime anyhow. The statement that he makes now is absolutely correct. I think the item that the Senator spoke to me about—for the stables for the Secretary of the Treasury—we ought to put in, as he has decided that he would very much prefer horses rather than an automobile; and as I think one is just as cheap as the other, perhaps the Senator had better put it in at this place.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should like also to move to put back the item for the Cox Building. The committee did not authorize it, but the Secretary is so insistent on retaining the Cox Building that I think it is wise to put it in, at least until this new commission on buildings can pass on the matter.

Mr. SMOOT. Perhaps it would be wise to do it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I move, then, on page 58, after line 7, to insert the following:

For rent of the Cox Building, $2,150; for rent of stables, $1,200.

Mr. SMOOT. What is the rent of the stables?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Twelve hundred dollars.

Mr. SMOOT. One hundred dollars a month is rather a steep rent, is it not?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think so myself; but, still, we have not a chance to attend to it now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 58, after line 7, it is proposed to insert:

For rent of the Cox Building, $2,150; for rent of stables, $1,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, the employees for the Cox Building were cut out, also. If we restore the item for the building we will have to restore the employees; so I ask unanimous consent—because we have already passed it—that on page 39, line 1, after the figures "$660," we insert the following:

Cox Building, two watchmen; laborer.

It merely restores the clerical force that was at the building.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 39, line 1, after the numerals "$660," it is proposed to insert:

Cox Building, two watchmen; laborer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator about the provision on page 58, line 6, for rent of a storage building. What is the nature of that storage? What do they want to store?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We have the exact information in the hearings; I can find it in a moment; but I understand that a number of documents are stored there at this time that are not in present use. I am inclined to think at this time that there are a good many of those old buildings and storage places that ought to be eliminated, but as we have provided a commission to readjust this proposition, I think it is wiser to let the item stay in. We are drifting into an unknown field if we cut it out without a personal examination, and I will say to the Senator that the committee did not have the opportunity to go into that examination.

I think the Senator will find that the House hearings, on page 165, throw light on the question. In response to a letter, the Treasury Department wrote to the Merchants' Transfer & Storage Co. as follows:

JULY 17, 1918.

MERCHANTS' TRANSFER & STORAGE CO.,
920 E Street NW., Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: You are informed that the department accepts your proposal, dated July 3, 1918, for the rental of the third and fourth floors and the two rear sections known as "A" and "B" on the fifth floor of the buildings Nos. 920–922 E Street NW., used for the storage of documents and records belonging to the Treasury Department, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, at the rate of $8,000 per annum, payable from the appropriation "Contingent expenses, Treasury Department, rent, 1919."

It is hereby understood and agreed that the rental of the floors and sections of floor above mentioned is to include electric light, elevator service (passenger and freight), watchman (day and night), and telephone service, the said rental to be paid in equal monthly installments.

The department reserves the right to terminate this agreement either in whole or in part at any time during the fiscal year on 60 days' notice; also to renew the agreement on the same terms dependent upon Congress making the necessary appropriations for the rental of the premises.

You are requested to acknowledge the receipt of this letter.

By direction of the Secretary.

Respectfully,

L. S. ROWE,
Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, does the Senator know whether or not that is a fireproof building?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No, sir; I can not answer that question.

Mr. SMOOT. Why should there be $9,500 appropriated when the amount specified in the agreement is $8,000, and that is to include elevator service, watchmen, and so forth?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The appropriation is for two buildings—for the rent of the storage building, and also the annex to the Winder Building—and the appropriation covers the two buildings. The letter that I read covers only one of them. I understand that it is largely filled up with a large mass of files in reference to soldiers' claims.

Mr. WARREN. They are claims and other papers under the Auditor for the War Department which ought to be preserved, but which are too cumbersome and perhaps not of sufficient value to put into fireproof safes.

Mr. SMOOT. I think we ought to notify the heads of departments now that with the number of acres of buildings that we have constructed in the District of Columbia, from now on we are not going to rent any storage rooms for any department of this Government. Let them understand it now, and by the end of next year let them prepare to remove whatever papers they want to have stored to some of the unoccupied buildings that we now have in the District of Columbia.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the Senator from Utah that, as he knows—and he was a party to it—we have put in this bill a provision to take care of that situation. I hope very much that he will be a member of the commission and will give the notice himself, because I am sure he will do good work on the commission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead "Independent Treasury," on page 63, after line 22, to strike out:

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to discontinue the offices of the assistant treasurers at Baltimore, Boston, Chicago, Cincinnati, New Orleans, New York, Philadelphia, St. Louis, and San Francisco from and after July 1, 1919; and section 3595 of the Revised Statutes and all laws or parts of laws so far as they authorize the establishment and maintenance of offices of assistant treasurers in the cities enumerated are repealed from and after the said date.

For such expenses as the Secretary of the Treasury may authorize in connection with the discontinuance of the offices of assistant treasurers, including clerks and counters in the office of the Treasurer in the District of Columbia at rates of compensation not exceeding $1,800 per annum, salaries of custodians and other employees (at rates of compensation not exceeding $2,500 per annum) at such of the Subtreasury offices as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem necessary for the safe-keeping of currency, coin, bullion, bonds, and other securities of the United States, $75,000: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall require the custodians or other responsible employees to give bond in such amount and with such surety as he shall deem adequate for the protection of the United States: Provided further, That no person employed under a statutory position on June 30, 1919, shall be paid a salary hereunder greater than the amount of such statutory compensation on the said date.

And to insert:

Baltimore, office of assistant treasurer: Assistant treasurer, $4,500; cashier, $2,500; paying teller, $2,000; receiving teller, $1,900; exchange teller, $1,800; vault clerk, $1,800; clerks—2 at $1,600 each, 3 at $1,400 each, 3 at $1,200 each, 3 at $1,000 each; messenger, $840; 3 watchmen, at $720 each; in all, $31,500.

Boston, office of assistant treasurer: Assistant treasurer, $5,000; cashier, $2,500; paying teller, $2,500; vault clerk, $2,000; receiving teller, $2,000; redemption teller, $1,800; clerks—1 $2,200, 5 at $1,600 each, 1 $1,500, 1 $1,400, 2 at $1,200 each, 3 at $1,100 each, 4 at $1,000 each; chief guard, $1,100; 3 watchmen, at $850 each; laborer and guard, $720; 4 money counters and handlers for money laundry machines, at $900 each; in all, $46,570.

Chicago, office of assistant treasurer: Assistant treasurer, $5,000; cashier, $3,000; assistant cashier, $2,000; vault clerk, $2,250; paying teller, $2,500; assorting teller, $2,000; redemption teller, $2,000; change teller, $2,000; receiving teller, $2,000; 2 bookkeepers, at $1,500 each; clerks—1 $1,750, 1 $1,600, 9 at $1,500 each, 13 at $1,200 each; attendant for money laundry machines, $1,200; hall man, $1,100; messenger, $840; 3 watchmen, at $720 each; janitor, $720; 8 money counters and handlers for money laundry machines, at $900 each; in all, $71,420.

Cincinnati, office of assistant treasurer: Assistant treasurer, $4,500; cashier, $2,250; paying teller, $2,000; receiving teller, $1,800; vault clerk, $1,600; clerks—2 at $1,300 each, 4 at $1,200 each, 2 at $1,000 each; clerk and stenographer, $1,000; chief watchman, $840; 2 watchmen, at $720 each; in all, $24,830.

New Orleans, office of assistant treasurer: Assistant treasurer, $4,500; cashier, $2,250; paying teller, $2,000; receiving teller, $2,000; vault clerk, $1,800; assorting teller, $1,200; clerks—1 $1,500, 5 at $1,200 each, 1 $1,000; typewriter and stenographer, $1,000; day watchman, $720; night watchman, $720; messenger, $600; 4 guards, at $720 each; in all, $28,170.

New York, office of assistant treasurer: Assistant treasurer, $8,000; cashier, $4,200; assistant cashier, $3,600; chief clerk, $3,000; check pay division—chief $3,000, assistant chief $2,000; bond clerk and assistant vault clerk, $2,800; paying teller, $3,000; assistant paying teller, $2,250; receiving teller, $2,800; redemption division—chief, $2,700; assistant chief, $2,250; vault and authorities clerk, $2,500; coin division—chief, $2,700; assistant chief, $2,000; paying teller, $2,100; bookkeepers—chief, $2,400; 2 at $2,000 each; clerks—1 $2,300, 2 at $2,000 each, 1 $1,900, 1 $1,800, 1 $1,700, 4 at $1,600 each; 7 at $1,500 each; 9 at $1,400 each; 5 at $1,300 each, 8 at $1,200 each, 1 $1,000; messengers—2 at $1,200 each, 5 at $900 each, 2 at $800 each; guards—chief $1,500, 1 $1,200, 4 at $1,000 each; superintendent of building, $1,800; engineers—chief $1,200, 2 at $1,050 each; 8 watchmen, at $720 each; 12 money counters and handlers for money laundry machines, at $900 each; in all, $150,460.

Philadelphia, office of assistant treasurer: Assistant treasurer, $5,000; cashier, $2,500; paying teller, $2,250; coin teller, $2,000; vault clerk, $1,900; bookkeeper, $1,800; assorting teller, $1,800; receiving teller, $1,700; redemption teller, $1,600; clerks—1 $1,600, 2 at $1,500 each, 2 at $1,400 each, 1 $1,300, 5 at $1,200 each, 1 $1,000; chief guard, $1,100; 5 counters, at $900 each; 6 watchmen, at $720 each; four money counters and handlers for money laundry machines, at $900 each; in all, $49,770.

St. Louis, office of assistant treasurer: Assistant treasurer, $4,500; cashier, $2,500; paying teller, $2,000; receiving teller, $1,800; change teller, $1,600; coin teller, $1,200; clerks—2 at $1,500 each, 5 at $1,200 each, 2 at $1,100 each, 3 at $1,000 each, 3 at $900 each; 2 watchmen, at $720 each; 2 janitors, at $600 each; guard, $720; in all, $33,860.

San Francisco, office of assistant treasurer: Assistant treasurer, $4,500; cashier, who also acts as vault clerk, $2,800; bookkeeper, $2,000; paying teller, $2,400; receiving teller, $2,000; clerks—1 $2,000, 2 at $1,800 each, 1 $1,500; stenographer and typewriter, $1,200; messenger, $840; 4 watchmen, at $720 each; 2 guards, at $720 each; in all, $27,160.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama to state briefly the reasons for cutting out the provision abolishing the Subtreasuries?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The House cut them out. The Senate restored them.

Mr. JONES of Washington. What I mean is, what are the reasons for cutting out the provision that the House put in doing away with the Subtreasuries?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think I can answer that question best by sending to the desk and having read a letter that was sent to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] by Secretary Glass, of the Treasury Department.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read the letter.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, January 23, 1919.

Hon. THOMAS S. MARTIN,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: My attention is called to the fact that the appropriation bill makes no provision for the continuance of the Subtreasuries nor, indeed, any provision for their discontinuance nor for the transfer of their functions or property. As you know, I am on record as favoring the discontinuance of the Subtreasuries and the transfer of many of their functions to the Federal reserve banks. There has been no change in my view in this respect. At the moment, however, it would be nothing short of a calamity to cast upon the overburdened organization of the Treasury Department, of the Federal reserve banks, and of the Subtreasuries themselves the burden of the very important reorganization which would be necessary, nor can such a reorganization be effected by simply failing to make an appropriation for the continuance of the work of the Subtreasuries. Not all of that work can properly be done by the Federal reserve banks and the Treasury at Washington. The gold and silver reserves of the United States, which the United States holds in trust for its own notes, could not properly be left in the custody of the Federal reserve banks, nor could the gold settlement fund of the Federal reserve banks be properly left in their custody. It is important that the gold and silver reserves of the United States should not be concentrated at one point, but should be distributed at convenient points throughout the country. This is necessary not only from the point of view of economy, but also from the point of view of safety. It will be necessary, therefore, to retain the properties now occupied by some of the Subtreasuries and their vaults and develop a system for the custody of the funds. During the period of the war, with the great financial operations cast upon them by the Government, the Federal reserve banks have been expanding their organizations very rapidly. The Subtreasuries have all been working hard in aid of the Government's financial plans, and I believe there has never been a time when the Subtreasuries have been busier than they have during the war period. This is a temporary condition which will soon come to an end.

Briefly, my request is that the Senate committee restore the appropriation for the Subtreasuries, in which event I shall endeavor, before another general appropriation bill is presented to the Congress, to formulate a plan for submission to the Congress for dealing with the whole problem in an orderly as well as economical way.

Cordially, yours,

CARTER GLASS.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, this appropriation of over half a million dollars is another of the "war babies." These Subtreasuries have been continued ever since the establishment of the Federal reserve banks and the regional banks of the Federal Reserve System without a shadow of excuse. The Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Glass, has himself opposed continuing the Subtreasuries. I think it was five years ago that we first made a real fight against them in the Senate. At that time I believe we were beaten by one vote. Ever since the war began, the excuse has been given by the Secretary of the Treasury that we should not touch the Subtreasuries until the war was over. Now, Mr. President, the war is over; and the Secretary of the Treasury has promised that before another legislative appropriation bill is up for consideration, he will submit to the Congress certain legislation that will be necessary, as he says, to take care of the funds that are now held at these Subtreasuries.

I wish to give notice now that I shall never allow an appropriation for Subtreasuries to pass the Senate hereafter without a direct vote upon such a proposition. I can demonstrate beyond a question of a doubt that they are unnecessary. We might just as well appropriate the money to employ people as to keep appropriating money for the maintenance of these Subtreasuries.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, the committee restored the existing law. The language that is now restored in the bill by the Senate committee is exactly in accordance with the existing law. What the Senator from Utah says is true. There was a very considerable division in the committee on this subject; but in view of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury as to the urgent need of not disturbing that situation at this particular time, and with what he further said in the letter, the committee unanimously agreed to allow this provision to stay in the bill for this year without committing the members of the committee to it in the future. That is the situation.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, at this point I ask to be permitted to state that I have received by telegram and by letter a large number of petitions from the city of Chicago asking that I present to the body the necessity of retaining the office of subtreasurer, the great use the office affords to the business community, and also to present that it has been of great service in view of the late emergencies and exigencies which we all understand have borne heavily upon business generally.

I am like the majority of men in this Chamber, I can not profess the intimate knowledge of business and banking to justify me to say that I could point out wherein these offices were absolutely necessary. The senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] is fortunately blessed with a business capacity acknowledged by every one in this Chamber that enables him to speak more authoritatively on a subject like this than we who simply as lawyers have been busy as lawyers and as public men apart from matters of finance. But I beg to submit to the body and the committee that the bankers who sent the petition are all of a very high order of patriotic intelligence, and their policy of interest in government and their desire for economy is no less than our own. They have asked me also to say that the present occupant of the place is a man of independent possession, not depending upon the salary, having no need of the compensation, and is giving such worthy service through that department that to abolish the office would be a great loss to them.

Having made this clear, I think I have discharged my duty. I ask that the Subtreasury be retained at Chicago, and I shall appreciate the courtesy of the committee if it shall be done.

Mr. SMOOT. I will state to the Senator that the Finance Committee of the Senate have agreed that all these Subtreasuries shall remain in the bill for the fiscal year. I do not want to take the time of the Senate now to state why I think they all ought to go out, but I could show in detail the reasons why I think to maintain the Subtreasuries is almost a wicked waste of public money. I know that if that could be shown to the Senator he would be for the abolishment of the offices as quickly as I would.

Mr. LEWIS. May I not make an inquiry? This bill only extends until next year. There will be a new bill next year which may remedy the wrong which may arise.

Mr. SMOOT. The appropriation will have to be made next year and the whole question will arise at that time.

Mr. LEWIS. Then I will not burden the Senate further.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to line 5 on page 74, the last paragraph read being as follows:

Temporary employees: For the temporary employment of such additional force of clerks and other employees as in the judgment of the Secretary of War may be proper and necessary to the prompt, efficient, and accurate dispatch of official business in the War Department and its bureaus, to be allotted by the Secretary of War to such bureaus and offices as the exigencies of the existing situation may demand, $4,000,000: Provided, That the Secretary of War shall submit to Congress on the first day of its next regular session a statement showing by bureaus or offices the number and designation of the persons employed hereunder and the annual rate of compensation paid to each: Provided further, That no person shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation in excess of $5,000 per annum, not more than five persons shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation in excess of $2,400 per annum each, and not more than 25 persons shall be employed at a rate of compensation in excess of $1,800 per annum each: Provided further, That detailed estimates shall be submitted by the War Department in the annual Book of Estimates for the fiscal year 1921 for necessary services of the character provided for in this paragraph.

Mr. WEEKS. I should like to ask one or two questions relating to the paragraph just read. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill what clerks the appropriation of $4,000,000 on page 73, line 15, covers.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My understanding is that those are temporary clerks who came in here due to war conditions.

Mr. WEEKS. And not a permanent force at all?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not a permanent force. The War Department asked for an increase of $2,000,000 and the committee refused to allow it.

Mr. WEEKS. Has an itemized statement been made to the committee relative to the number of clerks employed under this appropriation?

Mr. WARREN. A short time ago, in answer to a resolution calling for it, we had returns from every department giving the number of clerks employed. I do not happen to have it at hand but the number amounted to some 99,000 here in Washington at the time. If my memory is correct there were some 14,000 in the War Department, but I may be incorrect about it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the Senator that there was a detailed statement put into the hearings on the urgent deficiency bill which was passed several days ago in reference to this item. I have not that hearing with me, but I think the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has a statement that Gen. Lord left with the committee of the exact number of clerks covered by this item. The statement was made on another bill and therefore I have not the papers with me. I think the Senator from Utah took the blue print of the statement. I do not know whether he has it with him or not.

Mr. SMOOT. I have the figures here taken from the blue print. Gen. Lord appeared before the subcommittee in relation to the $4,000,000 asked for temporary employees. The original estimate of a year ago was $11,468,282, of which there was appropriated $10,277,250.

Mr. WEEKS. That was for the War Department alone?

Mr. SMOOT. That was for temporary employees for the War Department. Then the estimate for the coming fiscal year was for $5,940,570. The House gave $4,000,000, and they figured it out about as follows: There were on the 1st of November, 1918, 17,156 additional employees in the War Department to be paid out of this appropriation under the heading of "Temporary employees."

Mr. WEEKS. That was for next year?

Mr. SMOOT. No; that is the number of employees actually in service November 1, 1918. Now, the estimated number of employees for the first quarter of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, was 10,114, and an average for the whole year of about 5,500. In other words, the number that will be discharged from July 1, 1919, to June 30, 1920, will cause an average of employees in that department of 5,500 under the heading of "Temporary employees."

Mr. WEEKS. Then there is sure to be a deficit, if there is an average number of temporary employees equal to the number stated by the Senator from Utah, because 5,500 employees at $1,000 a year would require $5,500,000.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true, but——

Mr. WEEKS. They will not be employed at $1,000 a year. They will be employed at $1,200.

Mr. SMOOT. Not on an average, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. WEEKS. Pretty close to it.

Mr. SMOOT. Not temporary employees. They will not average more than about $1,080, but that will amount to about $6,000,000. I will say to the Senator that the Secretary asked for $6,000,000, stating that that will cover what they desire.

Mr. WEEKS. I do not know any temporary employees of any considerable number employed at the low rate of $1,080.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that was the estimate the Secretary gave. There are a great many of these temporary employees, and it is just ordinary work requiring no particular education or experience. The estimate was for $6,000,000, but in questioning the general it developed that taking the number of employees they have in each one of the divisions, beginning with The Adjutant General's office and following with the Inspector General's office and the Signal Corps, the Quartermaster Corps, the Chief of Ordnance, the Chief of Engineers, the Bureau of Insular Affairs, and the Coast Artillery, it did develop that it might not be necessary to have an average of 5,500 employees. So the committee of the House on the hearings, and also the committee of the Senate, decided that there would not be required 5,500 additional employees.

I can give the Senator, if he wants it, the number of employees they have in each one of the departments I have mentioned. When added together it shows without any question that they can hardly justify employing that number. Gen. Lord, after we went into the details of the case, did say: "Well, perhaps we can get along with less than the $5,940,570; and, no doubt, if there is a shortage and more employees required than actually appropriated for there will be a deficiency bill, anyhow, passed before June 30 of next year, and it can be taken care of in that bill."

Mr. WEEKS. I should like the attention of the Senator from Alabama for a moment. It seems to me, if the number of employees estimated for are actually employed, very much more than $4,000,000 will be required, and they certainly will be employed, in my judgment, unless there is some positive prohibition against it.

Mr. SMOOT. They certainly will be employed if the appropriation is made, I will say to the Senator, and that is one reason why we thought we would limit the appropriation. I think they will be a little more careful in the employment of men and women if the appropriation were not actually in their hands. I do not believe the department is going to suffer by allowing the amount to remain at $4,000,000.

Mr. WEEKS. I have no amendment to offer. What I particularly want to call attention to is the proneness of bureau officials to continue employees who happen to be in their service and the indisposition to make any reduction unless there is a positive necessity for it. What I am fearful of is that, as to these employees, whether absolutely needed or not, there can be reasons given for their employment, and there will be a large deficiency applying to this particular item next year.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state to the Senator from Massachusetts that when Gen. Lord was before the Senate committee he, among other things, said:

> As I stated before, these clerks are not needed for the entire fiscal year 1920. That is, it would be absurd to think that we would need them all through the year. We will need more in the first quarter than we will in the second; we will need more in the second quarter than we will in the third. I have made an estimate here, which is purely arbitrary, showing that beginning with the first quarter we will have 10,140, beginning with the second quarter we will have 7,400, beginning with the third quarter we will have 5,000, and beginning with the fourth quarter we will have 3,000, estimating the pay of these clerks on a basis of $1,100 each, and I think that is a little small.

On that basis he wanted nearly $6,000,000. The committee refused to raise the House estimate for exactly the same reason the Senator has given, but we did not feel justified in cutting it any more.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that we tried to impress upon the officials of all the departments that Congress was not going to stand the enormous number of employees that have been used in the different departments. Employees have been so crowded that they were stepping on each other's toes. I think myself I could have taken 60 per cent of the employees in all the departments and, under favorable conditions, they would have done more work than the whole 100 per cent have done in the past.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Yes; 50 per cent more work.

Mr. SMOOT. For that reason we told not only Gen. Lord but every one of the department officials that the employment of unnecessary clerks had to cease.

Mr. WEEKS. I happened to make inquiry the other day and I found in one bureau there were about a thousand employees doing work about one-half in amount of that in another bureau where there were about 12,000 employees. There should be a thorough overhauling of the whole system of operations. I do not see how you are to prevent the expenditure of $6,000,000 for this item, including a deficiency of $2,000,000, unless it is provided that the number of employees engaged or kept at work shall not be more than sufficient to use the $4,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. It is not absolutely necessary to use it, but I say to the Senator it will be used, I am quite sure of that, for I never have known an appropriation yet made for the purpose of employing people that every dollar of it was not expended.

Mr. WEEKS. Of course it will be expended.

Mr. SMOOT. I want in this connection to say to the Senator that there has been introduced in the House and in the Senate a number of bills the purpose of which is the same, and that is to furnish the record of all the soldiers from the different States to the adjutant generals of the States. I was requested by the adjutant general of the State of Utah to introduce the bill, and I did so, but I had no idea what it was going to cost the Government of the United States, nor do I believe any Member of the House or any Member of the Senate when he introduced the bill recognized the enormous expense it would be to the Government of the United States. That was mentioned by Gen. Lord as a great burden that would be placed upon the War Department if that legislation passed, and if it did become law Congress ought to make an appropriation to cover the expense it would entail.

It was stated by Gen. Lord that, in order to furnish the information asked for within 12 months, it would require over 1,000 additional employees in the War Department. When that legislation comes before the Senate for consideration, I want Senators to understand what it is going to cost the Government of the United States to execute it. There may be such a demand from the different States and such pressure brought upon Members of the House and of the Senate, that they will vote for the legislation; but, if they do, I want them to know that undoubtedly there will be over 1,000 employees engaged in the War Department for more than a year for that purpose.

So far as I am concerned, I should prefer to wait a few years until we can again get our breath; until the people of the United States can ascertain upon what basis their business stands; until every father and mother in the country may take stock of what they owe, how far they may be able to meet their obligations, and what obligations they will have to meet in the future. I desire to say, further, that it is not merely the burdens which they have now to carry, but their burdens will be added to for the next few years, and so far as the removal of the burdens is concerned there is not a person now 20 years old who will live long enough to see those burdens entirely removed.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "War Department," on page 75, line 21, after the word "each" where it occurs the second time, to strike out "advisory architect, $4,000"; in line 23, after the word "each," to strike out "supervising engineer, $2,750"; and on page 76, line 3, after the words "in all," to strike out "$410,340," and insert "$403,590," so as to make the clause read:

Office of Quartermaster General: Chief clerk, $2,750; principal clerks, 5 at $2,250 each; 3 at $2,000 each; clerks, 15 of class 4, 29 of class 3, 50 of class 2, 93 of class 1, 59 at $1,000 each, 10 at $900 each; draftsmen, 3 at $1,800 each, 7 at $1,600 each, 5 at $1,400 each; hydraulic and sanitary engineer, $2,000; civil engineer, $1,800; electrical engineer, $2,000; electrical and mechanical engineer, $2,250; marine engineer, $3,500; sanitary and heating engineer, $1,800; 6 messengers; 14 assistant messengers; 12 laborers; laborer, $600; in all, $403,590.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Navy Department," on page 85, line 3, after the word "offices," to strike out "on account of the existing emergency," so as to make the clause read:

Temporary employees: For the employment of such additional temporary force of clerks, messengers, laborers, and other assistants as in the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy may be necessary to the transaction of official business in the Navy Department and its bureaus and offices, as follows.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 85, after line 5, to insert:

Office of the solicitor, $10,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 85, after line 6, to insert:

Office of the Judge Advocate General, $6,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 85, after line 7, to insert:

Naval Observatory, $2,250.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 85, line 19, after the words "in all," to strike out "$1,046,000" and insert "$1,064,450"; and, in line 24, after the words "Provided further," to strike out:

That no person shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation in excess of $5,000 per annum, not more than five persons shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation in excess of $2,400 per annum each, and not more than 20 persons shall be employed at a rate of compensation in excess of $2,000 per annum each.

And insert:

That not more than 49 persons shall be employed hereunder at rates of compensation in excess of $2,000 per annum, of whom not more than 39 shall be employed at a rate of compensation in excess of $2,400 per annum and not more than 10 at a rate of compensation in excess of $4,000 per annum.

So as to make the clause read:

In all, $1,064,450: Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy shall submit to Congress on the first day of its next regular session a statement showing by bureaus or offices the number and designation of the persons employed hereunder and the annual rate of compensation paid to each: Provided further, That not more than 49 persons shall be employed hereunder at rates of compensation in excess of $2,000 per annum, of whom not more than 39 shall be employed at a rate of compensation in excess of $2,400 per annum and not more than 10 at a rate of compensation in excess of $4,000 per annum: Provided further, That detailed estimates shall be submitted by the Navy Department in the annual Book of Estimates for the fiscal year 1921 for necessary services of the character provided for in this paragraph.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, the amendment on page 86, beginning in line 5, was made at the request of the Navy Department, but they now seem to be of the opinion that the language used may cause some difficulty in carrying out what they desire, and they have changed the language, though not the amount of the appropriation, to conform to their wishes. I send to the desk and ask to have read the substitute which they propose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MYERS in the chair). The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the amendment proposed by the committee inserting the language from line 5 to line 10, on page 86, it is proposed to insert:

That not more than 49 persons shall be employed hereunder at rates of compensation in excess of $2,000 per annum, of whom not more than 10 shall be employed at a rate of compensation in excess of $2,400 per annum and not more than $4,000 per annum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The only change is one of phraseology, which clarifies the language. I move the adoption of the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 87, line 3, after the word "including," to insert "an expert historian at $4,000 per annum and two assistants at $3,000 per annum each, and," and in line 8, after the word "person," to insert "except those specifically provided for in this paragraph," so as to make the clause read:

Toward the collection or copying and classification, with a view to publication, of the naval records of the war with the central powers of Europe, including an expert historian at $4,000 per annum and two assistants at $3,000 per annum each, and clerical services in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, preparation of maps and illustrations, and other necessary incidental expenses, $20,000: Provided, That no person except those specifically provided for in this paragraph shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation exceeding $1,800 per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 96, after line 23, to strike out:

For rental of additional quarters for the Navy Department, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed; and the Secretary read to line 14, on page 106, the last paragraph read being as follows:

For investigation of rural education, industrial education, physical education, and school hygiene, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, and no salary shall be paid hereunder in excess of $3,500 per annum, $50,000.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I will say, in relation to the item just read, that I shall offer an amendment to it when such an amendment will be in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed; and the Secretary read to line 16, on page 113, the last two paragraphs read being as follows:

Territory of Hawaii: Governor, $7,000; secretary, $4,000; chief justice, $6,000; two associate justices, at $5,500 each; in all, $28,000.

For judges of circuit courts, at $4,000 each, so much as may be necessary, for the fiscal year 1920.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator in charge of the bill why there is no provision in the Hawaiian items just read, for the pay of the Federal judges in Hawaii.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator will find that item under the head of "Judicial," on page 147, of the bill.

Mr. MYERS. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed; and the Secretary read in line 20, on page 115, the last paragraph read being as follows:

In making readjustments hereunder, the salary of any clerk in any class may be fixed by the Postmaster General at $100 below the salary fixed by law for such class and the unused portion of such salary shall be used to increase the salary of any clerk in any class entitled thereto by not less than $100 above the salary fixed by law for such class. The Postmaster General shall assign to the several bureaus, offices, and divisions of the Post Office Department such number of the employees herein authorized as may be necessary to perform the work required therein; and he shall submit a statement showing such assignment and the number employed at the various salaries in the annual Book of Estimates following the estimates for salaries in the Post Office Department.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill if this provision regarding readjustments and reductions of salary and increases of salary by the Postmaster General is new legislation, or whether it is usually carried in the bill? I refer to the item on page 115, beginning in line 8, with reference to readjustments of salaries.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is the existing law, and has been carried in the bill for a good many years.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Why do we need to carry it in the bill, if that is the law?

Mr. WARREN. That is the law; but it was originally inserted as a part of an annual appropriation bill, and therefore it has been necessary to repeat the language in each annual appropriation bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Then, instead of providing for it in each bill, why not provide for it here once for all?

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that when it was first put in the proposition was to try it out, and they asked for further time to try it the second year, and since that time the matter has not come up on any question as to whether or not it should be put in as a regular statute, but it has been repeatedly in each appropriation bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Can the Senator tell me how long it has been thus repeated on these appropriation bills, or about how long?

Mr. SMOOT. Since three years ago.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator from Utah says since three years ago.

Mr. WARREN. I should think it was about three years ago that it was first put in, or more than that.

Mr. JONES of Washington. How has it worked out? Does anybody know?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand it is to give flexibility in the adjustment of salaries between the $200 grade and the various salaries.

Mr. SMOOT. In other words, the existing law is that the promotions may be $200 in grade. Many times it is found there are promotions made of those who are not really qualified to fill the position that is required, and this simply gives the Postmaster General a chance to grant a promotion of $100 instead of $200 and use that difference of $100 in granting further promotions to employees who are worthy and have qualified themselves for promotion.

I wish to say to the Senator that as far as any saving of money to the Government is concerned, it has not done it unless it has been through greater efficiency on the part of the employees. If the report is true, as I read it, it has worked a wonderful improvement in the Post Office Department in that respect.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If that is the intention, if it is a good thing, why not make it a part of the permanent law?

Mr. SMOOT. There is some reason for the Senator asking that question. I think perhaps the present law ought to be amended so that this provision will hereafter apply permanently, but I will state to the Senator that the Postmaster General in asking this asked it upon the theory that he believes it would be a great improvement and bring about a greater efficiency in the department. He says that it has done so, and I believe it has. I think those who made the examination of the question will also make a similar statement. I myself think it would be a very good thing to amend the existing law by adding this provision to it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Can the Senator tell me about this? I note here it says the Postmaster General may reduce a clerk "$100 below the salary fixed by law," while it says he shall use what he saves by doing that by increasing the salaries of clerks "by not less than $100"; that is, he can increase the salary of any man from $100 up.

Mr. SMOOT. Within $100.

Mr. JONES of Washington. "By not less than $100," is the way it reads.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that under the existing law the promotions go according to the grade of $200, and the Postmaster General could increase here the salary of one employee $100 if he saves the $100 on another employee.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If he saves $500 by reductions, he can add that to one increase.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Then, what does this language mean?

Shall be used to increase the salary of any clerk in any class entitled thereto by not less than $100.

Why does it not say "by $100"?

Mr. SMOOT. He can not increase it more than $100, because he has only saved $100.

Mr. JONES of Washington. But suppose he has saved $200 by two reductions and is only going to raise one clerk, can he not use the $200 for that purpose?

Mr. SMOOT. I will read it to the Senator as a whole, and then I think he will understand it.

In making readjustments hereunder, the salary of any clerk—

That is, one clerk, remember—in any class may be fixed by the Postmaster General at $100 below the salary fixed by law for such class and the unused portion of such salary—

That is, the $100—

shall be used to increase the salary of any clerk in any class entitled thereto by not less than $100 above the salary fixed by law for such class.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Why do you use the words, "by not less than $100" there? Why not say, "by $100"?

Mr. SMOOT. Because of the fact that he may use only $50 of it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Why, no.

Mr. SMOOT. "Not less than $100" means that he shall use whatever he has saved on a clerk by increasing the other clerk's salary. In other words, he can not increase the salary of one $100 unless he saves the $100 from some other employee's salary.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I know that he can not increase salaries unless he saves something to increase with; but what I was getting at is, if he reduces five clerks in class 1 he has saved $500. Can he use that $500 to increase any other clerk in any other class more than $100?

Mr. SMOOT. No; he can use that to increase the salary of five clerks $100 each, and not more than $100.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Why does it not say "increase by $100" instead of "by not less than $100"? That is what I can not understand. Why not say "shall be used to increase the salary of any clerk in any class entitled thereto by $100"?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It goes in $100 skips.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Why not say so? What is the significance of "not less"?

Mr. SMOOT. It only emphasizes the fact that the Postmaster General shall not have the right to take $100 from one clerk and use it in any other way than to give it to another clerk. That is the object of it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That may be the object of it, but it seems to me that under this language if he saved $200 on two clerks of any class he could give one clerk of some other class under this wording a $200 increase.

Mr. SMOOT. I will state to the Senator that that has not been the practice.

Mr. JONES of Washington. What I am trying to ascertain is what the Postmaster General can do under this language and what it is intended to give him authority to do. It seems to me that we ought to strike out the words "not less than" and let him increase by $100.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is what I am trying to find out.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The adjustment of salaries is not by steps of $10 or $20 but $100, and if he cuts the salary of one clerk to the extent of $100 he can add it to another clerk's salary to the extent of $100, no more and no less.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Why not say so, then?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is the construction of it. It has been passed upon by the comptroller and is workable on that basis.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If he has construed this language to mean that, I do not know upon what he bases his construction. He has been trying to legislate, I suppose.

The reading of the bill was continued.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Department of Justice," in the item of appropriation for the office of the Attorney General, Division of Accounts, on page 120, line 10, after the word "Chief," to strike out "$2,750" and insert "$3,000," and in line 14, after the words "in all," to strike out "$473,620" and insert "$473,870," so as to read:

Division of Accounts: Chief, $3,000; administrative accountant, $2,500; chief bookkeeper and record clerk, $2,200; clerks—3 of class 4, 6 of class 3, 6 of class 2, 5 of class 1, 3 at $900 each; in all, $473,870.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed, and continued to the end of line 16, on page 126, the last clause read being as follows:

Commercial attachés: For commercial attachés, to be appointed by the Secretary of Commerce, after examination to be held under his direction to determine their competency and to be accredited through the State Department, whose duties shall be to investigate and report upon such conditions in the manufacturing industries and trade of foreign countries as may be of interest to the United States; and for one clerk to each of said commercial attachés to be paid a salary not to exceed $1,500 each and for necessary traveling and subsistence expenses of officers, rent outside of the District of Columbia, purchase of reports, books of reference and periodicals, travel to and from the United States, exchange on official checks, and all other necessary expenses not included in the foregoing; such commercial attachés shall serve directly under the Secretary of Commerce and shall report directly to him, $165,000.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Alabama with reference to these commercial attachés. Can he tell me how many the Secretary of Commerce has been appointing and what salary has been paid them?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can give the Senator the information in just a moment, I think. I will say, however, that the provision is carried in existing law. I think there are 10 or a dozen of these attachés. My recollection is—and I think I can tell the Senator definitely in a moment—that whatever the salary is, it is fixed by a law passed by Congress, designating the number of men who are to be employed and the amount of their salaries.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I thought in this case it was a lump-sum appropriation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No. Whilst I am not sure, I think this was a provision which was put into the law creating the Department of Commerce, though it may have been a subsequent law; anyway, it is a law.

The reading of the bill was resumed on page 126, line 17, the last clause read being as follows:

In all, for inspectors, Steamboat-Inspection Service, $697,950.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Alabama whether the committee considered the proposal with reference to the increase of the salaries of these employees? I have received a great many letters and some telegrams regarding the steamboat inspectors.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Washington will remember that at the last session of Congress there was a special bill passed increasing the salaries of these various inspectors. I do not know whether or not the Senator has received any requests of late for the increase of their salaries, but they had a large increase of salary, I will say to the Senator, a year ago.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have been getting letters recently, especially with reference to the assistant inspectors.

Mr. SMOOT. The assistant inspectors were taken care of in the special bill to which I refer, I will say to the Senator.

The reading of the bill was resumed on line 20, page 127; and the Secretary read to line 11, on page 135, the last paragraph read being as follows:

To determine experimentally important physical constants of materials essential to the industries or in laboratory investigations, as authorized by law, such as the determination of the value of gravity, thermal conductivities of materials, mechanical equivalent of heat, metallurgical constants such as specific and latent heats of metals and alloys, the electrochemical equivalent of metals, the velocity of light, including data important in the efficient planning of industrial processes, and in the effective utilization of the properties of materials, including personal services in the District of Columbia and in the field, $5,000.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill if the subcommittee gave any consideration to the estimate of the department for industrial safety standards, reading:

To investigate conditions of personal hazard in industrial and mercantile establishments—

And so forth.

They sent in an estimate of $25,000 covering that, and it impressed me as a very desirable appropriation. I see that there is nothing in the bill about it, and I wondered whether the subcommittee investigated that estimate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that so far as the Senate subcommittee is concerned, we did not go into that estimate. It was before the House. The matter was estimated for. The House turned it down, and in the testimony before the Senate subcommittee it was not insisted on by anyone from the Bureau of Standards. I do not mean to say that they objected to it, but they did not push it, and the Senate committee did not include it in the bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Will the Senator tell me who appeared before the committee from the bureau?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Dr. Stratton appeared on other items.

Mr. JONES of Washington. He represented the bureau?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Did the committee consider the estimate sent down for standardization and testing of mechanical appliances, the estimate reading:

To develop methods of testing and standardizing machines, motors, tools, measuring instruments—

And so forth, for the purpose of adopting and making public an industrial safety code?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Dr. Stratton appeared before the committee; and if the Senator will refer to his testimony before the Senate committee, on page 132, he will find that those items were not stressed. As there were many large appropriations in this bill for the Bureau of Standards anyhow, the Senate committee did not include those items that were not particularly urged on their attention.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FERNALD in the chair). The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Judicial," on page 146, line 23, after "$4,500," to insert "nine law clerks, one for the Chief Justice and one for each Associate Justice, at not exceeding $3,600 each"; and, on page 147, line 2, after the words "in all," to strike out "$153,500" and insert "$185,900," so as to make the clause read:

Supreme Court: Chief Justice, $15,000; eight Associate Justices, at $14,500 each; marshal, $4,500; nine law clerks, one for the Chief Justice and one for each Associate Justice, at not exceeding $3,600 each; nine stenographic clerks, one for the Chief Justice and one for each Associate Justice, at not exceeding $2,000 each; in all, $185,900.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 147, line 5, after the word "at," to strike out "$7,000 each" and insert "$8,500 each from March 1, 1919, to June 30, 1920, both dates inclusive," and, in line 9, after the words "in all," to strike out "$265,500" and insert "$331,500," so as to make the clause read:

Circuit Courts of Appeals: Thirty-three circuit judges, at $8,500 each from March 1, 1919, to June 30, 1920, both dates inclusive; nine clerks of circuit courts of appeals, at $3,500 each; messenger, to act as librarian and crier, circuit court of appeals, eighth circuit, $3,000; in all, $331,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. By inadvertence the words "per annum" were left out in the arrangement of the judicial salaries in several places. I have a memorandum where they should be inserted and I ask that the clerks at the desk, if there is no objection, insert them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FERNALD in the chair). Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The next amendment was, on page 147, line 11, after the word "at," to strike out "$6,000 each, $582,000" and insert "$7,500 each from March 1, 1919, to June 30, 1920, both dates inclusive, $776,000," so as to make the clause read:

District courts: Ninety-seven district judges, at $7,500 each from March 1, 1919, to June 30, 1920, both dates inclusive, $776,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 147, line 14, after the word "at," to strike out "$6,000 each" and insert "$7,500 each from March 1, 1919, to June 30, 1920, both dates inclusive," and in line 16, after the words "in all," to strike out "$16,200" and insert "$20,200," so as to make the clause read:

District court, Territory of Hawaii: Two judges, at $7,500 each from March 1, 1919, to June 30, 1920, both dates inclusive; clerk, $3,000; reporter, $1,200; in all, $20,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 147, line 18, after the word "judge," to strike out "$5,000" and insert "$7,500 per annum from March 1, 1919, to June 30, 1920, both dates inclusive," and in line 19, after the words "in all," to strike out "$8,000" and insert "$11,333.34," so as to make the clause read:

District Court for Porto Rico: District judge, $7,500 per annum from March 1, 1919, to June 30, 1920, both dates inclusive; clerk, $3,000; in all, $11,333.34.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 148, line 2, after the words "Chief justice," to strike out "$7,500" and insert "at $8,500 per annum from March 1, 1919, to June 30, 1920, both dates inclusive"; in line 4, after the word "at," to strike out "$7,000 each" and insert "$8,500 each from March 1, 1919, to June 30, 1920, both dates inclusive"; and in line 15, after the words "in all," to strike out "$36,710" and insert "$42,043.34," so as to make the clause read:

Court of Appeals, District of Columbia: Chief justice, at $8,500 per annum from March 1, 1919, to June 30, 1920, both dates inclusive; two associate justices, at $8,500 each from March 1, 1919, to June 30, 1920, both dates inclusive; clerk, $3,250, and $250 additional as custodian of the Court of Appeals Building; assistant or deputy clerk, $2,250; reporter, $1,500: Provided, That the reports issued by him shall not be sold for more than $5 per volume; crier, who shall also act as stenographer and typewriter in the clerk's office when not engaged in court room, $1,200; three messengers, at $720 each; three stenographers, one for the chief justice and one for each associate justice, at $1,200 each; necessary expenditures in the conduct of the clerk's office, $1,000; in all, $42,043.34, one-half of which shall be paid from the revenues of the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 148, line 18, after the word "justice," to strike out "$6,500" and insert "$7,500 from March 1, 1919, to June 30, 1920, both dates inclusive"; in line 19, after the word "at," to strike out "$6,000" and insert "$7,500 each from March 1, 1919, to June 30, 1920, both dates inclusive"; and in line 23, after the words "in all," to strike out "$43,100" and insert "$54,433.34," so as to make the clause read:

Supreme Court, District of Columbia: Chief justice, $7,500 from March 1, 1919, to June 30, 1920, both dates inclusive; five associate justices, at $7,500 each from March 1, 1919, to June 30, 1920, both dates inclusive; six stenographers, one for the chief justice and one for each associate justice, at $1,100 each; in all, $54,433.34, one-half of which shall be paid from the revenues of the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 149, line 18, after the word "at," to strike out "$7,000 each" and insert "$8,500 each from March 1, 1919, to June 30, 1920, both dates inclusive"; and in line 22, after the words "in all," to strike out "$54,840" and insert "$64,840," so as to make the clause read:

Court of Customs Appeals: Presiding judge and four associate judges, at $8,500 each from March 1, 1919, to June 30, 1920, both dates inclusive; marshal, $3,000; clerk, $3,500; assistant clerk, $2,000; five stenographic clerks, at $1,600 each; stenographic reporter, $2,500; messenger, $840; in all, $64,840.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 150, line 8, after the word "Justice," to strike out "$6,500" and insert "at $8,000 per annum from March 1, 1919, to June 30, 1920, both dates inclusive"; in line 10, after the word "at," to strike out "$6,000" and insert "$7,500 each from March 1, 1919, to June 30, 1920, both dates inclusive"; and in line 18, after the words "in all," to strike out "$59,080" and insert "$69,080," so as to make the clause read:

Court of Claims: Chief Justice, at $8,000 per annum from March 1, 1919, to June 30, 1920, both dates inclusive; four judges, at $7,500 each from March 1, 1919, to June 30, 1920, both dates inclusive; chief clerk, $3,500; assistant clerk, $2,500; bailiff, $1,500; clerks—two at $1,600 each (one of whom shall be a stenographer), one $1,400, two at $1,200 each; four stenographers, at $1,200 each; chief messenger, $1,000; two assistant messengers; three firemen; three watchmen; elevator conductor, $720; two laborers; two charwomen; in all, $69,080.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 8 on page 153, the last clause read being as follows:

SEC. 6. That all civilian employees of the Governments of the United States and the District of Columbia who receive a total of compensation at the rate of $2,500 per annum or less, except as otherwise provided in this section, shall receive, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, additional compensation at the rate of $240 per annum.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator from Alabama allow this section to go over, as there will be a contest over it, and after we get through with the bill we can then call for a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is not subject to amendment at this time, because there is no Senate committee amendment. It will have to go over until we finish the bill, as far as that item is concerned, because an agreement has been made that the Senate committee amendments shall be considered first.

Mr. SMOOT. This section contains the amendment of the committee in relation to the War Risk Insurance Bureau. I think the whole section had better go over, and then we will take it up when we get a quorum here.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection to the section going over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection the section, including the amendment of the committee on page 153, will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was continued.

The next amendment was, on page 158, after line 14, to insert:

SEC. 8. That a joint commission is created to be known as the "Joint Commission on Reclassification of Salaries," which shall consist of three Senators, who will be Members of the Sixty-sixth Congress, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and three Representatives, who will be Members of the Sixty-sixth Congress, to be appointed by the Speaker. Vacancies occurring in the membership of the commission shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointments.

It shall be the duty of the commission to investigate the rates of compensation paid to civilian employees by the municipal government and the various executive departments and other governmental establishments in the District of Columbia, except the navy yard and the Postal Service, and report by bill or otherwise, as soon as practicable, what reclassification and readjustment of compensation should be made so as to provide uniform and equitable pay for the same character of employment throughout the District of Columbia in the services enumerated.

The commission is authorized to sit during the sessions or recess of Congress, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to summon and compel the attendance of witnesses, and to employ such personal services and incur such expenses as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this section.

The heads of the various governmental services and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall furnish office space and equipment, detail officers and employees, furnish data and information, and make investigations whenever requested by the commission in connection with the purposes of this section.

For payment of the expenses authorized to be incurred, there is appropriated $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be available immediately and to be disbursed upon vouchers approved by the commission, which approval shall be conclusive upon the accounting officers of the Treasury Department.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to make a suggestion, or, rather, to ask the opinion of the Senator from Alabama upon a suggestion with reference to this commission. I am heartily in favor of the object and purposes of the commission. I think it is very important, and we ought to have had it quite a good while ago. I intended to make this suggestion before the committee when the bill was up for consideration, but the Senator knows how we were pressed for time and how we had to have a meeting in the afternoon and a great many Senators had to be in the Senate. I could not be there, and I did not have an opportunity to suggest it.

I suggest that this commission ought to be composed of Senators and Representatives of the present Congress who are going out of Congress, and I wish to state to the Senator why I think so. The Senator knows as well as I do that Senators and Representatives are just as busy as they can be with the ordinary duties of Senators and Representatives with the business that is brought before them. We really do not have the opportunity to attend committee meetings now as we ought to do it. The result of taking Senators and Representatives who are Members of Congress will be that they will, of course, give as much time as they can to the work, but probably there will be two or three or three or four in attendance at a meeting at a time, and they will have to perform the duties when probably they would like to be at home taking a rest or something of that sort, or they will have to neglect the active duties of their position.

There are Senators and Representatives who are going out of Congress who are some of the ablest Members of the Senate and the House, men who are thoroughly familiar with the conditions we seek to remedy by this amendment. I think men who are familiar with those conditions ought to be on this commission. From these gentlemen I have no doubt we can get a sufficient number to serve upon the commission. We shall probably have to provide compensation for them, but I think that is entirely proper. If we could get three Members of the Senate who are going out and three Members of the House who are going out they could devote all their time to this work, and could probably have their report ready for us by the meeting of our next regular session. These Senators and Representatives are just as competent men as we have in either body, and they would render just as valuable service in connection with this work. I believe we will get a great deal better result and more rapid work by having a commission of that kind than to have the commission as proposed here. I ask the Senator whether any consideration was given to that matter?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; the suggestion was not made at all and has not been considered, but I do think the suggestion of the Senator is worthy of consideration. If the Senator desires to offer an amendment we can consider it now, or, if the Senator will allow it to stay as it is when it goes to conference, the whole matter will be in conference and I will make the suggestion to the House conferees.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Does the Senator think what I have suggested would be in conference and that the conferees would have a right to report something of this sort?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly it would all be in conference, because the House could vote such changes in reference to the personnel of the commission as they saw fit. I do not wish to commit myself on the question now, but I think the question is worthy of very serious consideration. If the Senator desires not to offer an amendment to the bill I will be glad to call it to the attention of the House conferees and discuss it very thoroughly.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I believe with that statement from the Senator in charge of the bill I will not take the time of the Senate to offer the amendment, if the matter is to be in conference. I hope the Senator will give the suggestion his thought and consideration in the meantime, and that the adoption of this section by the Senate without any controversy will not make him feel that he is absolutely bound to adhere to its terms.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think after our conversation here on the floor, without objection from anyone, I would be justified in agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. With that understanding I shall not offer the amendment, but I do hope the conference committee will consider the suggestion.

Mr. WARREN. I think it is entirely worthy of consideration. We might have to examine the situation to see whether we would be able to find those who would accept the position. That is the only doubt I have in my mind.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not believe there would be any trouble, because we have to provide compensation for them. We could not expect those men to work for nothing, but I believe it would be money saved to pay men of that kind probably $1,000 a month until they submit their report, and we could require them, probably, to submit a report in six months or something like that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 160, to insert:

SEC. 9. Public Buildings Commission: With a view to the control and allotment of space in owned or leased Government buildings in the District of Columbia, a public buildings commission is hereby created to be composed of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate and two other members of said committee, to be appointed by said chairman, the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate and two other members of said committee, to be appointed by said chairman, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives and two other members of said committee, to be appointed by said chairman, the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the House of Representatives, and two other members of said committee, to be appointed by said chairman, all of whom shall serve thereon only so long as they are Members of Congress, and the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds, the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds, and the Supervising Architect or the Acting Supervising Architect of the Treasury during any vacancy in said office. Said commission shall elect one of its members as chairman of the commission and is authorized to employ such expert clerical or other services as it may deem necessary.

Any vacancies in said commission shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointments were made.

Said commission shall have the absolute control of and the allotment of all space in the several public buildings owned or buildings leased by the United States in the District of Columbia, with the exception of the Executive Mansion and office of the President, Capitol Building, the Senate and House Office Buildings, the Capitol power plant, and the Congressional Library Building, and shall from time to time assign and allot, for the use of the several activities of the Government, all such space.

For expenses of said commission, $10,000, to be immediately available and remain available until expended and to be paid out on vouchers signed by the chairman of said commission.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I move to amend the amendment by inserting on line 6, page 161, after the words "power plant" and the comma, the words "the buildings under the jurisdiction of the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think that amendment to the amendment should be agreed to. It merely brings the buildings of the Smithsonian Institution within the general plan. I think it is a proper amendment to the committee amendment, and I accept it.

Mr. LODGE. Those buildings are all provided for now by statute and placed under the control of the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, since the pending bill was reported to the Senate a revenue bill has been passed providing a change of compensation for the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and providing for deputy commissioners of internal revenue. I have talked with members of the committee about the changes of the law. In the revenue bill there is a provision made which authorizes the appointment and payment of the salaries of these officers up to the 1st day of July next, but there is no provision of law to carry their salaries after that date. I therefore desire to offer an amendment to conform to existing law and to provide those salaries after the 1st day of July. I send the amendment which I propose to the Secretary's desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 53, line 5, after the numerals "$10,000" and the semicolon, it is proposed to insert:

Assistant commissioner, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 53, line 5, after the words "deputy commissioners," it is proposed to strike out the words "two at $4,000 each, one $3,600," and to insert in lieu thereof "five, at $5,000 each."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That completes the committee amendments. I will ask the Secretary to now state the committee amendment which was passed over.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I move to amend the committee amendment on page 154, line 21, by striking out the words "except that" and inserting the article "The," and on line 23 to strike out the words "at one-half the rate." That would make the amendment read:

The employees of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance shall receive increased compensation allowed by this section for other employees.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask the Senator if he will not withhold that suggestion until the amendment proposed by the committee may be read. That has not yet been done.

Mr. CURTIS. I thought that had been done.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No.

Mr. LODGE. It has not been read.

Mr. CURTIS. Very well.

The SECRETARY. The committee amendment passed over was, in section 6, page 154, line 21, after the date "January 1, 1916," to insert "except that employees of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance shall receive increased compensation at one-half the rate allowed by this section for other employees: Provided, That employees of said bureau who are compensated at rates below $400 per annum shall receive additional compensation at the rate of 60 per cent of the annual rates of compensation received by such employees," so as to read:

The provisions of this section shall not apply to the following: Employees paid from the postal revenues and sums which may be advanced from the Treasury to meet deficiencies in the postal revenues; employees of the Panama Canal on the Canal Zone; employees of the Alaskan Engineering Commission in Alaska; employees paid from lump-sum appropriations in bureaus, divisions, commissions, or any other governmental agencies or employments created by law since January 1, 1916, except that employees of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance shall receive increased compensation at one-half the rate allowed by this section for other employees: Provided, That employees of said bureau who are compensated at rates below $400 per annum shall receive additional compensation at the rate of 60 per cent of the annual rates of compensation received by such employees.

This amendment Mr. CURTIS proposes to amend on page 154, line 21, by striking out, before the word "employees," the words "except that" and inserting the article "the"; and, on line 23, after the word "compensation," by striking out the words "at one-half the rate."

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I offered this amendment in the committee, but it was voted down.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hardwick	Moses	Smith, S. C.
Bankhead	Henderson	New	Smoot
Beckham	Johnson, Cal.	Norris	Sterling
Calder	Jones, N. Mex.	Nugent	Swanson
Chamberlain	Jones, Wash.	Pittman	Thomas
Cummins	Kendrick	Pollock	Thompson
Curtis	Kenyon	Pomerene	Townsend
Dillingham	Kirby	Ransdell	Trammell
Fernald	La Follette	Reed	Underwood
Fletcher	Lenroot	Robinson	Vardaman
France	Lewis	Shafroth	Warren
Frelinghuysen	Lodge	Sheppard	Weeks
Gay	McKellar	Sherman	Williams
Gronna	McLean	Shields	Wolcott
Hale	McNary	Simmons
Harding	Martin, Ky.	Smith, Ga.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] are detained on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-two Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to take up unnecessarily the time of the Senate in discussing this question. What I want is to have the employees of the War Risk Insurance Bureau put on the same plane as to salary as the employees of other bureaus of the Government. I know it is contended that when these clerks were employed their salaries were fixed so as to include the $120 allowance made last year in the appropriation bill to the regular statutory employees of the Government, but I do not think these clerks were employed with any such understanding.

I wish to read two telegrams that were sent to clerks appointed in the War Risk Insurance Bureau to show that there was no indication of that kind given to them. Here is a telegram sent out on September 11, reading as follows:

Appointed clerk, Bureau of War Risk Insurance, New National Museum, Tenth and B Streets, $1,100 per annum. Report immediately, or before September 20. Services urgently needed. Early promotion, if service proves satisfactory. Wire.

The person who received that telegram reported, was employed at $1,100, has received no increase, and is still working for the bureau.

I read another telegram, dated September 14, which is as follows:

Appointed typist, $1,100 per annum, War Risk Insurance. Chance of promotion, if merited, good. Wire earliest can report at destination. Service urgently needed.

That young lady reported. She started to work at $1,100 and is still drawing $1,100. It will be seen that a promise of promotion was offered, but it has not been kept; and yet in this bill, instead of getting the allowance that has been given to other Government clerks, the employees of the War Risk Insurance Bureau are only given one-half. I hope the amendment offered by me will be agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I desire to say that there is no item in this bill to which the subcommittee in charge of it gave more careful consideration than this item in reference to the bonus to the employees of the War Risk Insurance Bureau. It was left out of the bill last year, for the reason that it has been the policy of the Congress in adopting this bonus not to apply it to those bureaus that were entirely war emergency bureaus, and the committee last year had the idea that the War Risk Insurance Bureau was of that class, although so far as the insurance features of that bureau are concerned it becomes a permanent bureau.

The reason the distinction was made between the old bureaus and departments of the Government and the war emergency bureaus which were established here, was that the clerks in the emergency bureaus were paid out of a lump sum; there was no limitation; there was no statutory provision for those temporary clerks; and undoubtedly they were paid a great deal more salary than the clerks in the regular bureaus. The effort of the Congress and of the committees of Congress was to equalize those salaries, to take care of the statutory clerks whose salaries were not increased and of the clerks in the old bureaus employed under lump-sum appropriations who were on the same basis.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CURTIS. Does not the Senator think that the fact that these clerks received telegrams stating that they were appointed at $1,100, and that there would be early promotion, entitles them to some consideration?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think that alone should determine the matter. We could not increase the clerical force of the Government and their salaries to an amount perhaps of $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 a year because the head of a bureau wired one or two clerks that, if they would come here, he would give them an increase over their initial salary. That would be an impossible proposition. It might have been a very unjust thing for the head of the bureau to have done; but it would not justify Congress in giving a general increase all along the line. However, that is not my argument.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I merely want to make one suggestion, if the Senator will permit me. I will not take up any of the Senator's time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. I only read two telegrams, but I had at least 50 clerks, who were employed at $1,100, tell me that they had received similar telegrams.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That may be; but I want to come to the real details. Young ladies employed in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance came before the committee and urged this increase. They all believed they were getting smaller salaries than anybody else—I have no doubt about that—because they could point to a clerk here or a clerk there in some other department or bureau who was getting more salary than they did; but we sent for the heads of this bureau and examined them, and also had a report from the efficiency commission of the Government, and we found that their salaries last year were placed on a basis to equalize the increase of $120 which we gave to the statutory clerks. Unless we are willing to reject the testimony of Mr. Brown, the head of the Efficiency Bureau of the Government, whom we sent down there to look into this matter and report to us, we must believe that these clerks got that $120 last year by reason of its being provided in the lump-sum appropriation that was made to run the bureau.

Mr. SMOOT. One hundred and twenty-nine dollars was the actual average.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator from Utah calls my attention to the fact that the actual amount which they got by way of increase was $129. That being the case, if the Senate gave them the entire increase of $240 carried in this bill, instead of equalizing their salaries with the salaries of other clerks of the Government on the statutory roll, we would be putting them $120 above the other clerks. We have attempted to equalize the salaries. We have carefully examined the facts, and there was not a dissenting voice in the committee as to what the result was after we heard the testimony. I am absolutely certain, from the testimony, that if we let this bill remain as it is, we put the clerks in the War Risk Insurance Bureau on exactly the same basis of pay as the average pay in the general statutory bureaus of the Government.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McKELLAR in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. I merely wish to correct one statement the Senator made. I think the Senator meant there was not a dissenting voice in the subcommittee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is what I meant.

Mr. CURTIS. The amendment which I offered in the full committee did have two or three votes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator is correct. The full committee did not make the investigation.

Mr. CURTIS. That is true.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It was made by the subcommittee, and the subcommittee reached a united verdict on it. This question involves a number of millions of dollars. It is a question which your committee investigated and on which it called for expert testimony. I do not think there is any doubt about it; and I think the Senate ought to reject the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator a question, for this matter has been called to my attention a good many times. I understood the Senator from Alabama to say—and I intend to accept what he says with regard to it—that with the provisions of this bill as they are, the clerks in the War Risk Insurance Bureau will be getting just as much pay as the clerks in the other departments for the same kind of work.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They will be getting the same basis of pay. Of course, there is a variation as to individuals.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But as to the basis of pay, they will be put on an identical basis with the statutory clerks in the Government employ now, with the bonus added.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have had a great desire to have all of the employees of the Government receive equal treatment under this provision. The bill passed the House with no mention whatever of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, as it was not provided for in the bill a year ago. The Bureau of War Risk Insurance, when it began to employ clerks, typists, and stenographers shortly after its organization, paying them out of a lump sum, paid higher wages than most any other department of the Government. Senators know themselves that they lost their own clerks; they were taken away from them; and many of them went to the War Risk Insurance Bureau. In the investigation a year ago it developed that they were paid higher salaries than the clerks in many of the other departments when the clerks in the other departments were paid an additional amount of $120, as they were a year ago.

When the House passed the pending bill, as I said, they gave a $240 increase instead of the $120 which was given a year ago; but they still left out the War Risk Insurance Bureau, and we began an investigation as to whether that was fair to that bureau. It developed—and I have the figures here to prove it—that between the passage of the legislative bill for the present fiscal year and the present time there has been an average increase of $129 in the salaries of employees in that bureau. That increase was made upon the order of the head of the department of which the bureau is a part. The Bureau of Efficiency, with Mr. Brown at its head, went into the whole question. I have here a long statement, which I do not wish to burden the Senate with at this time, showing that that increase was made; and not only that, but it is now agreed that there shall be further increases in the bureau after a service of three months.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. CURTIS. Those increases have not been given. I have read 2 telegrams on the subject, and I could have read 50 more.

Mr. SMOOT. No matter whether this provision is adopted or not, they are going to receive the agreed increases. If the Senator doubts it, I have here a statement from the Bureau of Efficiency stating just what the agreement was and how the salaries should be increased.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, are these all temporary salaries?

Mr. SMOOT. They are all paid out of a lump sum.

Mr. TOWNSEND. But are they temporary—for one year?

Mr. SMOOT. No.

Mr. LODGE. They are not statutory clerks.

Mr. SMOOT. They are not statutory salaries. They are fixed by the bureau at the time they are employed.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. FLETCHER. Do I understand the Senator to say that within three months the employees of this bureau will be receiving the same as the employees of other bureaus?

Mr. SMOOT. They will receive the same as the other employees will receive if the others get the $240 increase, and the employees in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance get only the $120. That $120, given to the employees of the War Risk Bureau, places them upon an equality with the others, as nearly as it is possible to place the employees of all of the departments of our Government upon an equality.

I know that the employees of the bureau say that the average compensation in that bureau is not as high as in the Department of Justice, or the Federal Trade Commission, or the Quartermaster General's Department, or the Department of Commerce. That is very easily accounted for. There are over 5,500 employees in the War Risk Bureau drawing a salary of $1,100; or, in other words, they are all employees from typists down. I have here a letter from the Civil Service Commission in which it is stated that many of those employees receiving $1,080 are doing work that requires no preparation and no particular ability, and therefore the Civil Service Commission think the salaries they are receiving now, if the $120 is added, will be ample.

Every young lady who appeared before the committee who was asked what salary she was receiving was receiving over $1,300, and with the $120 added it means that they will be receiving about $1,450 a year; and there are a great many of them. I could go into the details and tell just exactly how many there are, but I believe enough has been said to show the Senate that the committee wanted to do the right thing by all of the employees of the Government.

If an effort should be made upon the part of any Senator to increase the $240 bonus to $360, then, of course, of necessity, the $120 increase for the War Risk Insurance Bureau ought to be increased to $240. That should be done in case the other bonus is increased to $360.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. I will state that I made an investigation and came to the same conclusion that the committee did; but I should like to ask the Senator whether he has information there as to the lowest salaries paid in this bureau?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I can tell the Senator in just a few moments what they are, and there are only a few of the employees who are receiving less than $1,100. I will run through this statement, and tell, in a moment, just what departments they are in.

The filers in the section of correspondence are receiving $1,140. Whatever filers there are are receiving to-day $1,140.

The typists in the same section are receiving $1,140.

The sorters—that is, the incoming sorters, meaning those who sort the mail as it comes into the section—receive $1,080; and the sorters on the outgoing mail, where it is distributed to the desks of the heads who handle it in detail, receive $1,140.

In the claims division the typists receive $1,140, and they are the only employees in that whole division who receive less than $1,200.

Mr. LENROOT. Has the Senator a memorandum there of any that receive a salary of $660?

Mr. SMOOT. I will run through them and see.

There are the graphotype operators, who receive $900; the miscellaneous mail clerks receive $1,080; the numbering clerks receive $1,080; the dropping and stitching clerks receive $1,080; and the punchers receive $900.

Mr. LENROOT. Is it the Senator's understanding that that is the lowest salary that is paid in the bureau?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that that is the lowest salary that is being paid in the bureau to-day.

Mr. SMOOT subsequently said: I ask that following my statement made a few moments ago to have printed in the RECORD a memorandum furnished by the head of the Bureau of Efficiency in relation to just what has been done in the way of increased salaries in the War Risk Insurance Bureau.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, leave is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

JANUARY 24, 1919.

Memorandum.

At the hearings before the Committee on Appropriations of the House last year, the representatives of the Bureau of Efficiency and the Bureau of War Risk Insurance promised the committee that they would fix standard salaries for the different kinds of work performed in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and pay the employees according to the value of their services as nearly as that value could be determined. This work was undertaken by representatives of the Bureau of Efficiency, and the standard salaries were designated. These standard salaries were submitted first to officers of the War Risk Insurance Bureau and later to representatives of the House Committee on Appropriations. In most cases this standardization has resulted in raising the pay of employees engaged on the different kinds of work.

Entrance salaries of $1,000 for clerks and typists and $1,100 for stenographers were fixed by officers of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance last spring. At about the same time the entrance salary for clerks and typists was raised by the War Department to $1,100 and for stenographers to $1,200, with a promise of an automatic promotion of $100 at the end of three months' service. This created dissatisfaction among the employees of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and since the classification work required considerable time it was finally decided by the Bureau of Efficiency in the early part of August to recommend that an automatic increase be given to all employees of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance who had been in the bureau three months and who had not been promoted. This increase was made effective August 16. A little later great difficulty was experienced in securing satisfactory eligibles from the Civil Service register at the entrance salaries offered by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and with a view to overcoming this difficulty, the Bureau of Efficiency recommended that the entrance salary of clerks and typists be raised from $1,000 to $1,100, and of stenographers from $1,100 to $1,200. This recommendation was also adopted. Shortly after this a third recommendation was made that any clerks and typists who had been appointed by the bureau at less than $1,100, and any stenographers who had been appointed at less than $1,200 and who were receiving less than those salaries should be promoted to those salaries. This recommendation was also adopted. These various recommendations were made because it was found that under the classification these blanket increases would in very few cases raise the pay of the employees above the standards that were being prepared. In the early part of September the Bureau of Efficiency began to submit to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance its standard salaries for the different kinds of work. These were generally adopted and promotions under them put into effect. These standards are shown in the tables appended to this memorandum. In many cases the promotions made under these standards did not bring the clerks up to the standards because it was felt that at the first rating no one should be promoted more than $240 a year, no one should be promoted to more than the standard salary for the work he was doing, and no one should be promoted who had not been in the bureau at least three months.

On July 1 the average salary of employees in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance was $1,017. The average salary on December 1 was $1,119, or an increase of $102. This increase was due to the blanket promotions, to the raising of entrance salaries, and to the increases under the standard salaries that had been adopted by the bureau. Since December 1 further standard salaries have been submitted to the bureau that, when adopted and promotions made under them, will bring the average salary up to $1,141, or an average increase of $124.

The question to be considered is whether or not the blanket increase of $240 or some other amount should be granted to the employees of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. In fixing the standard salaries shown in the accompanying schedules, the Bureau of Efficiency endeavored to take into account the increased cost of living, the compensation paid in other offices of the Government and in commercial establishments, and these standards are intended to correspond to the pay in other offices of the Government where the bonus of $120 is paid. An examination of the standard salary schedules attached will aid in determining what bonus should be given the employees in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance.

It should be stated that because of the rule which was adopted that no promotion should be made until an employee had served at least three months, and that no promotion should be made of more than $240 at one time, there are still thousands of persons in the bureau who are receiving less than the standadr pay fixed for the kinds of work they are performing. Under the rules laid down for fixing the value of the services of employees a clerk performing a quantity and quality of work far above the standard might be paid more than the standard salary, but since the first ratings were made in great haste, and were therefore more or less imperfect, the rule was adopted that no promotion above the standard salary should be made at the first rating.

The salaries have been standardized and promotions made under them in the following divisions: Allotments and allowances, accounts, actuarial, and compensation and claims. The standard salaries, and recommendations for promotions under them, have been submitted in the following offices, but so far as we are informed the promotions have not yet been made: Administrative, insurance, legal, and receipts and disbursements.

The increases that have been made in the salaries paid to employees in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance since last July have amounted to more than a million dollars a year. The recommendations already made, but which have not yet been acted on by the bureau, will bring this amount up to $1,300,000 a year. With subsequent ratings under these standard salaries, this amount will be still further increased. The amount of this increase can not be stated at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is upon the committee amendment as reported.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator having charge of the bill what the aggregate amount of this increase of salaries will be if the bill passes with the committee amendment?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I suppose that this matter had better go into the RECORD officially. I send to the desk and ask to have read by the Secretary a letter from Mr. Herbert D. Brown, chief of the Bureau of Efficiency, stating the facts in answer to the Senator's question, as I have already asked Mr. Brown the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letter will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

UNITED STATES BUREAU OF EFFICIENCY,
Washington, February 4, 1919.

Hon. OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR UNDERWOOD: You asked me this morning over the telephone to make an estimate of the cost to the Government of granting an allowance of $240 or $360 a year in lieu of the $120 allowance which is now being paid to employees of the Government.

Attached to this letter is a statement which we prepared last year showing our estimate of the cost of the $120 provision now in force. This statement shows that we estimated at that time that the $120 provision would cover 263,300 people and that the total cost of the $120 provision would amount to $31,500,000, including the cost of the allowance to members of the Postal Service but not to employees of the arsenals, navy yards, Panama Canal, and Alaskan Railway. Excluding the Postal Service, we estimated that the provision would cover 123,200 employees and that the total cost would be $14,600,000. As the provision was finally adopted, the members of the Postal Service were excluded.

Attached to this letter is also a statement from the Treasury Department which shows that for the six months ending December 31, 1918, the actual expenditures on account of the $120 provision amounted to $7,284,007. At this rate the total expenditures for the year would be $14,568,000 or $32,000 less than our estimate.

It is impossible within the time available to make a very careful analysis of the probable cost of the proposed bonus of $240 a year but I believe that in most instances the number of employees included in our estimate of last year will not vary greatly during the ensuing year. On this assumption, the cost for the current year of $14,600,000 should be doubled. This would bring the cost up to $29,200,000. To this amount should be added the cost of whatever allowance is made to the employees of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. As I understand it, the employees of that bureau are to receive $120 instead of $240 because the allowance of $120 for the current year is included in the standard salaries that have been adopted by the bureau. It is difficult to estimate the number of employees that will be required in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance during the fiscal year 1920, but if we assume the roll to include 13,000 people, then we should add $1,560,000 to the $29,200,000 mentioned above. This will bring the total cost of the $240 increase up to $30,760,000. I know of no other offices where large increases are likely to occur.

If increased compensation is granted employees at the rate of $360, the cost of $29,200,000 mentioned above would be increased by 50 per cent, or $14,600,000, making a total of $43,800,000. To this amount should be added $3,120,000 ($1,560,000×2) for the employees of the War Risk Bureau, or a grand total of $46,920,000.

I have made no allowance for any reduction in the civilian clerical force of the War Department. A large reduction will be made in the clerical force of that department through the discharge of drafted men engaged on clerical work. The large amount of salvage and accounting work yet to be done by the department will probably make it necessary to keep all of the civilian clerks they now have.

Very truly, yours,

HERBERT D. BROWN,
Chief, Bureau of Efficiency.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to ask that the document which accompanies that letter be printed in the RECORD. I shall not take the time to read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, we are about to add approximately $31,00,000 to the compensation of the employees included within the section. I have too often attempted to obtain some consideration of the fact that the compensation which this increase represents only serves to increase the expenses of the employees receiving it to take up the time of the Senate in making the effort again. Of course, as long as the increase has received the approval of the committee it will in all probability pass by the usual majority.

But I want to offer an amendment after the word "countries," in line 17, page 155, by striking out the period and inserting a semicolon, and adding the following words:

Employees working less than eight hours per day.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Under the agreement that the committee amendments should have consideration before other amendments that amendment is not in order.

Mr. THOMAS. I thought the vote was taken on the committee amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee amendments have not been entirely disposed of, and the amendment of the Senator from Colorado will be considered just a little later.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There is just one committee amendment yet.

Mr. THOMAS. I assumed that the amendment to which the Senator from Kansas offered his amendment had been adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not been adopted.

Mr. THOMAS. Then, of course, I will wait.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire at the proper time to offer an amendment in lieu of the committee amendment on page 154. Will that be in order now?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If it is an amendment in lieu of the committee amendment it is in order now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is in order now.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. At the foot of page 154, in lieu of the committee amendment, insert:

And in which the salaries have been fixed upon a basis, inclusive of temporary salary increases granted by law, since that date, such employees to receive increased compensation under this act at one-half the rate allowed by this section.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, the object of the amendment is to put all the bureaus and divisions that have been created since January 1, 1916, on the same basis the committee places the War Risk Insurance Bureau. The representatives of the Federal employees had the following to say about it:

Furthermore, the specific mention of the War Risk Bureau in the Appropriations Committee's report creates certain inequalities with respect to other war bureaus or divisions in older departments created by law since January 1, 1916, where the salaries have not been fixed upon the basis calculated for the War Risk Bureau—in fact, have been fixed on a prewar basis. In order to adjust this inconsistency and at the same time, we believe, to carry out the intent of the Appropriations Committee, we suggest the amendment above mentioned.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I do not think that will do. We carefully investigated the proposals that came before the committee. Several other bureaus have been created since, and we investigated them like we did this bureau. We found they were getting the increased salary already, and that they were being paid under lump-sum appropriations. If you adopt this amendment, I will not say that every clerk in the Government, because I can not see that far, but if you adopt this amendment you are going to lift a lot of clerks who have already been getting higher salaries than the statutory clerks and pay above the basis. The Senate can not afford to do that. It is a question if you are going to equalize salaries to have a committee that will work it out. I will say to the Senator in reference to every one of these proposals of these other bureaus we gave them careful investigation.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Will not what the Senator says happen in the War Risk Insurance Bureau under the amendment you have presented?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; we investigated the War Risk Insurance Bureau, we had the Bureau of Efficiency investigate it, and on that report made this increase in the language we did, to equalize it with the statutory bureaus. You are playing in millions on this question. I think it would be most unwise to bet the game blind, and that is what it amounts to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Texas offered as a substitute.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator from Alabama permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to ask him in what respect the employees of the War Risk Bureau differ from the employees of these other bureaus?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the Senator that we have an old statutory roll here that fixed the salaries before the war of most clerks, not absolutely equal, but in the main they were carried in the same class of salary. There were certain lump-sum appropriations that were from time to time given to these bureaus and departments, and the salaries under the lump-sum appropriations were fixed at that basis. But then the war came along and a large number of new bureaus, some of them temporary bureaus for the war purposes, and some that are proving to be permanent bureaus, were established, with no limitation on the pay roll, but just a lump sum thrown out and the head of the bureau was told to employ people. On our investigation we found that the basis of salary which was fixed at that time was way above the statutory salary and the statutory pay as the basis for other clerks. Our effort here has been merely to equalize that. More than that, the clerks in the War Risk Bureau came here under a war basis and under a war salary. They got an increase that was so satisfactory that it has attracted them from other positions to come here and get this increased salary. That is not true of the old bureaus.

Mr. LENROOT. No; my inquiry was not as to the old bureaus, but as to the difference between the employees in the War Risk Bureau and the employees in other bureaus created since January 1, 1916.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will explain that the War Risk Bureau was established originally on the basis of a statutory bureau. Then there was the increase given to them to equalize or more than equalize the increased bonus we gave to statutory bureaus last year; but these other bureaus, as far as we investigated them, not only had more than that increase, but vastly more in salary. I am not speaking about individuals, but I am speaking about averages. We could not go into individuals. The salaries were vastly more and are more now than that of the clerks in statutory bureaus with the bonus added.

Mr. LENROOT. That may be true of the higher positions, but is that true of the ordinary grade clerk?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is more true of the low position than it is of the high position.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, from such investigation as I have been able to make, which accorded with the investigation made by the committee so far as the Bureau of War Risk Insurance is concerned, I have not been able to find any distinction between the employees of the War Risk Bureau and the employees of these other bureaus. It does seem to me that they all ought to be put upon an equality.

When the Senator says that the employees of these other bureaus are now receiving the benefit of the $120 increase, that is true; but so are the employees of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance now receiving the benefit of the $120 increase. If we are to give a further increase of $120, as this bill does, to the regular employees that it gives to employees of the War Risk Bureau, I can not for the life of me see why the employees in these other bureaus should not be entitled to the same increase.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered as a substitute by the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] to the amendment of the committee on page 154 of the bill.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the committee amendment.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. Has the amendment been adopted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not yet been adopted. Has the Senator from New York an amendment to this amendment?

Mr. CALDER. I have not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the committee on page 154 of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I now offer the amendment to which I called attention a few moments ago. On page 155, line 17, in the House text, after the word "country," I move to strike out the period and insert a semicolon and the words "employees working less than eight hours per day."

Mr. President, just a word in regard to this amendment. A very substantial increase will be made to this bill for the compensation of employees, and the Senator having the bill in charge has told the Senate that an attempt has been made to equalize the compensation as far as the committee could do so. In connection with this increase, which in the aggregate is enormous, and in connection with the attempt to equalize the compensation, there should also be an effort to equalize the hours of employment.

It is the purpose of this amendment to place within the excepted classes those employees who do not at present serve the Government the usual number of hours generally prevailing—that is to say, eight hours.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

On a division the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CALDER. I submit the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, line 5, after the semicolon and before the word "in" insert——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from New York is an amendment to the committee amendment which has already been agreed to. He will have to ask for a reconsideration. Without objection, a reconsideration is ordered, and now the Secretary will report the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, line 5, in the committee amendment before the word "in" insert:

Ninety-four additional clerks at $1,200 each, one for each Senator having no more than one clerk and two assistant clerks for himself or for the committee of which he is the chairman.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I merely wished to discuss the amendment.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, this amendment puts into the regular appropriation a provision for a continuance during the next fiscal year of the additional clerks authorized during the present session, which were paid out of the contingent fund.

I know everyone will agree that this additional clerk is needed. For my part not only do I need this clerk, but I pay out of my own pocket for two additional clerks, and I know many Senators pay out of their own pockets to take care of assistants in their offices.

I believe the Senate ought to supply sufficient clerical aid for Senators. If I could have my way about it, I would establish a fund here that would give every Senator all the assistants needed in his office. In my office we need at least eight. We have six, four paid for by the Government and two paid for by myself.

I hope this amendment will prevail. I think Senators generally understand what it means, and I do not believe it requires any further explanation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, the effect of the amendment will be to make a charge on the Treasury of something over $115,000 a year for additional clerk hire for the Members of the Senate. I have not any doubt that there are certain Senators here who either because of the size of their States or the tremendous pressure of business on them at times for some reasons require more than the three clerks who are now provided by law for Senators, but a large number of Senators do not require an additional clerk. I have a reasonable amount of business to do, and I attend to my business with three clerks. I had the opportunity of appointing an additional clerk this year, but I have not found it necessary to do so. I know that is true of a good many other Senators.

I would be perfectly willing to take care of this situation in the future, for Senators who really needed it, out of the contingent fund of the Senate, but to create a statutory provision where an additional clerk, at $1,200, will be given to each Senator, when probably half of them do not require the service, at a cost of $115,000 to the Government of the United States I do not believe we are justified in doing, and I think the amendment ought to be defeated.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I can only speak in this matter out of the abundance of experience I have in my own office, and I want to say that no three clerks ought to be required to do the work in my office. If other Senators are situated as I am, they need four clerks, and those four clerks will be about as busy as any young people ought to be required to be. If this amendment is not adopted something ought to be done to relieve Senators from the larger States.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. I do not believe that any Senator is going to have in his office at Government expense more clerks than are required. I do know that I will require more than the Government furnishes me.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have just said that out of the contingent fund of the Senate at the next session I think any Senators who need more clerical force to attend to their business should have it, and it can be provided in that way. But if you adopt this amendment you make it a permanent part of the organization of the Senate that each Senator shall have four clerks, whether he needs them or not.

Mr. POMERENE. Then, may I suggest this amendment to the one offered by the Senator from New York:

Provided, That the Senator seeking to employ this additional clerk will certify to the necessity of that employment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think that covers the case. I think it ought to be taken up as it has in the past and paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate. I hope the Senate will not adopt the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York to the amendment.

On a division the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment on page 3.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I understand that the amendment offered by the Senator from New York to the committee amendment was agreed to. Has the amendment as amended been agreed to?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not. The Senator from Delaware is entirely correct about that. If the Senator from Massachusetts will withhold his amendment for a moment, the Chair will put the question. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment on page 10, as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to offer an amendment on page 3, line 6, to strike out "$3,000" and insert "$3,500"; and in the same line to strike out the words "assistants—two at $2,250 each" and to insert "first assistant, John W. Lambert, $2,500"; and then to insert "one assistant at $2,250."

Mr. President, I desire to say a word in explanation of the amendment. The document room is of great importance to the business and comfort of the Senate. Mr. Boyd, the head of the office, has been in the service of the Senate for 48 years. He has been for many years in his present place, named by the bill. His salary has not been advanced since 1888. As it is given to him by name, it is not permanent, but it only goes to him while he is the incumbent of the office.

The other amendments which I offer on behalf of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] cover the case of Mr. Lambert, who is now the principal assistant in the document room. He is a singularly valuable man, and I should be very glad to see him also named in the bill, as is Mr. Boyd, with this slight increase of $250 in his salary, because of the importance of the document room to the service of the Senate. I think both men ought to have these trifling increases.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not like to raise a question against the faithful, deserving employees of the Senate. We have here an exceptionally fine set of men. There is, however, a limit to which we can go. There have been a number of increases already put on this bill for Senate employees and for clerks. Of course, it is for the Senate to determine as to how far it wants to go; but if we continue to put these increases into the bill whenever they are proposed I do not see how the Senate expects its conferees to accomplish what they desire. There is a limit to carrying this load; a limit that we can get the House to agree to. We are within a few days of the end of the session, and there are a great many things in the bill that we want. I think we have about reached the time when we should draw the line. I have nothing to say against the particular amendment which the Senator from Massachusetts offers. I have no doubt these men are deserving.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I wish to say a word in favor of the entire amendment. Mr. Boyd has been in his present position for many years, and since 1888 there has been no increase in his salary. He has been a most efficient officer.

Mr. Lambert has been in his position for six years and he is also a most efficient officer. The salary he is now getting is $2,250. Everybody recognizes that it is almost impossible for him to live on it. This is an increase of only $250. He is the first assistant in the document room. Of course, the work of the position has grown largely and he is rendering very valuable service. I think every Senator will readily agree with me that not only is he an efficient and a courteous man, thoroughly familiar with the office, but that he is one who renders more service perhaps than any other man, except the principal, who has been there for many years.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. [Putting the question.] The ayes appear to have it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask for a division on the amendment.

The question being put, on a division the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KIRBY, Mr. HENDERSON, and others addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. LODGE. I think I have the floor, Mr. President.

Mr. KIRBY. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. LODGE. I thought I had the floor; but I presume I lost it when the Senate took a division.

Mr. KIRBY. I will yield to the Senator, if he so desires.

Mr. LODGE. I have another amendment to offer.

Mr. KIRBY. I have an amendment to offer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Massachusetts next.

Mr. LODGE. Very well.

Mr. KIRBY. I desire to offer an amendment, on page 30, line 2, to strike out the amount of the salary of the superintendent of the Botanic Garden, "$2,250," and to insert "$3,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Under the head of Botanic Garden, on page 30, line 2, after the word "superintendent," it is proposed to strike out "$2,250" and to insert "$3,000," so as to read:

For superintendent, $3,000.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, this amendment is to increase the salary of the superintendent of the Botanic Garden, a man who is altogether capable and efficient, and who has been getting a very small salary under existing conditions as compared with the salaries of the chiefs of other bureaus and divisions of this same department of the service. I think the man, because of what he is compelled to know in order to hold that sort of a position, to be efficient, and to be of advantage to the Government, is entitled to something like a reasonable salary. For that reason I have offered the amendment, and I hope it will be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to offer the following amendment: On page 62, line 12, after the colon, I move to insert:

Provided, That of this amount $184,160 shall be available, to be expended by the Secretary of Labor, in accordance with the estimate submitted by him to the Secretary of the Treasury January 25, 1919.

That is to provide for the extension which will be necessary under the child-labor law. I hold the estimate in my hand, and it gives the purposes of the distribution. It is a regular estimate.

To enable the Secretary of Labor to make inspections and to fulfill such other duties as may be assigned to him for the purpose of carrying into effect, in cooperation with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, the provisions of the bill H. R. 12863, sections 1200–1207, to provide revenue, and for other purposes, which relate to the tax on employment of child labor in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, including traveling expenses.

And so forth.

I do not know whether it is necessary to add that clause, as the amendment refers to it. It adds nothing, as I have said, to the appropriation, but it makes provision for the proper enforcement of the law, the Secretary of Labor now having these inspectors.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit an inquiry, does it subtract that amount from the appropriations given to some other department or agency of the Government?

Mr. LODGE. No; it is taken from the general appropriation which covers all these matters.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the Senator that there was a child-labor law on the statute books, but the Supreme Court decided that it was unconstitutional. A provision of this kind was formerly carried in the bill to enforce the provisions of that child-labor law, but when this recommendation was made to the committee there was no child-labor law on the statute books, and therefore the committee did not insert the appropriation. Since that time the revenue bill has been passed carrying a child-labor provision, which, although not the law, will be the law when the President returns to the United States and signs it. I am not sure about the amount, but I am willing to concede that some amount is needed under the proposed new law.

Mr. LODGE. The item has been very carefully estimated.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. I wish to state to the Senator from Massachusetts that no child-labor law is yet on the statute books. There is a child-labor tax that will have to be collected, but even that has not become a law——

Mr. LODGE. My amendment refers to no statute.

Mr. HARDWICK. And there is no justification whatever for the Senator's amendment.

Mr. LODGE. We are going to have such a law.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; a tax.

Mr. LODGE. It has passed both Houses.

Mr. HARDWICK. But it is in the form of a tax.

Mr. LODGE. We have already made provisions in this bill for items under the revenue bill; they have been made this afternoon.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, what I wish to say to the Senator is that the provision on this subject in the revenue bill is very different from the former law. The provision in the revenue bill provides for a tax, while the previous law provided for an inspection of personal service. I am perfectly willing, of course, to agree to an amendment that is proposed to enforce an existing law—and I regard the provision in its present shape as being practically an existing law, because it will be such within a few days; but I am not informed as to the amount that may be needed. I am willing for the amendment to go——

Mr. HARDWICK. I hope the Senator will not accept the amendment. I am going to make a point of order against it.

Mr. LODGE. It is not subject to a point of order; it is regularly estimated for.

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, no. It is not authorized by existing law. I am not making that suggestion in any technical spirit, but we have not a child-labor law on the statute books; we have a tax which the Treasury Department will have to collect.

Mr. LODGE. The amendment I offer is to collect that tax.

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not think so. There is no authority of law for it, Mr. President, and I make the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. It is in conformity with the estimate of the department.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if it would not be the duty of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and the officials who come under him to proceed to collect the tax provided in the act to which the Senator refers and if in the collection of that tax they find infractions of the law it would be their duty doubtless to take such steps as would be proper?

Mr. LODGE. It is utterly impossible to collect this tax unless the officers know the articles in connection with the manufacture of which child labor is employed. The tax falls on articles in which child labor is used, and therefore they must have that information in order to impose the tax.

Mr. KING. What I have in mind is the fact that the duties resting upon the internal-revenue officers are manifold; they have to make inspection of the business of corporations to find out whether or not they have profits, and the bill carries a large appropriation to enable them to perform their functions.

Mr. LODGE. This is to give them the benefit of the work of the Children's Bureau, which now exists and is used to enforce the law which already is found on the statute books and which gathers statistics in regard to child labor. The bureau is there; it is provided for by statute, and has appropriations made for gathering statistics. They see to the enforcement of the law in the District of Columbia. This amendment is to extend the work of that bureau and to enable the Internal Revenue Bureau to have the benefit of the information collected by the Children's Bureau, so that it may collect the taxes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, there would necessarily be a duplication. The Internal Revenue Commissioner has certain duties to perform, among them that of collecting taxes and in ascertaining the taxes to be collected——

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will permit me, it is not a duplication, because the service does not exist in the Internal Revenue Bureau. They have no means of collecting the information. It is to prevent duplication; it is to prevent the establishment of another body of inspectors in the Internal Revenue Bureau to do what the Labor Department is doing now.

Mr. KING. As I conceive the situation, it is this: Those persons who are engaged in interstate commerce and employ children under a certain age shall be subject to a tax, and it will be the duty of the Internal Revenue Commissioner to collect that tax upon the persons engaged in such business.

Mr. LODGE. And you must give him additional inspectors.

Mr. KING. Well, the Internal Revenue Commissioner has assigned to him a very large sum—ten or eleven million dollars—with which to enforce the law.

Mr. LODGE. That is what this is taken from.

Mr. KING. He has the machinery with which to carry out the law.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will excuse me, I am a member of the Finance Committee, and I say to the Senator the commissioner has not the machinery. Here is the machinery made to his hand. What the Senator is desiring is to duplicate what already exists.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not want any duplication; I want to prevent duplication.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator is going directly at a duplication.

Mr. KING. The Internal Revenue Commissioner is charged with the responsibility of collecting the tax, and, therefore, he should see to it that the law with respect to it is enforced.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I should like to be heard briefly on the point of order I have made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, the point of order ought first to be settled before the merits of the question are argued. Rule XVI provides:

> And no amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill or to add a new item of appropriation unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law or treaty stipulation or act or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session, or unless the same be moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate or proposed in pursuance of an estimate of the head of some one of the departments.

There is no law that authorizes this proposed appropriation.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I will ask the Secretary to give me the amendment. I have a right to modify my amendment.

Mr. HARDWICK. Of course; I am not making any technical point as to that. If the Senator wants to change his amendment, I should like to have him do so, so that I may know what the amendment is.

Mr. LODGE. I have a right to modify the amendment.

Mr. HARDWICK. Not in my time.

Mr. LODGE. Well, the Senator can go on. I will modify the amendment, so that it will not be subject to the point of order, but I do not wish to take the Senator's time if he desires to discuss his point of order.

Mr. HARDWICK. I will be glad to yield to the Senator to allow him to make the change now. I do not wish to be technical about it, but I do not think the Senator has a leg to stand on.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to change the amendment so that it will read:

> In accordance with the estimate submitted by him to the Secretary of the Treasury January 25, 1919, for the enforcement of any law relating to child labor hereafter enacted.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, there is no law now relating to child labor, and none is proposed.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will pardon me, there is a law relative to child labor, and there is an entire bureau to deal with it.

Mr. HARDWICK. That bureau has fallen to the ground by reason of the fact that the highest court in the land has decided that the law on which it was based is unconstitutional.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator surely can not be right. They have not decided that it is unconstitutional to gather statistics about child labor.

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, no.

Mr. LODGE. Or that the law was unconstitutional as applied to the District of Columbia; and that bureau exists for that purpose.

Mr. HARDWICK. But the part of the machinery that the Senator wants to employ, and which he has in mind now, has no legal right to existence in this country. There is no existing law that either authorizes or proposes to cover the Senator's proposal. We have a pending revenue bill which has not become a law. I do not know what its legal status is; it is like Mahomet's coffin; it is not signed and it is not presented; I do not know where it is or what the status of it is; but I think there is a pending proposal that we shall levy a tax on certain kinds of products. That would be no justification whatever for this, nor do I understand it. There was a good deal of confusion here. I did not catch very clearly what the Senator said nor hear very plainly what the Secretary read; but, as I understand, the Senator has no estimate.

Mr. LODGE. I have an estimate—an official estimate.

Mr. HARDWICK. From whom?

Mr. LODGE. From the Secretary of Labor.

Mr. HARDWICK. From the Secretary of Labor, under the old law?

Mr. LODGE. Not under any old law at all. It refers to the new law hereafter to be enacted.

Mr. HARDWICK. The revenue law?

Mr. LODGE. The revenue law.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Secretary of Labor has asked it for the revenue law?

Mr. LODGE. He has a right to make an estimate for that purpose.

Mr. HARDWICK. He has no right, under the statutes of the United States, to make an estimate for the revenue law.

Mr. LODGE. It comes through the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HARDWICK. Does the Secretary of the Treasury submit that regularly to Congress? Will the Senator let me see it? I have not had an opportunity to see it.

Mr. LODGE. It was sent to the Secretary of the Treasury by the Secretary of Labor on January 25.

Mr. HARDWICK. Sent to the Secretary of the Treasury? Well, it has not come here.

Mr. LODGE. That was too late for the revenue bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. Then, it is not here. If he has just sent a recommendation to the Secretary of the Treasury, the Senator would not claim that that was an estimate. Let us see what it is. It is just a memorandum, sent here by the Secretary of Labor, suggesting to the Secretary of the Treasury that he ought to do this thing, and the Senator calls that an estimate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. May the Chair ask the Senator from Georgia a question?

Mr. HARDWICK. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has not seen the opinion of the Supreme Court. In declaring the child-labor law invalid did the Supreme Court declare the whole act invalid, or did it confine its opinion to declaring invalid that provision which imposed a restriction on interstate commerce?

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, the whole act, if the Chair pleases.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The act, as the Chair recalls it, provided for an elaborate system—either that act or the act to which this amendment refers.

Mr. HARDWICK. There is another law which provided for quite a system of inspectors, and so on; and the Chair evidently has that in mind. That has no relation whatever to the question pending before the Senate. The question pending before the Senate is this: The Senator from Massachusetts now moves to insert in this bill an amendment providing funds for enforcing the provision in the pending revenue bill that has not become the law; and he submits in support of that proposal, what? A memorandum from the Secretary of Labor.

Mr. LODGE. It is not a memorandum; it is an estimate from the head of that department. I suggest that the Senator from Georgia read the rule.

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, the Senator from Georgia has read the rule, and is quite familiar with it.

Mr. LODGE. I am glad he has, because it is in pursuance of an estimate of the head of some one of the departments.

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, I think the Senator from Massachusetts is begging the question.

Mr. LODGE. I am not begging the question.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am giving the Senator my opinion of his position.

Mr. LODGE. This is an estimate submitted by the head of one of the departments.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; but it is not an estimate submitted by the head of the department having the matter in charge, and the Senator knows it full well.

Mr. LODGE. It does not make any difference, under the rule, whether it is submitted by the head of that department or not, so long as it is submitted by the head of some one of the departments.

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, no! If the Senator is right, then if the Secretary of Labor sent us an estimate recommending the construction of three battleships, that would be authority for such an amendment on this floor. [Laughter.]

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield to me?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator whether he thinks this whole provision of $21,000,000, the whole paragraph which this amendment seeks to amend, is in order or out of order?

Mr. HARDWICK. Why, that question is not pending. I should say that I should think it is in order.

Mr. LENROOT. If the Senator thinks it is in order, I want to call his attention to the fact that this $21,000,000 appropriation is for the purpose of enforcing the revenue act of 1918, which has not yet been signed by the President, and in which is included this very provision.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; but I will call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to the Senate rule which makes that in order when it is reported by a standing committee of the Senate. Now the Senator from Massachusetts proposes this amendment from the floor, which is a very different proposition in the Senate of the United States. Now, let us see:

All annual estimates for the public service shall be submitted to Congress through the Secretary of the Treasury, and shall be included in the Book of Estimates prepared under his direction.

There is no estimate here that the Senator from Massachusetts can rely on unless he has an estimate submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury to Congress, and not a memorandum or something that he calls an estimate from the Secretary of Labor addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury. There is no law, there is no estimate, and the point of order is absolutely good, in my opinion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will hear from the Senator from Massachusetts on the point of order.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I can only say that this is a general appropriation, made to carry out, among other things, the provisions—the appropriation is framed on that basis—of the revenue act which has not yet been signed by the President. I modified my amendment so as to make it "hereafter enacted," which, I think, avoids that point.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. One word further. This is an estimate regularly sent in by the Secretary of Labor to the Treasury Department. It is in pursuance of an estimate of the head of some one of the departments, which meets the provision of our rule. It does not seem to me to be out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair overrules the point of order; and the Senator from Georgia may appeal, if he desires.

Mr. HARDWICK. Why, Mr. President, just simply in the interest of something like an intelligent exposition of the rules, I think, I must take an appeal, although I do not want to take up the time of the Senate at this late hour. I believe I will address the Senate on it briefly, too. I hate very much to do it at this time of the evening. I suppose, though, we have plenty of time.

Every Member of the Senate, I suppose, is familiar with Rule XVI, which provides that when a Member from the floor proposes an amendment to a general appropriation bill he must have either authority of law or an estimate. Now, there is no authority of law for this appropriation, it is admitted. They have what the Chair rules to be an estimate, in that the Secretary of Labor sent to the Secretary of the Treasury a memorandum saying that something like this ought to be done. I call attention not only to the rule but to the thing to which I directed the attention of the Chair, the Revised Statutes of the United States, which provide that—

All annual estimates for the public service shall be submitted to Congress through the Secretary of the Treasury, and shall be included in the Book of Estimates prepared under his direction—and hereafter all estimates of appropriations and estimates of deficiencies in appropriations intended for consideration, and seeking the action of any committee of the Congress, shall be transmitted to Congress through the Secretary of the Treasury, and in no other manner.

Now, the Senator from Massachusetts, with the august sanction of the Chair, has announced the proposition to the Senate of the United States that if one Secretary sends to another a memorandum saying that an estimate ought to be sent to Congress for a thing like that, that amounts to an estimate under the standing rules of the Senate.

I am ready to vote on the matter.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, in so far as this amendment is claimed to be out of order under the rule referred to by the Senator, I submit that the rule makes it expressly in order, as he will see in a moment.

No amendment shall be received to any general appropriation bill the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add a new item of appropriation, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law or treaty stipulation—

Now, that is not the case here—or act, or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session.

And this act has already passed the Senate at this session. Now, the other alternative:

Or unless the same be moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, or proposed in pursuance of an estimate—

That has nothing whatever to do with the question. This child-labor taxation law passed the Senate at this session; and the amendment, therefore, is in order.

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator, I think, is in utter error, if he will excuse me for putting it that strongly. I have a very high regard for him, and I know that he would not make an intentional error; but he is in error in his expression when he says that this is something that has passed the Senate during the present session. That means a measure that has passed the Senate in the form of an appropriation—a bill or resolution making an appropriation.

Mr. LENROOT. No; the language is:

Unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law or treaty stipulation or act or resolution previously passed by the State during that session.

Now, what has been done with reference to the child-labor taxation law? It has imposed a tax. It has directed the Secretary of the Treasury to enforce that law. It has further provided in that act that upon application of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue or the Secretary of the Treasury he may call upon the Secretary of Labor to assist him in the enforcement of this law, and that is all that this amendment seeks to do. But, further than that, Mr. President, this amendment makes no appropriation. It increases no appropriation. It merely provides for making available a certain portion of an appropriation that is made in this bill. From every standpoint it is clearly in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia appeal from the ruling of the Chair?

Mr. HARDWICK. I do appeal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the ruling of the Chair be sustained?

Upon a division, the ruling of the Chair was sustained.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether out of abundant caution he will not consent to further modifying the amendment by inserting the word "taxation" after the words "child-labor," so as to make it read "child-labor taxation"?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly. I will ask to have the amendment stated as modified.

The SECRETARY. As modified, the amendment reads:

Provided, That of this amount $184,160 shall be available to be expended by the Secretary of Labor in accordance with the estimate submitted by him to the Secretary of the Treasury January 25, 1919, for the enforcement of any law relating to child labor hereafter enacted.

Mr. LENROOT. The word "taxation" should be inserted there.

Mr. LODGE. "Any law relating to the taxation of child labor."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator accept that amendment?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No, Mr. President; we want to know what it is. We want to see whether we object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I withdrew the last modification and will leave it as it stood before.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment as it now stands.

The SECRETARY. On page 62, line 12, after the numerals and after the colon, it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, That of this amount $184,160 shall be available to be expended by the Secretary of Labor in accordance with the estimate submitted by him to the Secretary of the Treasury January 25, 1919, for the enforcement of any law relating to child labor hereafter enacted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, just for the purpose of keeping the permanent RECORD of the Senate straight, to the present proposal of the Senator from Massachusetts I do make a point of order, which I should like to have the RECORD show.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is overruled. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

On a division, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I should like to have the estimate printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

CHILDREN'S BUREAU.

To enable the Secretary of Labor to make inspections and to fulfill such other duties as may be assigned to him for the purpose of carrying into effect, in cooperation with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, the provisions of the bill (H. Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, line 5, in the item relative to the press gallery of the Senate, in the salary of the superintendent, it is proposed to strike out "$1,800" and to insert in lieu thereof "$2,500."

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I think that in attainment, faithful service, character, and inadequacy of compensation, the superintendent of the press gallery is entitled to as many superlatives as any officer of the Senate who has been benefited by our action here this afternoon, and then some. Moreover, Mr. President, inasmuch as the popular view of our statesmanlike qualities is largely made up by the work of the press gallery, there may be a sentimental reason for our taking action here, which seems to be the only manner by which we can express our appreciation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES].

On a division the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON. I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. In line 16, page 10, strike out "$2,000" at the end of the line, and insert in lieu "$2,500," so as to read:

Acting Assistant Doorkeeper, $3,000, two floor assistants at $2,500 each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. On page 68, line 10, I move to amend by striking out "$1,800" and inserting "$2,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 68, line 10, relative to the Carson, (Nev.) mint, the bill reads:

Assayer in charge, who shall also perform the duties of melter, $1,800.

It is now proposed to strike out "$1,800" and in lieu to insert "$2,000."

Mr. SMOOT. I know the Senate is running away on these matters. I suppose Senators do not care what they put in the bill, but I want to say to the Senator from Nevada that if we begin to raise salaries in the mints we are going to lose the whole mints. We have had a mighty hard time to keep them in the bill in the past.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have been informed that the salary was $2,000 some years ago, and it is hard now under present conditions to live on $1,800. I simply propose to make it $2,000.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator knows that no one made a harder fight for the retention of the mints and assay offices than I did. In fact, we remained here one night all night long, at the close of a short session of Congress, in order to keep them in the bill. But the impression is and the feeling is in the House of Representatives that they should go out. I hope the Senator will not insist at this time on raising the salaries for these assay offices. I appeal to him because I know what is back of it, and I do not think it will do any good. It will go out in conference, and it will only tend to arouse a feeling that I do know exists.

Mr. HENDERSON. I feel, Mr. President, that this is the smallest amount that is asked as a raise, $200; and it is just as necessary as any other raise or any amount that is in the bill. One thousand eight hundred dollars is the salary of the assayer at the Carson Mint, and he can not live on it. He probably can not more than get through with $2,000. I think the amendment is just and fair. I do not see why the Members of the House should object to this slight raise.

Mr. SMOOT. All I say is I am not going to ask that the same thing be done for the assay offices in Utah, because I know what the result ultimately will be, and as a friend of the assay offices of the country I am not going to ask for an increase.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON].

On a division, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to offer an amendment at page 106 of the bill. The purpose of the amendment is to change the item from $3,500 to $4,500, and to change the footing from $50,000 to $106,000. The object of it is to increase the limitation upon salaries in the Bureau of Education. It is very difficult now to get men of proper caliber and ability and training and education and skill to carry on this work at a salary of $3,500. That is absolutely the outside salary. I therefore offer the amendment, and I ask the Secretary to read it.

The SECRETARY. On page 106 the paragraph reads:

For investigation of rural education, industrial education, physical education, and school hygiene, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, and no salary shall be paid hereunder in excess of $3,500 per annum, $50,000.

It is now proposed to strike out in line 13 "$3,500" and to insert in lieu "$4,500" and to change the figure in line 14 from "$50,000" to "$106,000."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the Senator from Florida I do not think it is possible to accomplish any result in conference with these amendments carrying increases. I thought at first that the proposal is in line with the current law, but I understand it is not.

Mr. FLETCHER. The original act of 1867, establishing this bureau, provides its duties, for the collection of statistics and facts showing the condition and progress of education in the several States and Territories and to diffuse such information respecting the organization and management of schools and school systems and methods of teaching as shall aid the people of the United States in the establishment and maintenance of a national school system and otherwise promote the cause of education throughout the country.

The object of the amendment is to raise the limitation upon the salaries and to increase the personnel of the three important lines of work covered by the item, so that it may be carried on strongly and effectively. A comparatively small part of the increase, after all, goes to the increase in salaries—not more than 25 per cent. The balance of it provides for an increase in personnel.

I am not going to take the time of the Senate to press the matter. It is very important work. We can not fail to look after the educational interests, hygiene, health, and welfare of the people as contemplated by the act. Calls from all over the country come for advice and assistance from teachers and schools, and the information can not be furnished unless you provide the money by which men can be employed to get it.

Mr. SMOOT. It is not the calls so much for assistance as it is for dollars and cents. They would not care very much about the assistance unless it carried with it dollars and cents.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

On a division, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment submitted by the Senator from Maryland.

The SECRETARY. On page 153, line 8, strike out the figures "$240" and insert in lieu thereof "$360."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, if the Senator from Maryland will allow me, I desire to make a point of order against that amendment. I make the point of order that it increases the appropriation on this bill without being recommended by the committee, that it is not estimated for by the head of any department, and, third, that it is not moved by the direction of any standing or select committee of the Senate. It seems to me clearly that it is within Rule XVI. The Chair is familiar with the rule, as it has just been read. I therefore make the point of order, and I think that ought to be disposed of first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will hear the Senator from Maryland on the point of order.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I do not feel that I care to discuss the point of order at this time. I realize that this amendment is subject to a point of order. I hoped that the chairman of the subcommittee would not make the point of order; but since he has made it, I am willing to submit to the judgment of the Chair. I do not care to detain the Senate at this time with any argument on the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is sustained. Does the Senator from Maryland desire to insist upon the other two amendments which he sent to the desk?

Mr. FRANCE. They form really one amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. I send to the desk the following amendment, to be inserted on page 147, after line 20.

District court for the District of Panama: District judge, $7,500 per annum, from March 1, 1919, to June 30, 1920, both dates inclusive.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I will state the reason for this amendment. Senators will recall that the salaries of all the district judges were increased. This bill especially provides for the increase of the salaries of the two district judges in the Territory of Hawaii and also in the Territory of Porto Rico, but the one lone judge in Panama was overlooked. It is to correct what I think is an oversight that I offer this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

The question being put, a division was called for.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin desire to make some inquiry?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I thought I would make some observations on this proposed amendment, but I can wait.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin has the right to make remarks. The Senator is recognized.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, it seems to me there ought not to be any question about raising the salary of this judge. I do not suppose any point of order can be made against the amendment, and I doubt, Mr. President, if it were subject to a point of order whether any point of order would be made against it, because it has been the practice of Congress to raise the salaries of Senators and Representatives and Cabinet officers and their assistants, and judges, but when any suggestion is made to the Congress of the United States that there should be an increase in the salaries of the employees of the Government who are earning less than enough to sustain life, every technicality that can be suggested and every argument that can be made is interposed to stop it.

There have been some investigations conducted by people entirely competent to make them as to the lowest possible amount upon which a family in this country can be subsisted. Such investigations were made in New York City in 1914. They have been conducted by this Government under an authorization by the United States Senate here in the District of Columbia. In 1914 a body of economists in New York City, after a thoroughgoing investigation, determined at that time that with the cost of living as it then stood, not less than $880 could possibly carry a family of three children, a father, and mother through to the end of the year. Since that time the cost of living has advanced from 75 to 100 per cent.

I think that it was in 1916 that, under authority conferred by the Congress, an investigation as to the cost of living was conducted by Government officials here in the city of Washington, and it was ascertained that the lowest possible sum upon which a family of five could be supported here in the District of Columbia in 1916 was $1,080. Since that time the cost of living has steadily mounted.

Mr. President, I am aware of the fact that it is not at all popular to discuss this side of the proposition here in the Senate, but I never have been guided by considerations of that sort in my course. I am not at all surprised that so many Senators retire to the cloakroom when the attention of the country is to be called to the fact that since 1905 we have made the following increases in the salaries higher up.

The President's salary has been increased 50 per cent; the salary of the Private Secretary to the President has been increased 50 per cent; the salary of the Vice President has been increased 50 per cent; the salary of the secretary to the Vice President has been increased 81 per cent; salaries of United States Senators have been increased 50 per cent; salaries of Representatives in Congress have been increased 50 per cent; the salary of the Secretary of the Senate has been increased 30 per cent; of the Sergeant at Arms 44 per cent; the salary of the Speaker of the House of Representatives has been increased 50 per cent; of the secretary to the Speaker 33 per cent; of the Clerk of the House 30 per cent; of the Chief Clerk 25 per cent; of the Sergeant at Arms 44 per cent; of the Doorkeeper 42 per cent; the Secretary of State, 50 per cent; the Secretary of the Treasury, 50 per cent; the Secretary of War, 50 per cent; the Attorney General, 50 per cent; the Postmaster General, 50 per cent; the Secretary of the Navy 50 per cent; the Secretary of the Interior, 50 per cent; and the Secretary of Agriculture, 50 per cent.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Will the Senator state what period that covers?

Mr. LAFOLLETTE. From 1905 to 1915.

Senators find occasion for agitated inquiry here as to the subject of unrest in this country. The salary of the Chief Justice was increased 15 per cent, and the Associate Justices 16 per cent. The salary of the Chief Justice was raised from $13,500 to $15,000 a year; the Associate Justices from $12,000 to $14,000; the circuit judges from $7,000 to $8,500; the district judges from $6,000 to $7,500.

Two years ago on this floor I made an appeal to the Senate one night calling attention to some of these increases in the salaries of the higher-ups, and succeeded in getting the approval of the Senate for an increase for the employees in the Bureau of Indian Affairs, which was on a conference report, and the vote of the Senate at that time made that increase absolute as to those employees. In order to equalize the salaries of other employees, which was forced upon an unwilling Congress, an increase of $120 a year, as it finally worked out, was obtained in the salaries of Government employees receiving less than over $2,500 a year.

What did that increase of salary amount to in percentages? The increase for those receiving $2,500 was 4 per cent and a fraction; for those receiving $2,400, it was 5 per cent; for those receiving $2,220, it was 5 per cent and a fraction; for those receiving $2,000, it was 6 per cent; for those receiving $1,800, it was 6.6 per cent; for those receiving $1,600, it was 8 per cent; for those receiving $1,440, it was 8.40 per cent; for those receiving $1,400, it was 8.6 per cent; for those receiving $1,300, it was 9.2 per cent; for those receiving $1,200, it was 10 per cent; for those receiving $1,100, it was 10.9 per cent; and for those receiving $1,000, it was 12 per cent.

Now, mark you, when you get down to $1,000 you are down to the line below the level of where you could support away back in 1916 a family of five persons on that salary. Just think of it, Senators! It makes some Senators smile.

The percentage of increase in the salaries of those receiving a salary of $800 was 15; it was an increase in salaries of $720—and you are below the life line now—of 16⅔ per cent; on salaries of $600, it was an increase of 20 per cent; on salaries of $540, it was an increase of 22 per cent; on salaries of $500, it was an increase of 24 per cent; on salaries of $480, it was an increase of 25 per cent; and on salaries of $400, it was an increase of 30 per cent.

Just think of it, Mr. President! Employees of this Government receiving a salary of $400 a year and trying to take care of a family, with the cost of maintaining a family in New York figured at the lowest possible limit, where charity doles out the amount—in New York, away back of the war period, it was $880; in the city of Washington in 1916 it was $1,080.

How did they make up the balance? They found jobs at night. When sickness falls upon the family, when trouble comes, when death throws its shadow across the threshold, collections are taken up among those who are not so unfortunate, upon whom affliction has not yet been visited. That is the way they do it. If you want the testimony for it, it is to be found in the records of the committees of Congress. These Government employees have appeared before the committees of this Congress to plead their cause for higher wages under the conditions that exist to-day, and I have before me here ample evidence which they have furnished of the hard conditions under which they live; how they are compelled to take up collections whenever affliction comes upon a family.

Back of the time of high war prices, Senators will vote themselves an increase of salary of 50 per cent and deny to Government employees a percentage of increase that will sustain life, and yet they marvel and complain and threaten because there is dissatisfaction in this country; they organize investigations to find out why it is that meetings are held and voices are raised protesting against the condition of things that exists here to-day.

Mr. President, the Senate Chamber has been the scene of violent agitation and protest and declamation against complaints that have come from people representing the great protesting majority of this country as to conditions which exist here to-day. We have had the columns of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD filled with maledictions against those who have raised their voices in complaint; but who has stood here in this presence assailing the Beef Trust, the United States Steel Corporation, the great organizations of greed and power that have been builded up in this country in the last 20 years, increasing, against all economic laws that should control prices, the cost of living steadily year by year? Scarcely a voice has been raised.

This serious condition of affairs is not the outgrowth, Mr. President, of the war. It has been on for a long period of time. The great masses of the people of this country are loyal to our system of government, sir. All they ask is justice and a fair chance. They are fairly intelligent; they know pretty well that something has been radically wrong with the economic system of this country. With the consent of the Government, for a score of years the cost of living had been slowly but steadily mounting upon the American people from 1898 down to August, 1914, when we began to feel the effects of the European war. Why was that so? I say to you, sir, that it should not have been so. The cost of living should have steadily decreased right along year by year instead of increasing year by year. Why do I say that? I say it because it is the law of civilization; I say it because the genius of the American people wrought out a system that should have resulted in a continual and steady decline in the cost of living. Throughout all these years the cost of production has steadily decreased, from the time this Government was established down to 1898. Why? Because there was the free play of all the economic forces in this country; because the most inventive country on the face of God's earth had been working out the problems of production and cutting down the cost of producing things by invention and by better organization; and the cost had steadily fallen down to that time.

Then we entered upon an era of the reorganization of business in this country. Up to that time the natural laws of trade and commerce had prevailed; competition had been free between all of the producing industries; but about that time one of the great business geniuses of this country devised a system of combination and control of market prices. It was wrought out in all its details; it took possession of every line of production. Behind the high tariff wall of the McKinley law that shut out foreign competition there was organized a combination between domestic producers; and, as a result of that combination, competition was suppressed, prices were controlled, and the American people began to pay more and more for everything they bought. Study Bradstreet's and Dun's reports and you will find a decline in the cost of production down to that time, and then you will find the cost of production beginning to mount year by year. There was no reason why that should be so, except for this unlawful, unjust, and uneconomic combination that controlled the market prices here among our own producers.

Why, Mr. President, if you will stop a moment to think about it, production cost, by invention, by better organization, by better methods of conducting sales, by better systems, from the raw material to the finished product, should furnish the finished product to the consumer year by year at a declining cost. Can there be any doubt about that? What else does civilization mean? What else does progress mean? The cost of living should have continued to fall year by year, just as it had through the years since the Republic was established, because inventions were more perfect, because methods were improved, because everything that related to the cost of production from the raw material until it reached the consumer as a finished product was being reduced. That is the law of our being; otherwise civilization is a lie.

It should have been easier in 1908 than in 1900 to support a family in this country; it should have been easier in 1910 than in 1908; it should have been easier in 1918 than in 1910, if the natural laws of trade had been given fair, free, and open play; but they were not; competition was suppressed; the amount produced was regulated and controlled and prices were fixed by combinations; and from that hour on the cost of living began to mount upon the people of this country. All the natural laws of trade and commerce, which for 5,000 years had prevailed in organized society, were reversed. Demand, supply, competition, should fix prices. Instead, we had the arbitrary will of a board of directors, operating with other boards of directors who were producing the same line of articles, fixing the prices, agreeing that there should be no competition, that so much of a product should be produced, that it should sell at so much, and able to enforce that upon the American people because of a high protective tariff shutting out foreign competition.

That is the answer and the solution of the increased cost of living from 1898 on. It mounted step by step, step by step. It has denied thousands, tens of thousands, and hundreds of thousands of children the education that their parents would have been able to give them except for that unlawful organization. It has violated every principle of right. It has undermined the principles of democracy. It has well-nigh destroyed, sir, a government of equality of rights. I say to you that instead of the cost of living mounting year by year the cost of living should have fallen year by year.

Oh, but I fancy that some Senator from some Eastern State is saying that "LA FOLLETTE ignores the fact that wages have been increased, and that that accounts for the increased cost to the consumer." Wages have not increased. It is a lie that wages have increased. I am speaking now of the period before the war. Wages fell. Counting the purchasing price of the dollar, wages fell steadily, year by year, under the power of this same controlling force. A competent and authoritative study of the trend of wages from 1900 down to 1914, 14 years, gives us the exact decline—an actual decline of 10 per cent in the wage of the laboring people of this country during that period of advancing prices and rise in the cost of living.

If you are looking for an answer to the question as to why there is unrest in this country, Mr. President, as to why people are striking, and as to why some of the more radical of them are saying extreme things, look for it in the United States Senate to-day. A dozen Senators here when the economic truths of the last 20 years are being recounted! If some Senator should rise here to denounce some meeting that is held where complaint is made, you would see the Senate thronged, and the seats filled; but when the real reason is stated that underlies the complaints that are in the hearts of the great body of the toilers of this country, only a few of whom have yet begun to express themselves, you see empty seats.

I say again, Mr. President, that every economic law that ought to rule society, that ought to regulate prices, that ought to determine wages, has been violated for the last score of years in the United States; and I say, look there if you are on the hunt for the motives that lie back of the surging that is sweeping across this country, that has not yet begun to break in waves, but that just shows in undulations upon the surface, but it represents a deep and a profound agitation below the surface.

Mr. President, the great mass of the American people have never been very far wrong. They have been pretty generally right; and it behooves those who nominally stand as their representatives to pay some heed to their voice when it is raised in protest. That protest has not been very violent. I pray God that it may be heeded in time.

Senators think they have been awfully generous to the Government employees because they have given them $240, an increase of $120 since a year ago. It was an increase of 10 per cent at that time, according to the figures of the Senator from Utah, who is always accurate. You did not flinch much when it came to giving yourselves 50 per cent. I did not see any points of order raised on it. I suppose probably it was not subject to a point of order, but it always lies with any Senator upon this floor to avail himself of a technicality or not, and I venture to suggest that perhaps it would be wise statesmanship not to invoke a technicality against a raise that is equitable and just. Think of an employee of this Government who is receiving $600 or $720, and trying to get along on it, and take care of a family or four or five children, and buy shoes at $3, $4, and $5 a pair!

Mr. President, I expect the salaries of the judges in Porto Rico to be increased. Of course that will just level them up with the other judges whose salaries we have increased, and I expect that the great mass of employees who work for the Government, who on the average earn only $918, or $980 apiece—I do not remember which—I expect that they will stand by you just the same. But mark you, Mr. President, the difference between the way in which they treat these employees and the way in which they treat themselves and the Cabinet officers and the judges. They give them, under the law, a permanent salary, fixed by statute. This is a bonus for the time being, and then you will drop back, you Government employees, to the old wage level of 1855. The wages of the employees of the Government have not been materially changed since 1855, but the salaries of Representatives, of Senators, of judges, of Cabinet officers, of Presidents, of ambassadors, have been raised enormously.

Mr. President, aside from all other questions, aside from the question of what is right and just between man and man, the course you are pursuing is not politic. I venture to say it is unwise statesmanship When the amendment was proposed increasing the amount that should be paid to those employed in the War Risk Bureau the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] warned the Senators that "they were talking in millions now." Mr. President, justice, equity, what is right between employees, does not take account of amounts. When it came to increasing the salaries of United States Senators and Representatives and Cabinet ministers and ambassadors and Supreme Court Judges and Federal judges, all down the list, it would have been well enough then for the Senator from Alabama and for every other Senator on this floor to think about these increases, regardless of the question of whether the amounts were large or small, but on the basis of whether they were just in comparison with what other Government employees were receiving. Those increases were not necessary to provide bread and shelter and clothing for the family. They added to the luxuries that those high officials could bestow upon their families.

I am not complaining, sir, that these increases were made in those salaries. I recognize the existence of this artificial and unjust increase in the cost of living because of the unlawful combinations that have been permitted and that have been never protested by any administration, or only feebly protested, although there was ample power to have stopped them. But since they were permitted to have their way, since combinations and trusts could lay upon the backs of the American people whatever burdens they chose in violation of law, every burden so laid being a criminal act, I do not blame Congress for recognizing that fact and increasing their own salaries and those of the judges and the Cabinet ministers and the ambassadors and others who have received these magnificent additions to their salaries, but what I do protest is your beginning to economize when you come down to make a little, meager addition to the salaries of the mass of the Government employees, who have to figure, oh, so closely, to live. There is the rent, the grocer's bill, the meat bill, the doctor's bill; if there is anyone sick in the family, it is a calamity that calls for a family council in order to know how to meet it. When you come to consider those people who are living so close to the margin of existence, who are struggling for enough to get along with, then, I say, Mr. President, that that is the wrong time to begin to cut and to pare and to be technical.

Mr. President, I do not want to assume the rôle of prophecy. No man knows what the future veils; but I say that we shall be wise if we will try to be just to all the people in this country.

I am not going to protest against this increase in the salary of the judge or judges down in Porto Rico. I rather think they ought to be leveled up with the other fortunate fellows who have floated in on the high tide of congressional generosity or fair dealing.

I am only sorry, Mr. President, that this proposed increase of $1 a day to Government employees to meet the increased cost of living was not agreed to. It was figured out in 1914 by competent tribunals that made investigations, not only in New York City, but elsewhere over this country, fixing about $880 as necessary for the support of a family of five. I regret beyond expression that the proposition here was not accepted to add to that amount a dollar a day to meet the increased cost that everybody agrees has come upon us, and there is plenty of evidence here, and I can read from the testimony of investigators who appeared before committees of Congress, that since 1916 the advance has been more than would be covered by this addition. If it were $240 instead of $120, it would not more than cover the added cost that has come by reason of the increase in the necessities of life.

Mr. President, I apprehend——

Mr. THOMAS. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS. I want to say, first, that I was downstairs at the restaurant trying to get a little sustenance when I heard the Senator was addressing the Senate, and I came right up.

I sympathize entirely with the Senator's attitude regarding the duty which the Congress owes to the employees of the Government on account of the rise in prices. Since I have been in the Senate, I have, as far as I can now recall, voted against every increase in salaries, regardless of the officials the salaries would benefit. My contention has been, and I think it is correct, that those who supply the necessities of life—the landlord, the grocer, the dry-goods man, the shoe man—regulate their prices so as to absorb whatever amount of increase is made in the salaries of the employees, so that instead of benefiting the employees we really benefit the class which caters to their needs.

I have felt, and I think I have stated, on more than one occasion, that the Government can and ought to remedy this condition by fixing a maximum rate of rental and also of supplies, and seeing that through the proper agencies the employees of the Government shall be required to pay no more, covering the difference between the existing rates and the amount so fixed by the Government as a charge against the Treasury. I believe that would give a very substantial measure of relief. I am not a prophet, but I could almost prophesy that this raise which is given now will be followed by a demand for another, because of the consequent need due to the absorption of this increase by the very conditions that make it necessary.

I am prepared to join in an effort to frame some legislation, and to support it to the best of my ability, that will meet this situation and do justice. I am very much afraid it is the only way in which it can be done. I should like to have the opinion of the Senator upon that suggestion.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, it may be that we will come to recognize the necessity of putting a limitation upon the charges of various kinds, but I have always been a pretty profound believer in the free play and operation of economic laws. I believe that if we had all the laws against combinations properly enforced competition would regulate prices for people who have to buy, whether it is rent or groceries or dry goods or the supplies of the butcher.

I do not believe that any of the administrations since the time that the Sherman antitrust law was enacted have ever attempted in any way to make an honest enforcement of that law. Attorneys General have been selected under influences that made it impossible. The enactment of the Sherman antitrust law, I believe, was the wisest piece of statesmanship that has been seen in a period of 75 years in this country.

I believe John Sherman, standing upon an eminence of statesmanship such as no other man of his time attained, foresaw exactly what was going to happen in this country, the result in part of artificial regulation of economic forces. He and those associated with him wrote upon the statute books that great law.

But, Mr. President, you need but look at the record to know that it never has been honestly enforced or attempted to be enforced. Otherwise you would not have such an iniquity as this packers' organization that bestrides the country, corners the food products of the land, and contemplates cornering the food of the world.

Is any such combination as that, which everybody must admit, which they have admitted upon the record, is unlawful and violates the criminal statutes, stronger than the Government? It is not if the power of the Government were set in motion; but if you have forces within the Government which paralyze the hand of the Executive and stay the execution of the law through the Department of Justice, then, Mr. President, crime can thrive.

There was a day when we had but a handful of these trusts and combinations in this country, and you all know it. They were then not more powerful than the Government. I have before reminded the country and the Senate, as I recall the fact, that in 1901, when through the assassination of President McKinley a change of administration came, there were but 149 combinations in this country, and they were perfectly easy to deal with. Seven years later there were 10,020, and the cost of living had mounted 70 per cent.

There have been half a dozen prosecutions a year, Mr. President; just enough to make a pretense of enforcing the law. They have had their way; they have become strong, until a President of the United States took the chances of his political life in his hands if he attempted to enforce the Sherman Act against them. That is the fact about it.

Do you say that, with the development of combinations and trusts in this country, to reverse all of the economic laws of commerce that have prevailed in the history of the human race for 5,000 years was a logical development? I deny it. It was an artificial creation with J. Pierpont Morgan and the rest of those men who defied all laws practically. How could that have fastened upon this country if you had not had a subservient administration that winked at it and permitted it and handed the people of the United States over to a servitude to the trusts and combinations?

The history of it is as plain as the mountain peaks. Congress has its share of the responsibility as well. It is confirmed. Attorneys General have been proposed with these same influences back of them.

Will anybody tell me it was not possible for this mighty Government of 80,000,000 people that we had then, the Army and Navy, the courts, all the majesty of power, to curb Rockefeller and Morgan and that handful of miscreants? All it needed was a President in the White House who would call over there to his office the United States district attorneys from every State in the Union and the Attorney General and say to them, "These combinations are forming in this country. You let them go too long and they will be stronger than the Government, and they will impose burdens upon the people that will make of this Government not a democracy but a plutocracy, with the wealth in the hands of a few, and this power will become stronger than the Government. You are charged with the enforcement of a law that says these things are wrong; that they are wicked; that they are unlawful; that they are criminal." And that wise man stood where I now stand, not one day only but for many days, pleading for the enactment of this law. He was wise in his day. I, a boy in the House of Representatives at the time, remember so well that I heard that there was a great speech on here, and in 1890 I came over here and I saw standing here the tall, spare figure of John Sherman, of Ohio, his head crowned with silvery locks, fighting for the principle of that law, modified in the course of the debate.

The debate did not end in one day. It ran on for days and days. Finally it came about that the House of Representatives was deserted, and Members of Congress thronged over here to listen to that debate. It was the greatest debate that had taken place in the Senate in a quarter of a century. It went on and on until finally there was developed out of it the antitrust law. Do you know Sherman and those of his coadjutors who framed that law—for it was changed in many particulars as Sherman introduced it—had the wisdom and the foresight to have written into that law a provision that you can not find in any other criminal statute in the United States? What is it? Criminal statutes, as a rule, define the offense and prescribe the penalty. They leave the administration of the law to the prosecuting attorney and the courts to settle the matter. But somebody wrote into the Sherman antitrust law this wise provision:

> It shall be the duty of the Attorney General, through the United States district attorneys, to enforce this law.

Somebody wrote that into that law who realized that if the time ever came when this mighty power of combination clashed with the Government, it might be that they would have influence enough to put into the Department of Justice an Attorney General who would shrink from the performance of his duty, to say the least; and so they imposed upon him and upon his assistants, the United States district attorneys, the obligation pronounced affirmatively in the law of enforcing it.

Suppose during the time these combinations were organizing in the country and before they attained power that has made Senators tremble and Presidents bow we had had some President with the iron in him to summon his Attorney General and his United States district attorneys and to say to them: "You have so many of these unlawful combinations in this country; they are multiplying. This law makes it your duty to prosecute them and destroy them. Ninety days from to-day if there is one of them left in the United States I will take the head off of you, Mr. Attorney General, and of every district attorney in the country." Do you know what we would have had then? We would have had that law enforced; we would have had an end of this business; and we would have restored the natural laws of trade and commerce.

You have got now where Heney says this thing is so big you can not prosecute it criminally and get a conviction. It has got too much money. It has honeycombed society. It has undermined the Government. It has corrupted agencies everywhere. And now we are pottering along in an unsteady way, blindly, feebly, compromisingly, waiting for something to happen. A sort of paralysis seems to have taken hold of the Government, of the Executive, of the Congress.

Why, when President Wilson was elected six years ago there was a declaration in that platform that private monopoly should be abolished, that violations of the law would be prosecuted against criminal combinations; and all the years since that time the Packers' Trust has been multiplying its profits until they have mounted from something like fifteen or twenty million dollars to ninety million dollars or more; and so with all the other trusts and combinations; none of them have been put out of business.

Mr. President, I do not know what the end is to be, but I do believe that we must move with a degree of fairness and consideration in dealing with the masses of the people of this country. When they complain of these conditions, do not come in here and propose a law that shall suppress their complaints. I tell you you are playing with mighty forces that may bring disaster upon us if you do that. If evils exist in this country, permit them to be talked about. That is the best way to correct it. If somebody indulges in wild and unreasoning and violent exhortation let him be answered. Permit, I would say, the widest discussion.

As I said to one of the Senators who came across the aisle to speak to me the other day about the terrible thing that had happened at Poli's Theater, and appealed to me to say something to avert a class war in this country, I would put an open stand on every open place in the city of Washington, and I would say to everybody, "Say what you please." Then I would say to everybody else, "Answer them." Error exposed can not long stand, unless it has a good foundation, and if we are guilty, if we have no defense for what we have done, it may be that we might incur some risk, Mr. President, upon the instant in permitting a full exposition of our shortcomings. However, I do not believe that. I believe that the wholesome cure for complaint is free discussion. The point where I would apply the power of the Government is where your discussion is translated into overt acts of violence, if we shall come to that. That will not come, Mr. President and Senators, I believe, if there be permitted the freest and fullest discussion in this country. If you are not going to permit it, I should like to have some one tell me who shall be arbiter as to what is proper to be said.

That is a branch of the discussion that I did not intend to trench upon. I purpose, possibly before the close of this session, if the trend of debate should invite me to it, to take up a discussion of the issues involved in free speech and democracy, fortified and supported by the fathers of the Constitution, by the men who wrote the resolutions of Kentucky and the Virginia resolutions, by all of the men who have stood for freedom from the foundation of this Government down to now.

Mr. President, I had greatly hoped that no point of order would be made against the amendment adding to the pay of these Government employees this little sum of $120 per annum. Of course, in the aggregate I know it runs into the millions. It is the cost of a battleship or two; that is what it is. I will not go into those comparisons, Mr. President. I could extend them somewhat.

I am not going to oppose the amendment of the Senator who has asked the increase of the salary of the judge. Let him go along with the rest of them. At some time or other you will have put enough of these increases in the scale on the side of the "higher-ups" so that possibly you will make some additions to the other side that will not balance—I do not expect you to balance the scale—but it will be a little approach to justice.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I do not intend to detain the Senate long, but after listening to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] I think it is only fair that the RECORD should show some facts.

The Senator from Wisconsin says in his statement that he was "sore." I am glad he puts it that way. He at least had gotten a long way away from the facts that controlled the framing of this bill. The Senator bases his argument on an appeal to class legislation, an attack on the increases in salaries that are made in this bill for judges.

The increases in salaries for judges contained in this bill were established by law. They are not the creation of our committee. This is a legislative bill, that carries the salaries of the Government officials. It is the business of our committee—and the Senator knows it is the business of that committee—to write into this bill the appropriations to pay the officers of the Government the salaries which it has been designated by law that they shall receive.

I was in the Senate Chamber when the bill increasing the salaries of the judges was passed. I did not observe the Senator from Wisconsin arise in his seat and hear him protest against the increase of those salaries. I do not know how he voted; but if he did not vote for that increase, at least his voice was silent in opposition to it.

The Senator would have those who read the RECORD believe that this Congress—the men who sit here before me—had just been guilty of raising their own salaries and then of refusing to take care of the clerical force of this Government. I will say to the Senator that the last increase in the salaries of Congressmen in this country was more than a decade ago, and that there are comparatively few men under the dome of this Capitol to-day who had seats in the Congress of the United States when that increase was made.

The Senator from Wisconsin was a Member of Congress at that time, and so was I. When the provision for an increase of salary to Members of Congress came before the other House, of which I was then a Member, I voted against that increase. I am not informed as to how the Senator from Wisconsin cast his vote in this body under similar circumstances.

However, the provisions of this bill, whether for Congressmen or judges, have been fixed by law, and it was the duty of our committee to report the appropriation bill to pay these men their salaries, lest the Government should fail to perform the functions for which it is organized; and possibly some people in the United States would be glad to see it fail to perform its necessary functions.

Now, as to the salaries of the clerical force of the Government, while the Senator, like the Pharisee, would like to wrap his cloak about him and thank God that he is better than other men, I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin that he is not the only man in this Chamber who has a sincere desire to uplift humanity and assist those who struggle each day for their daily bread; but the men in whose hands is intrusted the real business of this Government, the men who must sustain the flag in times of peace as well as in times of war, must consider the business interests of this Government and not what they can gather unto themselves by abusing their colleagues.

The Senator states that it has been ascertained how much money is necessary to support a family, and because this bill carries on the pay roll certain employees who only receive $420 a year, then, forsooth, we are not paying these people enough to support their families. The Senator knows, as well as I do, that that statement is not sincere. The Senator has been a Member of this body longer than almost any man who sits in this Chamber, and he knows, as well as I do, that the people whose compensation is fixed in this bill at $420 a year are those who only render partial service to the Government or are paid for piecework. The Senator knows, as well as I do, that the most of the $420 class of employees carried in this bill are the charwomen—some of them getting as low as $240—who only spend a few hours in the Government service and then earn a compensation outside of the Government service. The Government employment is merely a matter of assistance to them, and not their daily vocation.

If the great committees in charge of the legislation of this Government were to allow their sentiments and their desires and their effort for popular acclaim to control their handling of the affairs of the Government in connection with these great supply bills we would have no Government before long, because it would put the burden of taxes upon the people so great that they could not carry it. It is not the John D. Rockefellers and the Pierpont Morgans who pay the great taxes in this country, and the Senator knows it. They may pay a large amount of money so far as they are individually concerned, but it is a mere drop in the bucket compared with the immense amount of taxes that rest on the masses of the people. The toiling people of this country pay the taxes and support this Government, and unless the Government is honestly and economically administered that burden can not be borne.

This provision was subject to a point of order and could have been stricken from the bill; but members of the Appropriations Committee, whom I happen to represent at this time, being in charge of this bill, do not occupy the position that the Senator from Wisconsin would place them in, that they are reckless in their desire to oppress humanity; that they are unwilling to listen to the appeals of those who need these salaries; but the committee sat down with deliberation and tried to work out a system of increases for the clerks of this Government that would be reasonable and just, that would take care of the increased cost of living, and at the same time have some due regard to the burden which the taxpayers of this country have to bear.

Last year we gave the clerks an increase of $120 a year, or $10 a month. This year, with a falling price of living—at least, there is every reason to believe the cost of living from July on will fall below war prices—the committee reports an increase of $240; and, although I am not a prophet nor the son of a prophet, I have not any doubt in my own mind, although I may be mistaken, that if the committee had reported in favor of an increase of $360 the Senator from Wisconsin would have been desirous of adding another $120 to it to enable him to make his speech.

So far as the Senator's economic argument is concerned, that has no part in this bill. The Senator brings a general indictment against a half dozen men who within the last two decades have been Presidents of the United States, men chosen by the American people, men of great ability and standing in the Nation. So far as I am concerned, I am not prepared to admit that part of his indictment.

As to the Government of this country, I want to say but one word. This is a free Government, and has been for 130 years. The people of the United States govern this country, not a governing class or rulers. There never has been a government organized in this world of ours where the final sentiments of the people who were governed, in the last analysis, were more freely, thoroughly, and completely respected in the legislative bodies that made the laws of the country. Sometimes the Congress may be slow to act, but I have never seen the time yet when the crystallized sentiment of the American people was prepared to announce it self in favor of any question that Congress did not register the will of the people and did not write it into the law of the land.

We need no Bolsheviki sentiment in this country that our people may be free. We need no Soviet government to live under in order that we may better our condition. We need no bomb throwers or anarchists under the Stars and Stripes of this country in order that the will of the American people may be reflected in the law of this land; and no such sentiment exists in this country, no matter what the Senator from Wisconsin may dream.

The people of every country want changes as time goes by. There are changes which must affect the Nation, progressive changes of great magnitude; but they will not come from the reflected will of the Bolsheviki. They will come from the sober, deliberate judgment of the great American people, reflected in the laws that will be passed by the Congresses of the future.

When a government could produce 4,000,000 soldiers, not only the pride of our land but the admiration of the world, who could win the fight for the cause of democracy and for the right of self-determination under the Government that was founded by their fathers and their fathers' fathers, you can not tell me that those 4,000,000 men are coming back to America to allow a mob to make the laws and rule the land. The Senator is mistaken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, as there are a number of Senators present who were not in the Chamber when I presented this amendment, I want to say one word in explanation of it.

When the bill increasing the salaries of the judges was before the Senate, the salaries of all the district judges, amongst others, were increased, including the salaries of the district judges of Porto Rico and the Hawaiian Islands; but it seems that the district judge in Panama was overlooked. He was the only one in all the number of judges whose salary was not increased; and it is to correct that that I have presented this amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, just a word in answer to what the Senator from Wisconsin has so graphically depicted.

I say now that among the 100,000 employees in the city of Washington there are perhaps 90 per cent of them receiving more salaries than they ever received before in their lives, and many of them you could not drive away from the positions that they hold with a Gatling gun. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Order must be preserved in the galleries.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say that not only are they receiving the wages I have referred to, but they are allowed 30 days' leave of absence, and, in addition, a sick leave; they are working seven hours a day, and I can take you into a department where there are over 5,000 girls employed, drawing $1,100, $1,200, and $1,320 a year. Now, we have added $240 more, and I say now that I do not think that half of them ever worked for a salary before, and in case they did, many of them never received a salary of more than $30 a month. I am tired, Mr. President, of having it said that the Government of the United States is having people labor for a mere pittance.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMOOT. Just a moment. I want to say in this connection that there are other employees of this Government who are not receiving what they ought to receive. It is the system that is wrong. It ought to be corrected. But is it the fault of the Committee on Appropriations? How often have I stood upon this floor and called attention to this matter? How often have we asked for legislation, and how often have we been defeated in it? I say, Mr. President, that until there is a thorough investigation and reorganization from top to bottom there will be these inequalities and injustices that no one can defend.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I do not think the Senator intended to make the reflection upon the young women who have come here to do this work which his remark would naturally mean, when he says that very few of these young women—the majority of them capable, educated, many of them I know from my own State being graduates of leading educational institutions—that very few of them received more than $30 a month before they came here. I think that is rather unwarranted, rather unjust, rather unkind. They are not of the cheap class of people. They are splendid young women; they are serving their country and rendering good service and they are entitled to fair compensation; and I know the Senator from Utah is in favor of giving it to them himself.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator from Mississippi that I stated that some of the 50 per cent of the employees I referred to I did not think had received more than $30 a month before coming here; and I want to ask the Senator from Mississippi if half of the young women who are employed in the bureau I referred to who came from Mississippi received more of a salary per month than I stated?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Oh, I think they received very much more, because a great many of them were school-teachers.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; and a great many of them were not, I will say to the Senator. The Senator and I have the same feeling toward all of mankind and womankind. I would not do an injustice to anyone.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Oh, I know the Senator would not.

Mr. SMOOT. But I want to say to the Senator now that if he will go down to some of the departments when they leave their work and see the girls that could not have had very much experience in the work they are called upon to do, coming out of the departments dressed as they never dressed before, wearing apparel that they never wore before [laughter in the galleries]——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will warn the occupants of the galleries that the Sergeant at Arms will be instructed to clear the galleries unless the occupants refrain from making demonstrations of any kind.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Chair that the disorder is in the Chamber more than in the galleries.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I want to say to the Senator that I had no idea that these young women were living in such affluence. I have not seen any evidence of it; and I do not think a young woman can come here and pay forty or fifty or sixty dollars a month for board, and then dress so handsomely, and go about decked with diamonds and satin and fine linen, on $100 a month.

Mr. SMOOT. I have said nothing about diamonds, nor have I said anything about satin or fine linens in any way. I am in earnest in this matter. I do not want Members of Congress to be branded as a lot of ingrates and have it said that they are not doing justice to the employees of the Government. That is all that I have in view at this time, and I think I am well within bounds in what I have said. Do I object to seeing them dress in the best possible style? Why, no; but, Mr. President, when we consider a question we ought to consider it as it really exists; and I want to say to Senators that the committee is not asking any employees of the Government to work all the time for $400 a year. I know that the charwomen that work for that amount only work about three hours a day, and I know that many of them are also employed elsewhere, because I have employed them as washwomen for $2 a day, and they have been filling both positions, and are making more money to-day than they ever made before; so I would not want it to appear in any way, shape, or form that the Government of the United States was paying a salary of only $400 to regular employees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, just a moment, if you please.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin is recognized.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. First, Mr. President, I think I will just set the Senate at rest about the vote on the increase of the salaries of Senators and Members of Congress, concerning which the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] delivered himself. I happen to have the roll call here, and I think it may be gratifying to Senators to have it written down again in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

When the vote to increase the salaries of Senators was taken in the Senate the roll call showed the following Senators voting in favor of increasing their salaries and the following Senators voting against it. I do not happen to have the vote in the House of Representatives; and I take the Senator's word, of course, for the fact that he is on record there against an increase of his salary. I understand from Senators about me that there was no roll call in the House.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have been told so.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state to the Senator that I think he is mistaken.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But even if there was not a roll call, if the Senator from Alabama tells me that he voted against it, that is just as good as a roll call.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, there was a roll call, and the Senator from Alabama voted against it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not care whether there was or not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My recollection is very clear that there was a roll call.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator does not need to be corroborated. His word is just as good with me as his bond could be.

Mr. OVERMAN. When was it?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not question the Senator or his motives.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I was not trying to corroborate the Senator from Alabama. I was merely——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have not gotten down to personalities in this debate, and I do not propose to.

Mr. SHEPPARD. My recollection is that there was no roll call.

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, yes; there was, because I voted for it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, let it go at that. The Senator has put himself on record, and I know he has put himself on record right. He is above any subterfuge and I think above any demagoguery. I am pretty liberal.

When the subject of increasing the pay of employees was before the Senate two years ago I took occasion at that time to review the fact that Senators who had voted against any increase in the salaries of employees of the Government who were on meager earnings here had voted to increase their own salaries, and I read into the RECORD at that time the roll call from the RECORD of the date when the roll call was taken.

Mark you, with all the defense, eloquence, and caustic comment which has been interwoven here by the Senator from Alabama regarding the readiness of Congress to respond to the demands upon it, there was voted down two years ago every increase that had been proposed to the salaries of employees. It had occurred upon bill after bill as it had come into the Senate of the United States. I can not recall now just how many times the Senate has gone on record against an increase in the salaries of the employees of the Government, but it has gone on record repeatedly in the face of all the testimony showing the justice of such increase at that time, a year ago, notwithstanding the Senator's approval of Congress as always being so responsive to the right thing.

Senators may recall that the Senate again and again voted down that increase of a certain percentage, 5 and 10 per cent, two years ago, on bill after bill, as it had been presented here, covering the employees of different departments. Finally there came before the Senate here one night the Indian appropriation bill in the form of a conference report, and it happened that I had gathered together a lot of data upon the subject, not only of increases that Senators had voted to themselves, but the increases they had voted to various other highly salaried public officials. Furthermore, I had prepared by the statistician of the Bureau of Labor a record of the past salaries of the employees of this Government.

I may state that too broadly, and I do not wish to be in error in any respect; but at least I am safe in saying that the employees of the Treasury Department were covered by the data that he furnished me. That data I read before the Senate that night. Do you remember what it showed? It showed that since 1855 there had not been an increase of the wages of the employees of the Treasury Department. It is not necessary for me to say, Senators, that the same thing prevails with regard to other departments of the Government, because you do not raise the salaries of the employees of one department without raising the salaries of employees of another department.

But, Mr. President, the matter which I presented in a 20 or 30 minute speech that night to the United States Senate was so appealing, taken together with the roll call of their own vote for increasing their own salaries, that I succeeded in getting a vote in favor of adopting on the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill an increase of 5 and 10 per cent to employees then in the office of the Bureau of Indian Affairs.

Do you see what followed that? The fact that that was voted that night put the salaries of the employees of that bureau on a higher level than the employees of other bureaus and other departments of the Government. So it led logically to raising the salaries of the employees of all the other departments. As it finally worked out in the various Congresses it gave a salary raise of $120 a year, which was called a bonus. It was not a salary raise; it is not something that will continue. It is just a sort of gift temporarily to tide over these times when prices are high and people are complaining about the cost of living. Do not let any employee of the Government fancy that he has gotten a permanent statutory increase in his salary, because he has not. The salaries, as I understand it, stand by law and statute just where they did first in 1855. You have not done anything more for these people who work for the Government. You have done something more for yourselves. My friend from Alabama, or the Senator from Alabama——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). Will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly; I yield.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state to the Senator I do not want any doubt in the RECORD as to my statement. If the Senator will allow me, I should like to refer him to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 1, part 1, of the Fifty-ninth Congress, second session, when the proposition was pending before the House to increase the salaries from $5,000 to $7,500. On page 383 he will find a statement in which I said, as it appears in the RECORD, that I opposed the resolution, and on page 389 he will find the record vote, where I voted against the resolution. I merely wanted to have the RECORD show that at this time.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. All right; let the RECORD show it. It was not necessary at all, so far as that was concerned, or so far as any other Senator is concerned. Anybody will take the word of the Senator from Alabama as to any statement of fact.

I know Senators are weary of this discussion and anxious to dispose of this bill, but I am going to pursue this matter for a little time, and they have to be patient about it or take their impatience to the cloakroom.

And I do not claim any particular credit for it, but the brief appeal I made that night—I think, Senators, it was about as late as to-night—reminding them of how much they had increased their own salaries and the conditions that existed among these employees, led to the adoption, as I have stated before, of the conference report upon the Indian appropriation bill and established irrevocably an increase in the salaries of the employees in that bureau.

The other appropriation bills followed in due order, and there was an adjustment made so that $120 finally came to be added to the salaries of the employees of the Government.

I remember in the discussion that night, in appealing to Senators, I had turned to the old CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on the salary increase, and since the Senator from Alabama has raised the question as to how I might have voted at that time, I take the liberty of reading into the RECORD the vote on that occasion as I read it into the RECORD two years ago. The yeas were 53, the nays were 21. Those who voted in favor of the increase were the following Senators, then Members of this body: Aldrich, Alee, Ankeny, Benson, Beveridge, Brandegee, Bulkeley, Burnham, Burrows, Carter, Clark (Mont.), Clark (Wyo.), Clarke (Ark.), Crane, Cullom, Daniel, Dick, Dillingham, Dubois, du Pont, Flint, Foraker, Foster, Frye, Fulton, Gallinger, Hale, Heyburn, Hopkins, Kittredge, Knox, Latimer, Lodge, Long, McCumber, McEnery, Millard, Money, Newlands, Nixon, Overman, Penrose, Pettus, Piles, Scott, Simmons, Smoot, Spooner, Sutherland, Teller, Tillman, Warner, Warren.

Those who voted "nay" were as follows: Bacon, Berry, Blackburn, Burkett, Carmack, Clapp, Clay, Culberson, Frazier, Hansbrough, Hemenway, La Follette, McCreary, Mallory, Nelson, Patterson, Perkins, Rayner, Stone, Taliaferro, Whyte.

Not voting—16, as follows: Alger, Allison, Bailey, Depew, Dolliver, Dryden, Elkins, Gamble, Gearin, Kean, McLaurin, Martin, Morgan, Platt, Proctor, Wetmore.

The calling of that roll at this time is an admonition to all of us of the mutations of time. Not many of the Senators who were Members of this body in 1905 when that roll was called survive in this year 1919. Fourteen years have gone by.

Mr. President, I would not have recurred to that roll call except for the observations of the Senator from Alabama. I am not going to detain the Senate to-night.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I merely stated to the Senator that I was not informed as to how he voted.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understand; and I read the roll call in order that the Senator might be informed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am glad to have the information.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I did not want to leave the Senator in any doubt upon that subject.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield, of course.

Mr. SMOOT. Two years ago when the vote was taken for the increase of salaries, I think the first time the amendment was agreed to it was on one of the appropriation bills—the legislative, as I remember—but in the conference they would not agree to it and sent it back here. The House would not agree to the amendment offered by the Senate. The Senator knows I did what little I could to secure that legislation and fought for the amendment at that time.

While it is true that I voted in 1905 for an increase of salaries for Senators and Congressmen, I take it for granted that anybody in the United States would feel that a Senator who did his duty was worth that amount of money.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am not suggesting; I have not raised the question here; I have not intimated that the increase of salaries of judges was not proper; I have not intimated that the increase of the salaries of the Senators was not proper. I simply took the position, so far as I am concerned myself, that I would not vote for an increase of salary during the term for which I was elected. I felt that my services were worth more than $5,000 a year—the amount of salary at that time. I never have played that sort of a demagogic game with the public. You can not find anywhere a suggestion from me that the increases in salaries to which I have called attention here to-night are unjust or improper. I realize the fact that the very conditions to which I have called attention here to-night, the iniquitous conditions that have been permitted to grow up under a free democratic Government, increasing unjustly and unlawfully the cost of living upon the American people, made it necessary that if a man is going to live within his salary and be honest he has got to have an increase commensurate with the increases that these unlawful combinations are able to put upon him.

It is very far from me to offer such a suggestion, and the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama that my attitude has been one of hostility for the purpose of raising class prejudice here to these increases in salaries is very unjust upon his part. Never can you find a word in the RECORD on my part making an appeal of that sort.

I want to answer the Senator upon another question, and that is that the American Congress has been responsive to the will of the people of this country. I say it is not, and the record shows it is not. It is now a quarter past 9. I should like to spend three or four hours on the record of Congress, to demonstrate that Congress has defied public opinion, that Congress has responded to the public and the demands for just legislation in the United States by the public only when it has been driven into it. That is going pretty strong.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state to the Senator, if he will allow me——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will just recount some instances.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will allow me to say this——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will yield, of course.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Every man in this Congress holds his commission from a constituency.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, yes; of course.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Few of those constituencies are controlled by corrupt motives. When a sentiment in this country has crystallized in favor of any great constructive legislation I have never seen the time when the Congress of the United States did not respond. I do not say that Congress was always in advance of public opinion, but I say the time has never been when it has not followed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; I think that is true, but it has followed it a long way behind. It has not been within speaking distance of it.

Postmaster General Creswell, under the Grant administration, recommended to begin with the postal-savings banks, and it took 40 years of campaigning over this country, organized among the farmers and among the laboring men and various organizations of the country, to get them.

To trace that out in all its detail would take some time. I had the matter at one time well and thoroughly in mind. But, Mr. President, it took some 40 years to drive Congress into a response. Every Postmaster General for a number of years after Postmaster General Creswell argued and plead with Congress for that legislation. There were powerful interests opposed to it, and those powerful interests were more potential apparently, judged by the result, than were the appeals of the administration and the arguments of the Postmaster General and the petitions of millions of people that the files of the Congress will show were presented here in favor of that legislation—to get Congress to respond to the will of the people and enact that legislation. Of course, the national banks were opposed to the postal-savings banks. I suppose I will shock the Senator from Alabama. We have had a great many men holding seats behind these curved lines here who were the owners of national-bank stock. I do not suppose that had any influence on their votes, but they did not enact that legislation. It took a long time to get it. It is pretty discouraging when you have to make a campaign of 40 years to enact a piece of legislation. It was so just and wise and unobjectionable, there was never any argument to be made against it, and there never was any argument made against it. It simply stood still here. Congress was stolid and indifferent.

So, Mr. President, with the parcels post. Organized bodies all over this country plead with Congress through twenty-odd years of time for a parcels post. The express companies did not want it. At that time United States Senators had express franks in their pockets. Do you call that democracy? You tell me that the United States Congress has always been responsive to the will of the people as soon as that will was crystallized? Away with such an answer as that! It is trifling with the facts of history.

Talk about playing the demagogue to the people! There is such a thing as playing the demagogue to the interests.

Take your food legislation. It took 17 years of campaign to enact a law to prevent manufacturers of adulterated food from poisoning the people of this country. Every woman's club in America was enlisted in the campaign. Every grange organization in the United States was lined up for it. The farmers' unions throughout the country were asking for legislation to prevent the adulteration of food. Think of it! My God, think of it! People manufacturing food and using chemicals to impose upon the people rotten meats, decayed vegetables, poisoned foods of various sorts, and they were potential enough to cause delay here. Why, my God, the suggestion of such legislation ought to have seen its immediate enactment here. But committee of Congress after committee hung it up. You tell me that democracy has had expression in this country? I deny that here on the floor of the United States Senate in this year 1919, and I tell you you have got to give it expression; you have got to make democracy responsive to the will of the people. That is what this Government was made for; that is what it meant. The building up—the establishment—of this Government was that it should be responsive to the will of the people.

So long as your Government is that kind of a government you need not fear the proselytes of any government on earth coming in here to overturn it.

Do not intimate that I am here seeking to overthrow democracy. I have done as much as you or any other man living in this country to preserve democracy in the United States and to keep it clean and to make it responsive to the will of the people. I will no longer permit any man to asperse my loyalty to this country, to this Government. I have sacrificed as much surely as has the Senator from Alabama. I have fought on the side of the weak, not of the strong.

Look at it again. In 1870 the railroads of this country were running the Government as they pleased. They were building up towns here, destroying communities there, charging for freight what they would. They were controlling the iron highways of commerce as the banditti controlled the highways that led to London when Dick Turpin and his ilk were in the saddle. The railroad organizations of the country at that time said that they owned those roads and they had a right to do what they pleased with them; that it was their privilege to establish a toll-gate on every iron highway to market, and to charge the products of the country, as they went down over their lines seeking sale, whatever they pleased; that they had built the roads. Do you know that that theory was pretty generally accepted in the country?

However, up in the upper waters of the Mississippi Valley was an unusual type of people. We are just now scorning the people that come from the other side; we are preparing to build bulwarks against immigration; we are planning to formulate all manner of legislation against foreigners; but, Mr. President, the upper waters of the Mississippi Valley cradled the most progressive democracy of the world. The State of Wisconsin, the State of Minnesota, the State of Iowa, and the State of Illinois came into the Union about the same time.

Wisconsin came into the Union in 1848. Just at that time there was sweeping over all of Europe a wave of what we in this day would call Prussianism; a wave of the oppression of the iron hand of empire. I guess that is a mixed metaphor, but it will have to go in the hurry of the occasion. The revolution headed by Carl Schurz and others had occurred in Germany. Poland had been partitioned. The coup d'état had been executed in France. Everywhere, in Hungary and all the rest, they were under the oppressive hand of empire.

What was the result? The highest tide of immigration that this country has ever seen swept out of Europe at that time.

What was the class of people that came? People who wanted liberty such as they could not get under empire. They were democrats. They wanted freedom. They came over to the United States.

Just then the upper Mississippi Valley was opened to settlement. Wisconsin had been admitted to the Union in 1848. There was organized in New York City a society that flooded all Germany with literature appealing to the refugees of the revolution of 1848 to come to America, to go up into Wisconsin, and to establish a free democratic State.

That foundation stock that settled in Wisconsin and Minnesota and Illinois and Iowa, along the Lakes and the upper waters of the Mississippi, were in part made up of the emigrants from Europe who came at the time of that exodus; so that, Mr. President, mingling their blood with the pioneer stock that came from New England, there was built up in that section of our country the most progressive, advanced, and thoroughly democratic and liberty-loving people that I think—and you will pardon my provincialism—you can find in the United States.

So, Mr. President, right there was born the idea that you had a right to control the iron highways that lead to market; and that you could not have any free government if those highways were controlled by private enterprise; that the fact that they led to the markets of the country made them subject to public control. Old farmers following the plow worked out the principle based upon the idea of the public highway. They said, "You have a right to take a man's land to make a public highway; you have a right to take it against his will, paying him what it is worth, whether he will or no. That power is a public power that rises out of a public necessity, that public necessity being that you must have highways." Then, they said, "These railroads have been given by the States that chartered them the power to take our land and build railroads on that land; they have taken our land against our consent and at a price fixed by the public upon which to build those roads; therefore they can not be private property; they must be public property; the public must have an interest in them; and the railroads must be subject to some public control because of the public character of the property which is vested in them by this power of eminent domain which they have." That was the reasoning of the farmers in the progressive northwestern section of the country.

Did you know that that is where you got your interstate commerce law? Do you know that in those four States up there at the head of the Mississippi Valley they enacted the first law ever enacted in the history of the world asserting the rights of the public to control transportation charges upon railroads? It was resisted by the railroads. The great Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad Co., with Alexander Mitchell, its wonderful president and founder and the most progressive railroad man of his time, defied the power of the State and threatened to arm his employees to resist. He said, "This is private property; you can not do this thing." That was the opinion of the time. Just see how far ahead were those people of Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, and Illinois! It looked as if we were going to have a civil war in Wisconsin, but do you know what happened? The governor said to the attorney general: "Start a suit and get it into court." A suit was started to test the validity of the law that gave the State the right to regulate their transportation rates within the State. It was taken into court, and it went before the Supreme Court of Wisconsin when we had only three judges on the bench, but God was good to us and good to this country, for we happened to have at that time on the bench the greatest man who ever sat on the supreme bench of the State of Wisconsin and the peer of any man who ever sat on any bench in this country—Edward G. Ryan. He wrote the opinion in that case, and it was a wonderful opinion. Like a torch in the darkness it lighted the way. The Supreme Court of the United States followed it a little later. It settled forever the question of the right of the people, through their legislatures, to control and regulate the iron highways to market.

Mr. President, that was away back in 1871 or 1872. I am coming down now to the responsiveness of Congress to the crystallized sentiment of the country. I will make haste, Senators, for I do not wish to delay the consummation of the pending legislation; but the Senator from Alabama set some things going in my mind. The case decided by Ryan came to the Supreme Court of the United States; it was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, and forever settled the right of the Government to control, through its legislative branches, the commerce of the country, the State governments to control intrastate commerce and to regulate the processes of intrastate commerce, and the Federal Government to control and regulate the processes of interstate commerce and the regulation of the operation of the roads. That power was given to the Federal Government at that time as the result of that progressive movement up in those Northwestern States.

Now, mark you. Do you know what was behind that? As the Senator from Oklahoma suggests to me—and I might have missed it—the grangers. Do you know that is the first time the granger organization ever was made potential? Why, it started up there; it was born up there; it has lived ever since; it has its organization in every State in the Union; but the grange movement of that time ripened into legislation in those four States. Do you know that in the State of Wisconsin we elected a granger for governor, who signed that law? So, to the farmers this country owes the inception of the idea, and the consummation of it in legislation, that the Government has a right to control the railroads.

Now, come down a little bit. This wonderful decision by the Supreme Court, based upon that wonderful decision by Chief Justice Edward G. Ryan—which covers, I think, three-fourths of an entire volume of the Wisconsin Reports—pointed the way to Congress like a guideboard on a highway. The decisions of the Supreme Court, based upon the Granger cases, pointed the way that Congress should go. The Supreme Court said:

> Congress has the power to regulate railway transportation and railway services. It has the right to determine three things: First, that it is the duty of the railroads to furnish adequate services; second, that it is the duty of the railroads to furnish equal services to all; third, that it is the duty of the railroads to furnish services at reasonable rates.

Those are the three great fundamental and underlying principles with regard to railroad regulation. That is what a common carrier assumes when it takes private property for public use. It assumes the responsibility of furnishing adequate services, equal services to all, no privileges to anybody, reasonable rates to everybody.

I say that decision, the last of those decisions in 1874, stood there like a guideboard on the highways, pointing the way for the Representatives of the people in the United States Senate and in the Congress to enact the legislation necessary to control interstate commerce. Why, we had our State commissions up there at that time in those Northwestern States suggesting what was necessary. Did the United States Senate and did the House of Representatives respond to the Supreme Court decision? If this had been a representative Government, if Congress had been always ready to respond to the public need and to the public desire, would we not have had that legislation pretty promptly? Why, Mr. President, volumes were written regarding the need of a Federal commission to regulate the railroads. There was no doubt about it. I do not know about the eastern and southern country; but from all that western country there was a perfect flood tide of petitions appealing to Congress to enact that legislation. That decision in 1874, and the other decision that followed it, informed the people that they could not regulate by State legislation; that they were stopped at the boundaries of the State; that they had to have this Federal legislation; and immediately delegations from State after State came marching down here. Petitions were circulated all over the United States, and appeals began to be made to Congress to enact legislation to stop the extortionate charges that were being made upon the people to get their goods to market.

What happened? Oh, Mr. President, talk about Congress being responsive! It took 13 long years of pleading and begging and appealing, people appearing here, delegations of farmers coming before the committees of Congress. One hundred and six different bills introduced by Members were defeated one after another or smothered to death in the committees. You could not get anything reported out. It took 13 long years, from 1874 to 1887, before you could get anything enacted. The railroads dominated the Congress of the United States; and any man who will read history with an impartial and open mind will admit it.

Are you going to organize an investigation of every meeting that makes a little complaint about something that is wrong in this country, and are you going to frame a statute to gag the people of this country who protest that everything has not been absolutely right? Oh, look at the history of your country; look at the records of Congress, and you will stay your hand before you do it.

Finally the railroad lobbies swarmed the Capitol. Why, the reports of the committees disclose that fact. Finally, Senator Cullom made a report to the Senate in favor of a bill, and the bill was enacted in 1887; but the same thing occurred that always occurs. When any great power in this country is pursued by public opinion because of its wrongdoing, it resists corrective legislation as long as possible; and when the clock strikes, and it sees that the hour can no longer be postponed, what does it do? It calls in its best attorneys, and it says to the committees,

"We are not opposed to this legislation any longer, but we want to suggest that you write in so-and-so, and so-and-so, and so-and-so, and so-and-so." [Laughter.] "We know you want to be fair about this thing"—about these oil-land leases, for instance, and this water-power business. "We know you want to be fair." That is just a bit of digression, having application to something that is coming up pretty soon.

And so do you know that they wrote into the law of 1887 such changes as pulled the teeth all out of it and made it of no value? They created a commission, but they created a commission which was a sore disappointment to the public and largely lessened public interest; and finally the commission said to Congress—and I want you to follow me here, because I am coming to something that tests the responsiveness of Congress to the will of the people in pretty good shape, in a pretty unanswerable way.

The Interstate Commerce Commission found out after a while how helpless it was. Of course, it tried to apply power, and it went to the Supreme Court, and the law was construed just as the adroit and clever railway attorneys knew that it would be when they wrote the suggestions of amendment into it; and the Supreme Court said: "You have not the power that you thought you had." So, finally, the Interstate Commerce Commission—now, I shall have to trust to my memory, and I may get a date wrong here, and if I do I am going to exercise the right to correct it—but, according to my recollection, it was about 1903 that the Interstate Commerce Commission got its eyes sufficiently open so that in its report to Congress it said: "Under the decisions of the Supreme Court we are utterly helpless to render the public any service." Now, I am not quoting the exact language, but I am giving you the import of what they said to you people who were then here. "There is no power in the Interstate Commerce Commission to make rates reasonable unless you give us the power to find out the value of railroad property, and we appeal to the Congress of the United States to give us that power."

That was in 1903. Now then, I am going to test the formula of the Senator from Alabama that Congress is responsive to the will of the people. There was laid upon your desk, if you were a Member of that Congress in 1903, and that of every other Member of the House, and every United States Senator, an appeal from the Interstate Commerce Commission to you to give them the power to get the valuation of railroad property, in order that they might make the interstate-commerce act effective for the purpose for which it was designed.

What did you do with it? Did you pass a law authorizing the Interstate Commerce Commission to ascertain the value of railroad property? Why, do you not see how essential it was? They could not be guided by the capitalization. The capitalization was a lie. Everybody knew it was a lie. And the Supreme Court, in the Ames case, had said that fictitious and fraudulent capitalization can not be made the basis of rates. Everybody knew that there was water in the railroad securities of the country. They said, "We can not be guided by the stocks that have been issued. What we have to do is to ascertain the true, fair value of the property, judged by what they have invested in it, judged by every element that will test what will constitute true, fair value."

That was in 1903. Did you do anything? You did not—not a single, solitary thing. You did not raise a hand. Mark you, it was back in 1874 that this thing started. It was in 1903 that you were appealed to by this Interstate Commerce Commission that you had set up and that you had authorized to report to Congress and tell Congress what legislation was needed, for right in the law under which they were created it was provided that this commission should annually tell Congress what legislation they needed in order to better fulfill their functions. Here they came in 1903 and appealed to the Congress of the United States to enact legislation giving them the power to ascertain the value of this railroad property, in order that they might use that as a basis for determining what rates the people ought to pay.

That was in 1903. Nineteen hundred and four came; and because you had ignored their appeals, because you had not been responsive, because the petitions that had been sent down here, stirred up by all of the commercial organizations that had read this report by the Interstate Commerce Commission, fell upon deaf ears—because of all that, the Interstate Commerce Commission in 1904 again, in more emphatic terms, appealed to Congress to give them this power.

I must not go so much into detail. Let me sum it up by telling you that in 1904, 1905, and 1906 that same appeal came at the beginning of every session. There was laid upon the desk of every Senator and every Member of Congress a bound volume from the Interstate Commerce Commission, asking you to give them the power to value railroads, as the only way of making effective this regulation of railroad rates.

At the risk of incurring the criticism of the Senator from Alabama, though he is using his powers of invective and sarcasm to designate me as a Pharisee, I venture to quote a little history. I came to the Senate on the 4th day of January, 1906. In April, 1906, I made a speech from my desk here in the Senate, in what was then called "the Cherokee strip." I spoke for a couple of hours on that day. I happen to remember it was the day of the earthquake in California, for I had hoped possibly with the facts I put into the RECORD that it would get some publicity over the country and would help to get the legislation I was trying to get the Senate to enact; but it did not; it was utterly wiped out by that important event.

That was not vanity—that is, I do not think it was. It may be that it was. I really wanted some results. I had been engaged in a contest regarding this same thing up in Wisconsin that had covered a period of 9 or 10 years, and I was very much interested in it. For two days in succession, two hours in each day, beginning with only one Senator sitting here when I commenced my talk, I had the attention of a pretty good body of the Senate before I concluded. My chief appeal was to give heed to this repeated request of the Interstate Commerce Commission to give them power to value the railroad property of the country. Then I presented an amendment and asked for a roll call on it. Mark you, I had called the attention of the Senate to every one of these recommendations one after another, and had read them here in the Senate. You would have thought that if the Senate of the United States was really responsive to the public demand, the great body of men they had approved and had clothed with power suggesting to them every change in the law that ought to be made, here was a change in the law so plain that a wayfaring man or a fool would know that it was necessary. The railroads did not want it because they wanted rates based on watered stock; but the Interstate Commerce Commission and the public wanted rates based on true value.

Do you know what response I got from the Senate of the United States on a roll call for my amendment? I have not the figures in mind; I only remember that there were but seven Republican Senators who voted for it. I got more Democratic Senators than I did Republican Senators, because the Republican Senators were in the majority and some of the Democrats knew it would do no harm to vote for it, but it would make a pretty good record anyway to take home to the folks.

That was in 1906. In 1907, 1908, 1909, 1910, 1911, 1912, every time a bill was presented to the Senate where I had an opportunity to offer that proposition I offered it and made an appeal and quoted not only that but succeeding appeals of the Interstate Commerce Commission for that legislation, because they kept on asking for it year after year; and it was not until the thing got so crystallized that the Senate thought they had better pass it. Do you know that then they passed it unanimously? The last vote before that it had been defeated overwhelmingly.

That is another instance of the responsiveness of Congress. It took from 1903 to 1913, only 10 years. You can get Congress to respond to something everybody is in favor of if you only try hard enough and live long enough.

Mr. President, I know that I am overtesting the patience of the Senators. The Senator caught me up on this $420 salary. I believe I did mention that $420 salary. I believe the Senator from Utah dwelt at some length upon that $420 salary.

I knew that the charwomen did not work 8 or 10 or 12 hours a day; but how about the $620 and the $720 salaries, that did not reach up to the cost of maintaining a family, or the $900 salaries, that are only $20 above the cost of maintaining a family in 1914, as established by a scientific investigation at New York, in which—and I have the table here before me—only $20 was allowed for medicine and doctor bills?

There is no use dwelling upon this thing. You have made your record. The committee was appealed to to make this $360 increase. It did not do it. It brought in the bill in a form in which no amendment could be proposed here which under our rules could be considered by the Senate, and therefore we could not have it tried out by the Senate. Therefore we have given to these people with these meager salaries an increase of $120 a year over the salaries which they have been drawing to meet the increased cost of living that has resulted in the last year.

The Senator from Alabama is very hopeful that prices are going to decline. Of course, he does not guarantee it and he will not be around to make up any losses to you if they do not happen to decline. I hope they may decline, but I have been glancing over the testimony given by the Armour-Swift combination before the Committee on Agriculture of the United States Senate, and it does not hold out much hope to me that there will be a decline. I very much fear that you will find at the end of the year prices in some respects higher than they were at the beginning of the year.

I wish to apologize to Senators and to the Senate for taking time to-night to talk about matters upon which we can have no direct vote at this time, but that is a fault all of us have. There has been a good deal of discussion on this and other bills upon issues and problems that may be helpful to us as we pass along our legislative way. I do not want to be vain, but I hope that I may have made some appeal here to-night that will lead Senators perhaps to be patient, and, as I view it, wide-visioned in the problems that lie before us.

I will not promise, in order to win your forgiveness, that I will not have something more to say further on during the session. I think I may.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

On a division, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I just want to say that I neglected to state that I do not remember whether there was a roll call or not, but I voted against the increase of the salaries of the judges.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I am not going to take a moment of the time of the Senate. I move to amend the bill in line 21, page 10, by striking out "$2,400" and inserting "$2,800."

Mr. President, this is to increase the salary of the "clerk on Journal work for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, to be selected by the Official Reporters." The man who has done this work so efficiently, I understand, has been in the service for 38 years, and he has not lost a day. He is getting now only $2,400 a year. The fidelity and efficiency with which he performs his duties call for recognition at the hands of the Senate.

This is but a very small increase. I intended to make it $3,000, but after consultation with Senators it was thought to raise the salary $400 would be a substantial help to this efficient servant of the Senate. I sincerely hope the amendment will be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN].

On a division, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment. I propose to increase the salary of the chief clerk in the office of the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, on page 56, line 14, by striking out "$2,250" and inserting "$2,500."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 56, on line 14, "Office of Surgeon General of Public Health Service, chief clerk," after the words "chief clerk" and the comma strike out "$2,250," and in lieu thereof insert "$2,500."

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, this increase has been recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury on the recommendation of the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service. The work of this chief clerk has been very efficient and has increased very much in the last two or three years. The field force in the Public Health Service has grown from 1,500 to 4,000, while the clerical force in the bureau in Washington has trebled in number. In addition, a number of new offices of the service have been established in Washington, and the service now occupies space in five different parts of the city.

The chief clerk not only discharges the duties of chief clerk, including the care of buildings, but also is acting as Chief of the Miscellaneous Division of the bureau, which has charge of the printing and distribution to the public of health publications and posters. This work is one requiring energy and administrative ability, and is growing so successfully that already this fiscal year there have been sent to the public over 12,000,000 copies of publications and posters as compared with about 4,000,000 in the whole of last year. The previous year the number was about 2,500,000.

This division was formerly in charge of a junior officer of the service, whose salary is thus saved to the Government.

I merely wish to add one word more. The private secretary to the Surgeon General had his salary raised on this bill from $1,800 to $2,000. I certainly think the chief clerk ought to have his salary raised $250 when the Secretary of the Treasury advocated an increase of $500.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senate, if they agree to this amendment we ought to begin at the beginning of the bill and go right through it and change the salaries of the chief clerks of many of the departments who have a great deal more work to do than the chief clerk of this office.

Senators ought to realize that there must be some little consistency in an appropriation bill which provides for the salaries of the employees of the Government. You can not have one chief clerk in one department drawing $250 or $500 more than another chief clerk perhaps doing more work and who is drawing $2,250.

In regard to the statement made by the Senator from Louisiana that the salary of the private secretary to the Surgeon General was increased from $1,800 to $2,000, and therefore the salary of the chief clerk ought to be increased, I am not going to take the time to tell the Senate why that increased salary was granted, but I will say that it was granted at the personal solicitation of the head of the department, who gave the reasons why. As far as I was concerned, I thought he ought to have just as much as the chief clerk, if the statements made to the committee were correct, but the committee decided to give $2,000. Now, if the Senate wants to give more, well and good, but I want to notify the Senate now that the whole bill will be unbalanced.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL].

On a division, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KENYON. At the request of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], who has been compelled to leave the Chamber, I offer in his behalf the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

That the heads of the several executive departments and other governmental establishments in the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and directed to furnish to such civilian employees receiving compensation, exclusive of the additional $120, at the rate of not more than $1,400 per annum or less than $100 per annum, under their respective jurisdiction as have come to the District of Columbia since April 6, 1917, whose services are no longer required and whose employment has been or may be terminated by the Government without delinquency or misconduct on their part, or who may resign from their positions, during the period from November 11, 1918, to March 31, 1919, inclusive, their actual railroad transportation, including sleeping-car accommodations, from the District of Columbia to the place from which they accepted employment or to their legal residence, or to such other place not a greater distance, as the employee may elect. Such transportation must be applied for within 10 days after the termination of service and shall be used within five days after issuance, unless an extension of time on account of illness be granted by the proper authority. As to the employees whose services have been terminated during the period between November 11, 1918, and the date of the passage of this act, inclusive, the time within which transportation shall be applied for shall be 20 days from the date of the passage of this act. Any person who shall sell, exchange, or transfer such transportation for the use of another shall be punished by a fine of not more than $100. The expenses authorized by this act shall be paid from the following appropriations for the fiscal year 1920, which hereby are made available therefor immediately upon approval of this act:

For the War Department, from "Temporary employees."

For the Navy Department, from "Temporary employees."

For all other executive departments and independent establishments, from the appropriations for the support of the services in which such persons are employed. Any employee who would be entitled to transportation, including sleeping-car accommodation under this act, and who has left the District of Columbia prior to the passage of this act, but not before December 10, 1918, upon application and presentation within 60 days after the passage of this act of proper proof, shall have refunded the cost of actual railroad transportation, including sleeping-car accommodation, from the District of Columbia to the place from which employment was accepted, or to their legal residence, or to such other place not a greater distance to which the employee may have gone. The provisions made for the transportation of employees shall not apply to those who enter such service after the passage of this act.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, the only difference between this amendment and the present law is that the words "or who may resign from their positions" are used at the top of page 2, which is the real purpose of the act if it is passed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I think this amendment is to carry out what Congress attempted to do a few weeks or a month ago, and the department construed it the other way. So I have no objection to letting the amendment go into the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to be added to the bill as a new section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, as a new section, the following:

SEC. —. Any moneys remaining in the Treasury after the passage of this act shall be divided among the departments, to be divided as the heads thereof shall determine.

[Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair supposes the amendment is not in order. Does the Senator insist on a vote? If so, the question is on the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. OVERMAN. I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 34, after line 18, it is proposed to insert:

That the period of time during which soldiers and sailors, both enlisted and drafted men, who, prior to entering the service of their country, had a civil-service status, and whose names appear upon the eligible list of the Civil Service Commission, shall not be counted against them in the determination of their eligibility for appointment under the law, rules, and regulations of the Civil Service Commission now in effect, and at the time of demobilization their civil-service status shall be the same as when they entered the service.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senator from North Carolina that what he desires is, I think, already provided for in the pending bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. Oh, no, Mr. President.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I ask that the amendment be again stated. I did not catch the first part of it, but I think it is already covered.

Mr. OVERMAN. Oh, no.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I simply desire to say that I think there has been a provision inserted in the bill requiring the different departments to reinstate soldiers and sailors in the positions which they occupied at the time they entered the military service.

Mr. OVERMAN. Of course, that is the law; but this amendment provides that where a man is on the eligible list and was drafted or enlisted or volunteered and went to the front that time shall not be counted against him. Otherwise one year's absence would bar him from appointment after he is on the eligible list.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the amendment be again stated, Mr. President. If all it does is as stated by the Senator from North Carolina, then, of course, I have no objection to it.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is all it does.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be again stated.

The Secretary again stated the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is adopted.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, just a moment. I have some objection to the amendment unless it is modified. My objection merely is that I desire to insert the word "marines" in the amendment. Marines are not classified either as soldiers or sailors.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have no objection to that modification of the amendment. I had never thought of that.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is all I desire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the modification of the amendment suggested by the Senator from Georgia and accepted by the Senator from North Carolina will be made. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, on page 32, line 14, I move to strike out "$3,500" and to insert "$4,000." This amendment relates to the Civil Service Commission. Down to this time the Chief of the Civil Service Commission has received a salary of $4,500 and each of the other commissioners has received a salary of $4,000, while the chief examiner has received a salary of $3,500. The chief examiner, as is well known to everyone, is Mr. George R. Wales. He has been with the commission ever since its organization. He is a walking encyclopedia of knowledge relating to the law and the operation of the law. Since the beginning of the war he has worked anywhere from 16 to 20 hours a day.

Mr. McKELLAR. How much does the Senator's proposed amendment increase his salary?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. By $500. The House has increased the salaries of the commissioners $1,000, and his salary has always been within $500 of the salaries of the commissioners. So I do not ask for a thousand-dollar increase for him, but I shall ask to have his salary made $4,000 instead of $3,500, for the reason I have stated.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I do not desire to take up any time on this matter. I have no doubt that the gentleman to whom this amendment refers is a very capable and meritorious man, but I want again to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that there must be some place where we have got to stop. The salary was increased, my understanding is, last year. I am informed that the salary of this officer was then increased by $500. I repeat, I think the Senate must draw the line somewhere if it expects to get the amendments proposed by the Senate to this bill agreed to by the other House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, on page 134, after the comma, in line 8, I move to insert the words "for the issuance of certificates describing the quality of sample goods submitted for test to the bureau."

The section to which the amendment is proposed provides for the testing of materials, and I desire to have it cover certificates showing what the tests would justify. It does not add anything to the appropriation.

Mr. SMOOT. To whom would such certificates be issued?

Mr. OWEN. They would be issued to the party who submitted the sample of goods for test in the bureau. The bureau does make the tests now.

Mr. SMOOT. I know they make the tests now.

Mr. OWEN. But by giving the parties having the tests made a certificate that the goods were of a certain standard they would be enabled to sell the goods abroad, which they can not now do in a proper way. In the case of a sale of cement to Argentina, for instance, until the Bureau of Standards passed upon the quality of the cement and its value, the parties desiring to sell it would be unable to make disposition of the goods. So this will serve that purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. The object of the amendment, then, is that the Government shall pay the expense instead of the person who has the test made? Under existing conditions parties having had the test made can get a certificate from the bureau showing the test which has been made upon cement or any other commodity.

Mr. OWEN. The bureau does make such tests.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to know whether the Senator from Oklahoma really intends that hereafter such certificates shall be issued without any cost whatever to the party requesting the test?

Mr. OWEN. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I regret very much that it falls to me to propose an amendment, because I can expect very little. On page 26, line 12, the Senate has imposed a limitation upon itself which I should like to remove. The proviso in line 12 reads as follows:

Provided, That no person shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation exceeding $3,000 per annum.

That refers to the legislative reference library, or division, as it is more properly called, I think. That is a bureau organized to serve Congress. We want the best service we can get. It supplies us with the latest data as to legislation upon any subject by any State or country in the world, as, for example, the laws enacted, together with intelligent comment and criticisms thereon. The legislative reference library supplies us with the best current information on both sides of important questions as they press upon us for consideration.

We have added in this bill to the duties of the legislative reference library another very important function, namely, to make for the use of the Senate and the House of Representatives a digest of every bill that is introduced in Congress. That is work of the highest importance; and yet we put a limitation of $3,000 upon the pay of anybody employed in the legislative reference library. If you will turn to the page of this bill—I have not noted the page—where provision is made for the pay of the Efficiency Bureau, which is designed to promote the highest efficiency in the executive departments, it will be seen that under the bill 18 employees in that bureau may receive salaries above $3,000.

In all States where they have a legislative reference library higher salaries are being paid than the limitations which we propose to put upon our own legislative reference library. The State of California pays $4,000 to the head of its legislative reference library, the State of Illinois pays $5,000 to the head of its legislative reference division or library, the State of Pennsylvania pays $5,000 to the head of its legislative reference library and $5,000 to the assistant librarian, and the State of Wisconsin pays $4,500 to the official in charge of its legislative reference library.

We have now at the head of the legislative reference library, I believe, a very superior man. I am apprehensive that he will be drawn away from us with this limitation upon his salary; and I offer this amendment for the consideration of the Senate, that, after the word "That," in line 12, page 26, there be stricken out the word "no" and there be inserted the words "not more than one" in lieu thereof, or so that it will read:

Provided, That not more than one person shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation exceeding $3,000.

That will leave it, I think, to the Librarian of Congress to determine as to any increase that may be found necessary in that position.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator does not ask for an increase in the appropriation?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, no.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, there is an amendment that I desire to explain for just a moment. Personally I should like to have seen the bonus of $360 added to the salary of Government employees receiving up to $2,500, but that went out on a point of order. I should like to offer an amendment to give the $360 bonus to those receiving salaries of $1,200 or less, but that would also be subject to a point of order, and therefore I shall not offer it.

Mr. President, we have increased a good many salaries in this bill; and I desire to propose an amendment to correct what I think is a very grave injustice and inequality. In the act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, we provided for increases of 5 and 10 per cent in the salaries of certain employees of the Government. Then for the year ending June 30, 1919, we changed that, and gave those receiving up to $2,500 an increase of $120 a year, but provided that if they had received an increase at the rate of $200 per annum they should not get the benefit of the $120. The result of that was that employees and workmen in the navy yards and in the arsenals who had obtained an increase of wages at a rate which, if they had received it for the whole year, would amount to over $200, although they received this rate for only a part of that time, did not get the benefit of the increase.

In other words, to illustrate, here are the facts: On July 1, 1918, employees in the navy yard got a basic increase of 8 cents a day—I hope Senators will note these facts, because I think they will appeal to them—until November 8, and then they got an increase of 56 cents a day. The 56 cents and 8 cents made a total rate of 64 cents a day. That for 313 days in the year would give them a rate of increase of $200.32. Now, Mr. President, it was held that they were not entitled to the increase of $120 because of this 32 cents over $200 which they would have gotten if they had received the 64 cents increase every day in the year.

I do not think that is just; I do not believe that that was what was intended by Congress when we put this $200 limitation in. I think the idea of Congress was that if they got an increase of $200 in a year, then they should not get the $120. Therefore to correct that inequality I wish to propose the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 153, in line 23, after the word "salary," it is proposed to strike out the words "at the rate," and in line 24, after "$200," to strike out the words "per annum."

Mr. JONES of Washington. That will make it read:

Or shall receive during the fiscal year 1920 an increase of salary in excess of $200.

It seems to me that that is entirely fair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on ageeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington. [Putting the question.] By the sound the "noes" seem to have it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask for a division, Mr. President.

On a division, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 101, it is proposed to strike out, after the words "class 2," in line 3, the words "89 of class 1, 77 at $1,000 each; 65 copyists; 26 copyists, at $720 each," and insert in lieu thereof the words, "100 of class 1, 120 at $1,000 each; 23 copyists."

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I feel certain that the Senator in charge of the bill will make no objection to this amendment. It does not increase the appropriation; on the other hand, it has the effect of reducing the appropriation by a few thousand dollars. Under this bill, as it has already been framed, if this amendment is adopted there will be an actual reduction in the appropriation, amounting to $3,800 or $3,900.

The reason for this amendment is this: At the salaries which are provided in this section of the bill, the General Land Office has been unable to get people to fill the positions. There have been 30 or 40 vacancies in these positions for a number of months. Occasionally the General Land Office will get an employee who will fill the position for a time, and then resign because he can not live upon the amount of the salary. So there are at the present time about 40 vacancies in these positions. The salaries range from $900 to $1,200 per year.

It is proposed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, instead of having the large number of positions authorized by the bill, that a lesser number be authorized and that the salaries may be slightly increased. That is what this amendment does; it lessens the number, but increases the compensation, and by lessening the number it reduces the amount of compensation under this bill by reason of the $240 per annum bonus. It is desired very much by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and I am sure it will result in benefit to the public service.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that I do not know what can be done in conference, but if he will allow it to go to conference with a free hand I am willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I dislike to leave it just in that way. Of course, it will go with a free hand to conference.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I mean by that that I have not given the consideration to it that I desire. I do not care to oppose the amendment, but I do not wish to commit myself unequivocally until I have given it more study.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I realize that all that I can hope for is that the Senator in charge of the bill will give consideration to it; and, if the Senate adopts it, that he will insist upon it, unless some very cogent reason is given for its rejection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That will be the attitude undoubtedly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from Alabama that two or three Senators have expressed to me a very serious doubt as to whether or not the suggestion I made with reference to the commission could be covered in the conference without being subject to a point of order, if reported. So I wish to read a crude suggestion which I will ask the Senator to allow to be put in, to be considered in conference, if he has no objection. After the word "Speaker," in line 21, on page 158, I move to insert:

Provided, That if three Senators and three Representatives of the Sixty-fifth Congress who will not be Members of the Sixty-sixth Congress will serve on such commission they shall be appointed thereon as herein provided, and said commission shall submit its report and recommendations as early as possible, and, in any event, by the first Monday in December, 1919, and the members of such commission shall receive a compensation at the rate of $625 per month.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I said to the Senator this evening, I am very glad he has made that suggestion; I think it is a wise one; but I want some freedom of action concerning it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. ASHURST. What commission is that?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is not in order unless the vote by which the committee amendment was adopted is reconsidered.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask that the vote by which the committee amendment was agreed to may be reconsidered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to reconsidering the vote by which the committee amendment was agreed to?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I merely desire to offer the amendment, so that it may go to conference.

Mr. ASHURST. To what does the amendment relate? What does it mean?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is an amendment in regard to the commission to be provided for the purpose of reclassifying and readjusting salaries.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is proposed to the amendment reported by the committee establishing a commission to reclassify salaries. The amendment of the Senator from Washington proposes a different personnel from the one proposed by the committee amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is offered so that the suggestion may be considered in conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to reconsidering the vote whereby the committee amendment was agreed to? The Chair hears none.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Now the amendment I have proposed comes in after the word "Speaker," in line 21, on page 158.

The SECRETARY. In the amendment of the committee, on page 158, line 21, after the word "Speaker," it is proposed to insert the amendment read by Mr. JONES of Washington.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to offer one or two amendments that will, if adopted, save some money and not take money out of the Treasury of the United States. I offer the amendment I send to the desk to come in on page 161, after line 13.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, do I understand the Senator from Utah is trying to save some money for the Treasury?

Mr. SMOOT. I will have to admit the charge.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Utah will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 161, after line 13, it is proposed to insert the following as a new section:

SEC. 10. The Joint Committee on Printing shall have power to adopt and employ such measures as, in its discretion, may be deemed necessary to remedy any neglect, delay, duplication, or waste in the public printing and binding and the distribution of Government publications: Provided, That hereafter no journal, magazine, periodical, or other similar publication shall be printed and issued by any branch or officer of the Government service unless the same shall have been specifically authorized by Congress, but such publications as are now being printed without specific authority from Congress, may, in the discretion of the Joint Committee on Printing, be continued until the close of the next regular session of Congress, when, if authority for their continuance is not then granted by Congress, they shall not thereafter be printed: Provided further, That on and after July 1, 1919, all printing, binding, and blank-book work for Congress, the Executive office, the judiciary, and every executive department, independent office, and establishment of the Government shall be done at the Government Printing Office, except such classes of work as shall be deemed by the Joint Committee on Printing to be urgent or necessary to have done elsewhere than in the District of Columbia for the exclusive use of any field service outside of said District.

Mr. SMOOT. The exceptions, Mr. President, I wish to say, are the exceptions now in the existing law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to offer one more amendment, to be added at the end of the bill as a separate section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the amendment just agreed to, it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. 11. George Washington Memorial Building: The provisions and limitations respecting the George Washington Memorial Building in the sundry civil act for the fiscal year 1918 are hereby continued and extended to March 4, 1920.

Mr. SMOOT. I will state that that is only an extension of one year to the charitable people of the United States to collect the money for the erection of the George Washington Memorial Building.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read the third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendments and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. MARTIN of Virginia, Mr. UNDERWOOD, and Mr. SMOOT conferees on the part of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13462) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, and agreed to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SMALL, Mr. SCULLY, and Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House insists upon its amendments to the bill (S. 5236) to amend sections 7, 10, and 11 of the Federal reserve act, and section 5172, Revised Statutes of the United States, disagreed to by the Senate, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. PHELAN, Mr. EAGLE, and Mr. HAYES managers at the conference on the part of the House.

DISCHARGED SICK AND DISABLED SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

Mr. HARDWICK. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13026) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to provide hospital and sanatorium facilities for discharged sick and disabled soldiers and sailors.

Mr. THOMAS. I shall have to object——

Mr. HARDWICK. I am not going to ask the Senate to go on with it to-night.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Georgia to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I give notice now that immediately after the bill which the Senator from Georgia has called up is disposed of I shall ask the Senate to take up the bill (H. R. 15462) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. House bill 13026 is before the Senate.

Mr. THOMAS. I shall ask to be heard upon some of the provisions of the bill. It is too important to be considered now.

Mr. SMOOT. Let us have time enough to read it, anyhow. We have been so engaged that we have not had an opportunity to give attention to it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Very well. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, it seems to me that we ought to have an opportunity to consider the conference report on the oil-leasing bill, and I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 10 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, February 21, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 20, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, since we pass this way but once give us the grace to follow the star of hope which illumines the way and points the course to human progress.

May we not pause to mourn and agonize over past sins, but sincerely repent, turn to the right, keep to the right, that we may build for ourselves a character which shall enable us to do unto others as we would be done by.

We pray for a league of nations which shall stand for permanent peace, but more for a league of Christian churches which shall lift them above creeds and dogmas and place them upon the fundamental principles taught and illustrated in the sublime life and character of the Jesus of Nazareth. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

GEORGES CLEMENCEAU.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HUSTED. I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The gentleman from New York is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Speaker, we have all been deeply shocked by the announcement of the dastardly and murderous attack upon the life of the French premier. I made two trips to France during this war and was deeply impressed by many things, but by nothing more, I think, than the marvelous influence of that old tiger of France in sustaining and maintaining the morale of the French Army and of the French people under the most trying circumstances. He exposed his life at the front as freely as any French poilu. His presence there inspired the troops, and then he went back home and fired the civilian population with patriotic fervor. Georges Clemenceau is the great outstanding figure of this war, overtopping them all, even Marshal

Foch himself, and I know it is the deep, heartfelt wish of every patriotic American citizen to-day that his life be spared [applause]; that he be restored to health and strength and to his very great usefulness to the cause of civilization in the present emergency. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3797) validating certain applications for and entries of public lands, and for other purposes, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MYERS, Mr. RANSDELL, and Mr. SMOOT as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5038) extending the use of the special fund for vocational education provided by section 7 of the vocational rehabilitation act, approved June 27, 1918, and authorizing the Federal Board for Vocational Education to accept gifts and donations for specific purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 4246. An act to increase the salary of the United States district attorney for the district of Connecticut; and

H. R. 10225. An act striking from the pension roll the name of Jennie M. Heath.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 205. Joint resolution permitting the loan of aircraft motors and aircraft material to educational institutions under certain conditions.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate joint resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. J. Res. 205. Joint resolution permitting the loan of aircraft motors and aircraft material to educational institutions under certain conditions; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REFERENCE OF A BILL.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Florida rise?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, to ask unanimous consent for reference of the bill H. R. 16024. The bill was referred to the Committee on the Library, and I ask unanimous consent that the reference be changed to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds; and I will state——

The SPEAKER. What is it about?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. It is for a commission to take into consideration the erection of a building which will constitute a library and a museum and also an arch. Mr. SLAYDEN, chairman of the Committee on the Library, has no objection to this change of reference.

The SPEAKER. Where is the building to be erected—what town?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Somewhere in the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to taking this bill away from the Committee on the Library and referring it to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

RIVERS AND HARBORS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call up House resolution No. 570, a privileged resolution——

Mr. SMALL. May I ask the gentleman if he will withhold that for a moment, to enable me to ask unanimous consent to send a bill to conference?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the rivers and harbors bill, H. R. 13462, to disagree to all the Senate amendments, and agree to a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill, H. R. 13462, to disagree to all the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13462) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will announce the conferees.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SMALL, Mr. SCULLY, and Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa.

AMENDING THE FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for the same purpose?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 5236, to insist on the House amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 5236, to disagree to the Senate amendments, and to agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

Mr. WALSH. What bill is that?

Mr. PHELAN. It is the banking and currency bill, which passed a day or two ago.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 5236) to amend sections 7, 10, and 11 of the Federal reserve act and section 5172 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON. What is the act; how long is it?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. I was told that it passed the other night by unanimous consent, but that does not mean a great deal. As I was not here I suppose I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the conferees.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. PHELAN, Mr. EAGLE, and Mr. HAYES.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. WALTON withdrew from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Lieut. Etienne de Bujac, H. R. 7329, Sixty-third Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

SELF-DETERMINATION FOR IRELAND.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein resolutions which were unanimously adopted by both houses of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, asking for self-determination for Ireland.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolutions are as follows:

Preamble and resolutions adopted by the Senate and House of Representatives of Pennsylvania in behalf of self-determination for Ireland, offered by Senator Daix in the senate and by Representative Heffernan in the house.

Whereas the sons and daughters of the Irish race are thrilled with the prospect of a free Ireland; they are earnestly asking that their cradle land be included among the small nations which President Wilson has so eloquently indicated will be recommended for the right of self-determination; and

Whereas in all our wars, on every page of our American annals, in the very texture of our American people, the blood of Ireland gleams in eager service in all that contributed to the power and glory of this greatest of Republics; in the great world conflict which recently closed so triumphantly the citizens and soldiers of Irish blood proved worthy of their proudest traditions, the latter having gladly struck and died for the land that holds their allegiance: Therefore be it

Resolved, That these bodies, the Senate and the House of Representatives of the State of Pennsylvania assembled in regular session, on this 10th day of February, 1919, call upon the Members of the United States Senate and the Members of the National House of Representatives of Pennsylvania to vote for the resolution now in Congress, having been reported favorably by the House Foreign Affairs Committee on February 6, 1919, and which reads:

"Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That it is the earnest hope of the Congress of the United States of America that the peace congress now sitting in Paris, in passing upon the rights of various peoples, will favorably consider the claims of Ireland to the right of self-determination."

Resolved, That President Wilson be informed that it is the expressed desire of the Senate and House of Representatives of Pennsylvania that Ireland be included among those small nations which he has declared shall be given the right of self-determination.

LICENSE TO EXPORT GOODS TO CITIZENS OF NEUTRAL COUNTRIES.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask to call up House resolution 570, a resolution of inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman calls up a resolution which he says is privileged. The Clerk will report it so we can find out.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 570.

Resolved, That the President, if not incompatible with the public interest, be requested to communicate to the House what, if any, facts exist to justify the War Trade Board in refusing license to American manufacturers to export manufactured goods to citizens of neutral countries with which we are not and have not been at war; and what, if any, facts exist to justify the refusal of the said War Trade Board to permit American manufacturers to communicate with their customers in such countries in regard to future business.

The amendments were read, as follows:

Page 1, line 4, strike out "American manufacturers" and insert "Americans."

Page 1, line 5, strike out the word "manufacturers"; page 1, line 8, strike out "American manufacturers" and insert "Americans."

Mr. GARNER. It appears from the resolution it was reported by the committee, and that takes away its privileged character.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I was on my feet to oppose this motion. Mr. Speaker, it is not privileged. The resolution has been reported by the committee and is now on the calendar of the House for action by the House.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. That does not destroy the privileged character of the resolution.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, it is not privileged; it calls for an opinion.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if the resolution is a resolution of inquiry, it is privileged to make a motion to discharge the committee. It does not lose its privileged status. Paragraph 836 of the Manual says:

The practice of the House gives to resolutions of inquiry a privileged status. Thus, they are privileged for report and consideration at any time after the reference to a committee.

The committee can not report a resolution and thereby destroy its privilege.

Mr. SIMS. The original, of which this is a copy, except changes in the words used, simply asked for "reasons," and a point of order was made and sustained that it was not a privileged resolution in that shape. So a new one was introduced. Instead of using the words in the first resolution it says, "What, if any, facts exist," and so forth, which leaves it still subject to the same point of order that was made to the first one. Besides, it is already reported and on the calendar, and in the opinion of some gentlemen is no longer a privileged resolution, for the reason that it does not call for anything in substance different from the first resolution. A point of order was made to the first resolution that it was not privileged. The same point of order is now made. I make that point of order as well as stating the fact that it is reported and on the calendar for action.

Mr. MANN. I understood the resolution calls for facts.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. It does.

Mr. MANN. Then, as now reported it does not destroy its privileged status.

The SPEAKER. That is true. I will state to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] when it was brought in here before it was knocked out on the ground that it called for reasons and did not call for facts. Now, this time it changes it to facts. It says:

That the President, if not incompatible with the public interest, be requested to communicate to the House what, if any, facts exist to justify the War Trade Board in refusing license to Americans to export goods to citizens of neutral countries—

And so forth.

Mr. SIMS. Suppose they report back that in their opinion there are no facts.

The SPEAKER. Whereabouts does it call for facts?

Mr. BARKLEY. It leaves it to the President to determine whether the facts justify the War Trade Board in refusing license or not.

Mr. SIMS. It really calls for a matter of opinion after all.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, let me make this suggestion. I think it can hardly be said the resolution asks for an opinion regarding those facts. It does not ask for the opinion of the Secretary regarding the facts. It asks only for a statement of facts upon which certain action was based. That certainly is within the rule and it is not an opinion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman a question. It calls for what, if any, facts existing that justify the War Trade Board in refusing license. Does that call for a reason or not?

Mr. TOWNER. I hardly think so, I will say to the Speaker. I think it was nothing more than this: Certain refusals have been made to the issuance of certain rights which are granted under the law. Now, this resolution asks of the department that makes the refusal for the facts upon which the refusal was made. It certainly seems to me that is not asking for an opinion and therefore can not be objected to on that ground.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the Speaker will allow a further suggestion, it calls for an argument on the part of the reporting executive as to the basis he might cite justifying the War Trade Board. He might submit a certain state of facts and supplement it with an argument that those facts justify it. It is giving an opinion and giving a reason for the action taken.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, if I may be allowed to suggest, I think the gentleman from Kentucky is wrong about that. I think it calls for a statement of facts that predicated the action. For example, the president of the War Trade Board might say an obligation existed between the United States and some other country in the form of a contract or agreement, and upon the basis of that contract or agreement he refused to issue a license.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will say to the gentleman it will be competent to call upon the President for a statement of facts on which that action was based by the War Trade Board, but to call for a statement of facts justifying their action justifies an argument why the action was taken.

Mr. TOWNER. Is not that merely equivalent to saying, "Upon what facts did you act when you made the refusal?"

Mr. BARKLEY. No; it is not.

Mr. TOWNER. The form does not make any difference. It only asks for a report of the facts upon which the action of the department was made. I think it can be interpreted in no other way.

Mr. BARKLEY. I can not agree with the gentleman about that.

The SPEAKER. It is a pretty close shave, but the Chair does not think it is privileged.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION FOR TRANSPORTATION SYSTEMS.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 16020.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 16020.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 16020, with Mr. GARNER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16020) to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for carrying out the act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1918.

Be it enacted, etc., That to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for carrying out the act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1918, there is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated $750,000,000, which shall be in addition to the appropriation of $500,000,000 made in section 6 of said act, and shall be subject in all respects to the same authority for, and restriction of, expenditure as the said $500,000,000.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, speaking for myself, I am unalterably opposed to Government ownership. [Applause.] I am in favor of turning back the roads at the earliest possible date that it can be done. [Applause.] In my judgment, this bill does not involve the question of Government ownership. I am so much opposed to Government ownership that if it did, I do not believe I could bring myself to the position of recommending the consideration of this bill at this time.

Mr. GARNER. Would it disturb the gentleman if I would interrupt him and ask him a question in that connection?

Mr. SHERLEY. I would prefer, if I may, to continue. Its passage, in my judgment, will not defer, but accelerate the return of the roads to their owners.

Now we are faced with an actual condition and not a theory, and in order that we may understand just what that situation is I desire briefly to review the conditions under which the railroads were taken over and the conditions which have arisen subsequent to that.

By virtue of a paragraph carried in an Army appropriation act approved August 29, 1916, the President was authorized to take possession of the roads and to operate them under Government control when a national emergency might so require. Accordingly, in pursuance of a proclamation of the President, dated December 26, 1917, the Government did take over the roads. At that time we were in the midst of the great war that has just closed. We were the only great nation directly involved in the war which was not then in control of its transportation systems. They had all found the absolute necessity for governmental reasons of the control of their railway systems and were exercising that control at the time we undertook it.

You will recall that there was at that time a very considerable railway congestion—a congestion so serious at the terminals that there were piled up for many miles back loaded cars of freight destined for overseas that could not be unloaded because nobody could handle the freight at the terminals and because of the shipping situation.

There was great unrest in the labor world—an unrest that related not only to the railroads but to the entire industrial world. There were then under consideration many demands made by the railway employees of the various railroads for increases in their compensation. The credit of the railroads was perhaps at the lowest ebb that it had ever been since the panic of many years ago. The Government itself was in the market for large loans from the public. It had floated in 1917, on June 15, a loan of $2,000,000,000. It had floated on November 15, 1917, a loan of $3,809,000,000, and it was perfectly apparent that as the war continued the Government would be required to make very much larger loans than these in the near future, and in point of fact it did in May, 1918, float a loan of $4,176,516,000, and again in October of last year a loan of $6,989,047,000, and it is now looking forward to another loan in April of $5,000,000,000 or $6,000,000,000 additional.

Now, I desire that members of the committee should bear in mind this financial situation, because to my mind it is in many ways the crux of the whole proposition that is submitted to this committee at this time for consideration and determination.

It was under these conditions, then, that at the beginning of January, 1918, the Government took over the railroads. For five months those railroads were operated theoretically under Government control, but in all of the major particulars actually under the control of their owners, as they had previously been operated. It was not until the end of May that the Government undertook to put its own people directly in charge of the actual physical operation of the railroads and to separate entirely, financially and otherwise, the relationship of the former railroad owners from the Government.

During much of the more than four months that the railroads were in operation by their own owners, though technically under Government control, there was the severest winter that this country had experienced for many, many years. The severity of that winter served further to accentuate the conditions that confronted the transportation companies of America. It made difficult the movement of trains. It made very much less efficient the actual power of locomotives. It made less efficient the labor of men in the direct operation of the roads, and it served tremendously to accentuate the congestion which existed, and which became so great that it extended all the way from our eastern ports back in some instances nearly as far as if not to Chicago.

This situation had also been accentuated by virtue of the Government's necessary policy in connection with priority orders. In order to facilitate the manufacture and the movement of those things which were most essential for the Government in the prosecution of the war priority orders of shipment went forward, and that served to throw a new element of confusion into the railroad problem. It resulted that during the first four months of 1918 the railroads had fallen $105,000,000 behind what their net for the corresponding period in 1917 had been, and that is to be borne in mind in connection with the actual loss that has occurred over the whole year.

I say these things not as an attempt to justify Government control but I state them because it seems to me essential that men, now that the great emergency that existed and that prompted our action has passed, should keep in mind the condition that actually confronted those in charge and should give credit where credit is due for what was done because of its having to be done under such adverse conditions.

Immediately after we took over the railroads the Government agreed with the railroad employees that it would consider and act upon their claim of grievances and need of additional compensation. They were threatening to strike. It is quite possible that had the Government not taken over the railroads when it did there would have been a great strike in America. Certainly it was very imminent, and the demands of the employees were being urged with great vigor and determination. Of course, it is manifest that the country could not have permitted the tying up of its transportation systems during the prosecution of this great war, but it was also manifest that if you were to get the very best service possible under these many adverse conditions it must have the willing cooperation of the employees of the railroads, and not their sullen cooperation; and so it was agreed with them that the question of compensation would be considered, and inasmuch as it would necessarily take some time for a determination of that question that when rendered it should relate back as of the 1st day of January.

There was, accordingly, a determination had as to the compensation to be paid to the railway employees, and that compensation resulted in an increase over what would have been paid at the rates existing at the time the railroads were taken over for the entire year of $583,552,000. I will insert in my remarks the table submitted by the Railroad Administration showing the estimated increase in wages:

Statement showing estimated pay-roll charges, excluding increases due to increase in rates of pay for the year 1918, and showing estimated increases due to changes in rates of pay and collateral increases made necessary thereby.

Operating expense account.	Estimated pay roll charges, excluding increases.	Total estimated increase.	Per cent total increases over rates of December, 1917.
Maintenance of way and structure	$321,791,000	$96,290,000	29.9
Maintenance of equipment	433,594,000	201,898,000	46.6
Traffic expenses	24,508,000	3,620,000	14.8
Transportation	972,480,000	266,334,000	27.4
General expense	70,420,000	15,410,000	21.9
Total, all operating expenses	1,822,793,000	583,552,000	32.0

The statement does not include the effect of increases covered by supplements 12 and 13, which were promulgated in December, 1918, with regard to which reliable data are not available. The amount of such increases will be relatively small.

Elsewhere in the testimony it will be observed that the Director General gave a figure representing the estimated increases in operating expenses due to the changes in rates of pay of $642,000,000. The difference between that figure and the one shown in the statement above is accounted for by the fact that at the time of filing the above statement more complete data had come to hand than were available at the time the estimate of $642,000,000 was made.

Attention has been called in various places throughout the record to the fact that complete information as to the operations for 1918 can not be available earlier than March 1. It is important that this should be borne in mind in connection with the above statement. The figure of $642,000,000 represented the best estimate that could be made from the information then available. From time to time as additional data are received from the roads the estimates are revised, and the $583,000,000 represents the latest information on the subject.

It represented a 32 per cent increase. Now, I know that there is a popular impression that all of the troubles that confronted the Railway Administration, and which were responsible for a deficit in the operating of the roads, were due to and related to this question of increase of wages. But it seems to me that this conclusion is hardly warranted by the actual facts; certainly not to the extent to which it has been carried. It was not alone in the railroad world that men were getting increased compensation. In point of fact, in most lines they received increases of compensation in excess of 32 per cent over what they had received before.

There is another impression that seems to be pretty general, and yet which the facts, I am sure, do not warrant, and that is that the railroad employees as a body are paid very high wages. Now, that is not true, either. There are certain classes of highly skilled men who are in an organization of high efficiency who have been able in the past to have their wages increased so that some of these men receive large wages as compared with some other wage earners, but I believe that a careful examination of the wages paid to employees will show that in many instances they were very low-paid employees and that the general impression as to their being extravagantly paid is not warranted by the facts.

This increase of wages was made after consideration of a report of a commission appointed by the Director General of Railroads, and that commission was composed of Secretary Lane; Mr. McChord, of the Interstate Commerce Commission; Mr. Covington, a former Member of this House; and Mr. Willcox. In making their report they state this:

It has been a somewhat popular impression that railroad employees were among the most highly paid workers. But figures gathered from the railroads disposed of this belief. Fifty-one per cent of all employees during December, 1917, received $75 per month or less, and 80 per cent received $100 per month or less. Even among the locomotive engineers, commonly spoken of as highly paid, a preponderating number receives less than $170 per month, and this compensation they have attained by the most compact and complete organization, handled with a full appreciation of all strategic values. Between the grades receiving from $150 to $250 per month there is included less than 3 per cent of all the employees (excluding officials) and these aggregate less than 60,000 men out of a grand total of 2,000,000.

The greatest number of employees, on all the roads, fall into the class receiving between $60 and $65 per month—181,693; while within the range of the next $10 in monthly salary there is a total of 312,761 persons. In December, 1917, there were 111,477 clerks receiving annual pay of $900 or less. In 1917 the average pay of this class was but $56.77 per month. There were 270,855 section men whose average pay as a class was $50.31 per month; 121,000 other unskilled laborers whose average pay was $58.25 per month; 130,075 station service employees whose average pay was $58.57 per month; 75,325 road freight brakemen and flagmen whose average pay was $100.17 per month; and 16,465 road passenger brakemen and flagmen whose average pay was $91.10 per month.

Mr. Hines in his testimony makes this statement as to the wage increase:

That act was passed in September, 1916, effective January 1, 1917.

The way Director General McAdoo dealt with that was this: He said to the representatives of labor, who were clamoring for an immediate increase to meet an undoubted increase in the cost of living, that he would, as soon as possible, appoint a wage commission to study the whole matter and that he would, as soon as that commission made a report, make an award on the wage question and would make that award retroactive to January 1. Those people were demanding this as of January 1 before he did it. He then appointed this commission, consisting of Mr. Lane, Mr. McChord, Judge Covington, and Mr. Willcox. The commission made its report, outlining a general scheme of wages, and when that report was acted on and those wage rates were established they were made retroactive to January 1, because that was the arrangement under which labor had worked in the meantime, that whatever was allowed as the result of the report would be made retroactive. It was demanding that at January 1, and was on the point of striking as against the private owners in order to get it.

It was recognized that the situation was so complex and also that the competitive conditions of every sort of labor were so serious that that general treatment which the Lane commission made would not meet the whole situation, so a board of wages and working conditions was created which consisted of three representatives of the railroad management, railroad officials who had long been in the service dealing with labor, and dealing with it, of course, from the private corporation standpoint, and it consisted also of three representatives of labor. That was a bipartisan board of six, three railroad representatives and three labor representatives, and every claim for any adjustment of wages in addition to what was allowed on the basis of the report of the Lane commission was referred to that bipartisan board. That bipartisan board went into the matter and made recommendations, and those recommendations were what have constituted the basis for the allowance of increases in addition to the Lane report.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will, but I should prefer to go forward.

Mr. BLACK. If the gentleman can do so during his statement, I should like to have him give us some figures showing what these different classes of employees now receive, because I have a table here that shows a very abnormal increase.

Mr. SHERLEY. I have not that table. If I had it I would be glad to put it into the RECORD.

Now, I did not make this statement as expressing an opinion in connection with the amounts of increase that were allowed these men, but I did it in order that the House might be in possession of the facts upon which the action was based. Whether the conclusions were warranted is a matter about which there will probably be disputes until the end of time.

There was not only this increase of expense of $583,500,000 in the wages of the employees, but there was an increase in regard to everything else. The railroads were in the same situation that other people were in. The markets that they had to go into for purchases were higher than ever known before. In addition to that they were confronted with a very serious labor shortage, and their labor shortage was more acute in one particular than that which pertained to other industries, because they had to deal not only with that shortage of labor which was general to the country because of the mobilization of men into the Army, but in addition to that the Government was operating a very extensive railway system in France, and in order to operate that it required a very large demand to be made directly upon the skilled class of labor that they looked to and had had in their employ in connection with the operation of the railroads here.

The result was that they had to employ a great deal of labor that was not skilled; that could not give the same amount of efficient work that regular employees had given, and there had to be a great deal of overtime; and overtime is not only expensive in the agreement as to the payment for it but it is also expensive as a character of work. Overtime work is never economical work, speaking by and large.

In order to meet this situation the Railroad Administration, under the authority to the President granted by Congress, undertook to increase the rates, both passenger and freight. The increased passenger rates went into effect on June 10, 1918, and in freight rates on June 25; so that, generally speaking, the Government got the benefit of the increased rates for a little over six months. It met the burden of increased cost for 12 months, and that is a factor that must be taken into consideration in connection with the whole problem.

United States Railroad Administration—Class 1 roads and large terminal companies.

Estimated increase in revenues in 1918 account increase in freight and passenger rates:

Total revenues 12 months ended Dec. 31, 1918	$4,883,970,652
Total revenues 6 months ended June 30, 1918	2,081,448,000
Total revenues 6 months ended Dec. 31, 1918	2,802,522,652
Estimated total revenues excluding increases of 25 per cent in rates	2,242,018,122
Estimated increase in revenue due to increased rates	560,504,530

This increase divides between freight and passenger revenues approximately as follows:

Freight revenue	$414,773,352
Passenger revenue	145,731,178
Total	560,504,530

The result of the first year's operation by the railroads was as the statement appears in this record, and which is used in connection with the figures, a deficit of $196,000,000. Later figures have shown that it is now about $205,000,000, covering practically the entire operation. Gentlemen will understand that it is a full month after any previous month before accurate figures can be had touching operations, and therefore the statement made by Mr. Hines, the Director General, of $196,000,000 was a statement approximately made. It is the figure that is carried in the financial statement here, having in mind, however, that it was not a final statement, because the Director General, in his oral testimony, constantly speaks of a deficit of $200,000,000. The actual deficit will be, as I have suggested, probably $205,000,000.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman pardon me in that connection? What do the figures "$381,000,000" mean, "amount to be provided to settle all accounts"?

Mr. SHERLEY. I would rather not answer that now, but I will come to the financial statement in a few moments and show you how those figures arose. So that of the $500,000,000 which Congress appropriated in order to enable the Government to operate the railroads there must be $205,000,000 charged up to profit and loss.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does that statement cover all the loss?

Mr. SHERLEY. It covers all the loss for the fiscal year 1918.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the gentleman will pardon me, does it cover the expense of operating the railroad bureau here?

Mr. SHERLEY. It covers all those expenses. They are predicated on the idea of the net returns as against the operating expenses, together with the agreed standard returns to be made to the railroads.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I may be in error, but I understood that the appropriation to carry on the railroad bureau here was carried in another item entirely.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman is mistaken.

So that of the $500,000,000 that we gave you can charge off $205,000,000, or, according to the figures I have been using here, $196,000,000. When we made provision in the railroad act for this $500,000,000 fund it apparently was not contemplated by anybody that the Government would have to supply any funds for working capital for the operation of the railroads. Either it was believed that the railroads could furnish that working capital with the turning over of the railroad properties or else the matter, like many other things, was not thought of in connection with the discussion and the legislation had.

But when it came to making agreements with the railroads themselves, they insisted that they were not able to supply to the Government the working capital necessary for the operation of the railroads. And if they were required to give up without getting any credit all the moneys they had out in the hands of conductors, agents, cash in the treasury, they would be unable to meet the heavy investments they had made in connection with betterments in anticipation of existing and greater needs that were to come, and with the idea that, perhaps, by buying then they could buy for less than they could later in a constantly rising market.

The consequence was that Mr. McAdoo, in making agreements with the railroads in the standard form of contract set out in the hearings, agreed that they should not be required to furnish working capital, and that whatever moneys were taken over by the Government along with the properties themselves the railroads should have the credit for.

Now, men may agree or disagree as to the wisdom of that act. It is, however, an accomplished fact, and the contracts made with many of the railroads, and to be made, so provide. The result is that the Government has of its cash tied up $247,000,000—that is, in cash it has on hand—and $154,000,000 of agents' and conductors' balances.

Manifestly, assuming that these amounts remain about constant, at the end of the Federal control these moneys will come back into the Federal Treasury; that it is what might be called working capital, and will become free the moment we cease to operate the railroads, and it will then come back as a credit on the appropriations that have been made and are now being asked for.

At present there is $247,100,000 tied up as cash and $154,000,000 as balances in the hands of agents and conductors. That represents about the money necessary—being less than a month's outgo—about what is necessary to have either in the Treasury or in the hands of conductors and agents.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. Does it not require $325,000,000 per month for the railroads now?

Mr. SHERLEY. At least that. Another situation arose. The railroads had, as I have stated, considerable quantities of material and supplies on hand at the time the Government took over the railroad property. It was insisted on the part of the railroads that the Government should pay them for such material and supplies, and in giving over the railroads for a standard return they were giving the railroads and not the material and supplies. The Government insisted, however, that they were part of the railroad property and came to the Government as such and it was so determined. But in connection with negotiations that came up in connection with the balances due by the Government and by the railroads to the Government, advances made by the Government, present payment would not be demanded when supplies and materials taken over gave the Government ample security. Gentlemen must recollect that during the first five months, as I have stated, the railroad owners operated their roads, although under Government control, practically as they had been operated before, there was a commingling—I do not mean that the records do not exist—of the receipts and expenditures that belong to the railroads and to the Government. There were bills coming over from the previous year, expenditures being made to be charged some to the Government and some to the railroads, and there was a general handling of the railroads as they had been handled before. When it came to the adjustment of balances on open accounts the railroads insisted that if they were required to pay all the moneys that might be shown to be due by them to the Government, they would not be able to do it; that they did not have the money and they did not have the credit and could not get the money. It was finally agreed in the contract that they should not be required to make these returns, but that they would be held as advances by the Government to them where the material and supplies that had been turned over were amply sufficient to secure the Government against any possible loss.

An estimate of $100,000,000 is made in connection with the financial statements as covering those advances that have been made to the railroad companies. That, therefore, is $100,000,000 that is tied up and that will be reimbursed and it is amply secured by material and supplies which the Government obtained when it took over the railroads, but it, together with the items of $247,100,000 of cash, $154,000,000 of agents' and conductors' balances, makes a total of $501,100,000. Against that are outstanding bills to be paid, accounts, etc., coming over from 1918, of $162,047,865, making a net amount of assets that the Government would have, if we were to settle now on the basis of the 1918 situation, of $339,052,135, but which, as long as we are continuing to operate the railroads, and in point of fact for some months after, until final adjustments can be made, will be tied up.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. It is stated that the current fund necessary to operate monthly is about $350,000,000. At the time the roads were taken over there must have been a current balance in the hands of the various railroad companies of about that amount. What became of that fund?

Mr. SHERLEY. I stated just a few moments ago that the railroad companies insisted, if they were required to give that fund to the Government for its use in connection with the operation of the railroads, that they would be in a position where they could not meet their outstanding obligations.

Mr. SNYDER. When the Government took the roads over it must have taken those current balances and then returned them.

Mr. SHERLEY. They took them, and they gave credit to the railroads for that amount of money.

Mr. SNYDER. There does not seem to be anything in this report showing that.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will examine the hearings he will find an explanation, and particularly at the conclusion a financial statement which, I think, perhaps, is a little bit clearer and more easily understood than what is put in the report, which was the statement made by the Director General on the submission of the estimates; and may I say, in answer to the gentleman's inquiry, and his implied criticism—and I am not objecting to the criticism—that it is practically impossible for any man to undertake to set out in either a financial table or a speech anything except the result of balances back and forth in credits and debits as to open accounts, and various other matters involving all of the railroads of America. I have worked intermittently, with my other duties for some two or three weeks to try and reduce down to its simplest form this financial problem, and I think the gentleman will appreciate that there are many things that I can not give him in detail, and yet the books and the statements of the Director General amply warrant the conclusions which I have set out here as to details that need to be taken into consideration in connection with the financial statement.

Mr. SNYDER. I hope sincerely that the gentleman had no idea that I had any intention to criticize.

Mr. SHERLEY. Not in the slightest.

Mr. SNYDER. I appreciate quite fully how carefully the gentleman presents all of his statements to the House.

Mr. SHERLEY. I took occasion, because of the gentleman's question, to explain why it is that there are some processes in reaching a conclusion that I would not be able to state unless I was a very skilled actuary, and I am not.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Of course the gentleman concedes that these statements are confusing, particularly to those of us who have not had the advantage or the disadvantage the gentleman has had in going into these figures, but could the gentleman state, roughly, the main items of which the $750,000,000 is made up?

Mr. SHERLEY. I shall come to it, if the gentleman will permit, and then I shall make a summary of the whole in the most condensed form I am able to make it. If the gentleman will look on page 188 of the hearings, he will find a financial statement that undertakes to reduce that down, but I was trying in a narrative form to give some of the very processes that have just been requested in regard to how this money was tied up, and why it is that we need this additional amount of money. If I have made myself clear, I have undertaken to show that there is necessarily tied up $339,052,135, as what might be called a working fund of the Government in connection with the operation of the railroads.

I now come to the next item, which represents an investment upon the part of the Government concerning which the Government can not immediately or perhaps for some years expect a return for, and yet it represents that much actual cash necessarily tied up, and that is in connection with the matter of betterments—and I think this is the matter about which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] inquired. One of the very purposes for taking over the railroads was by giving the Government's credit to the extent it might be necessary and having control over the matter to make sure that there should be those improvements made in the roads and in the rolling stock that were necessary in order to do the business of the Nation.

Gentlemen must bear in mind this very fundamental thing: You can not look upon the railroads simply as you would look upon ordinary commercial enterprises. The railroads of a country are the very vitals of a country. Destroy the transportation of a country and you have absolutely destroyed the progress of a country, and it was perfectly manifest to any man with the least sort of vision that you could not undertake to conduct a great war, making a tremendous demand upon America, unless you had your railroad facilities to some degree adequate to handle the tremendous volume of traffic that was the essential of the successful prosecution of the war.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. I have not had the opportunity of reading this report as fully as I would like, but could the gentleman give me in a very short way, if it is possible, the loss the Government has sustained in a year's time in the operation of the railroads?

Mr. SHERLEY. I have already stated it—$196,000,000, according to this financial statement, and I further stated that on a more complete return it would probably be $205,000,000. I wish again to suggest—and it is not out of any discourtesy—that I believe it will expedite the understanding of this problem if I am permitted in a broad way to state this intricate case, and then I shall come back to any questions anybody may desire to ask me. When the Government took over the railroads it immediately sent out an inquiry to all of the former owners of the roads, asking them to submit an estimate—a budget—of what they needed and believed ought to be expended in connection with betterments or capital investment, and in capital investment are included improvements to roads and rolling stock or equipment.

They made a report which was scrutinized and checked and very greatly reduced, and the Government then undertook what apparently would be a final investment of something like $1,300,- 000,000 in the way of additional equipment and betterment for the roads of the country. This necessarily went through various stages of modification and contraction, and after the armistice was very severely cut down in connection with future betterments. Gentlemen will find on page 109 of the hearings a statement by Mr. Hines touching this budget. For the year 1918 there was actually spent in the way of betterments for the railroads, either on roads or equipment, $573,334,119, and that figure it is well to bear in mind. Now, of that amount $283,945,575 was for road improvement, improvement on the roadbeds, terminals, sidings, and so forth, and $289,388,544 represented equipment. Some of that equipment had been ordered by the railroads in 1917, was delivered in 1918, and some of it was equipment which the Government ordered; but the total is in the amount which I have stated.

Now, of this total of five hundred and seventy-three million and odd dollars of capital investment, the railroads will be required to pay out of their assets and by deduction from the standard return which is to be made to the roads under the law as passed, with the contracts which are being entered into, $282,515,836, which we will leave as advancements made by the Government in the way of betterments or capital amounting to $290,918,283. And gentlemen will find that by the testimony and in the financial sheet that is presented that figure is carried in right along, $290,918,283, which represents the amount of investment that the Government has made in the year 1918 for the railroads of America. Of this amount probably—and the reason I say probably is because all of these matters of one hundred and seventy-odd roads are matters of adjustment as to how much shall be allocated here and there—$70,585,827 will be in improvement of roadbeds as such and $220,332,456 will be in equipment. Now that represents the debt of the railroad companies to the Government, and the question very naturally arises why should they not be required to pay it to the extent, at least, that they owe for moneys under the standard return. And that, gentlemen, brings you really to the crux of a very large part of this proposition as to how much money you shall vote to the administration at this time. The theory upon which we have proceeded the Railway Administration has been proceeding; the theory upon which the railway act was passed and the theory that the facts as they exist in the financial world at large would seem to compel is this: That the railroads, by virtue of their standard return, should be given such revenues as to enable them to meet their fixed charges, to take care of such dividends as have in the three-year period past been paid and are warranted in being paid by virtue of the previous financial condition of such roads. Now, gentlemen will realize that a railroad corporation, so to speak, never expects to pay its investment debts.

It never undertakes, except to a limited extent and a very limited extent, to take care of additions and betterments out of earnings, but what it does undertake to do is this: To make such a return from the use of its properties as will safely guarantee and meet at their maturity all of the interest charges and the payment of such a dividend in connection with stock as warrants the investing public to have invested either in their bonds or in their stock. I take it that, in a broad way, is what we will all agree is a necessary and proper policy in connection with a concern that never expects to have any end to its life. It will always be presumably a public utility performing a certain function and expects to continue to get investment in its capital by virtue of making earnings that warrant a return to the investors upon the money which they have invested. One of the reasons why the Government took over the railroads was not only in order to have a unified control which would enable them to move freight and handle the movement of troops and the war situation from an entirely governmental viewpoint, but it was also with the idea of making a certain and stable condition in connection with the roads of the country that there might not be created a condition by which their credits would go to pieces, where failure to meet interest charges would result in receivership, and their lack of credit deny any possibility of betterment and a serious impairment of the vital transportation systems of America. Now, that is not simply theory on my part. I think the hearings before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House in connection with the railroad bill will bear out that general conclusion, and it is interesting to find that Commissioner Anderson, when interrogated to some extent by various Members, among others by my colleague, Mr. BARKLEY, of Kentucky, testified as to various sections of the law. In regard to section 5 he said:

> Section 5 is intended to prevent any manipulation of the stock market.
> It provides:
> "That no carrier while under Federal control shall, without the prior approval of the President, declare or pay any dividend in excess of its regular rate of dividends during the three years ending June 30, 1917: Provided, however, That such carriers as have paid no regular dividends or no dividends during said period may, with the prior approval of the President, pay dividends at such rate as the President may determine."
> It is contemplated that the standard return will be adequate to pay standard, regular dividends, and that it is desirable for the stabilization of the security market that those standard dividends or regular dividends should be paid. It is conceivable, if the purchasing power of money goes down, that it may be desirable that a regular dividend—for instance, the New York Central's 5 per cent—should be increased to 6 per cent; therefore we put in there the words "with the prior approval of the President."

Now, the very moment you deny to the railroads a sufficient payment to enable those standard roads whose past history and management have justified the dividends they were paying in the three-year prewar period to pay such dividends that moment you hurt as nothing else could hurt the credit of the railroads.

Now, the credit of the railroads is essential, if they are to pay for betterments at all, and betterments are necessary if the railroads are to be run. You can not stop putting additional capital in. The result is that you can not simply say, "Well, the railroads owe us for betterments; why should we pay them any money in order that they may pay dividends to their stockholders when they are owing us?" That would be true and is true if you were undertaking to give them of the standard return such an amount as would permit them to pay dividends where the character of the roads' earnings in the past did not warrant that.

Of course no railroad whose earnings and whose credit have been of such a character because of its earnings as to show that it is not able to take care of, not to-day, not to-morrow, not in three months, but to take care of over a normal period, the financing of its betterments ought to be permitted to pay dividends, and it is not permitted under any of these arrangements.

There has been paid in 1918 by the railroad companies as dividends that are recognized by the Government a total of $253,784,597. Part of those dividends were paid out of income aside from that which they got from the standard return. These railroads got from other income $183,674,292. So that of these dividends which have been paid, $97,901,372 represents what they have paid in 1918 out of standard returns. But I think the division is not material, because I do not agree with the suggestion that whether they should be permitted to pay dividends to that extent ought to be determined by how much comes from the standard return or from their other income. They ought to use all the income, whether it comes from the Government or comes otherwise, in meeting their fixed charges and as a basis for their financial credit in connection with betterments and capital invested.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman let me give him a thought there?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. The facts exist, as shown by the testimony, that no dividends were paid by the Government or allowed in the standard return except those that have been actually earned as exhibited by the prewar period.

Mr SHERLEY. Unquestionably. I undertook to make that plain either impliedly or directly, and I am glad to have the gentleman emphasize it.

Somebody may contend, "Why should you not take this $290,000,000, which represents the Government investment in these railroads, and reduce it by holding out from the standard return enough money, at least, as represents what these railroads are paying out in dividends to the stockholders, and let the stockholders look to the railroads to get their dividends for them elsewhere?" Now, that has some force if you do not look into it. It is not the Government's business normally to undertake to guarantee returns to investors in railroad securities. I am the last man on earth to believe that the Government ought to, as a fixed policy, undertake to say to the investors, "We will guarantee you by paying other bills for you, that you shall always get your dividends." I think it is necessary and proper that the Government by its regulation of rates should see to it that railroads properly managed, with all that those words "properly managed" imply, should be permitted to make such earnings as will enable them to pay their operating expenses and fixed charges and pay a proper dividend upon the investment, because otherwise you will never be able to finance railroads.

But the proposition that confronts the House and the country is not what may be desirable as a broad proposition, but what is the fact growing out of the Government taking over the railroads. Men say the Government ought not to have taken them over. I do not agree with that. I think we had to do it in connection with the war, but whether we had to do it or not we have done it. And we can not, much as we would like to do it, dismiss the facts that exist. The tendency of all of us here is to try to think back to more than any three-year prewar period.

Our legislative minds flow back, and we think of the old days when anything such as is suggested now would have been looked on as folly, and therefore we jump to the conclusion that because it would have been folly then it is folly now, and in jumping to the conclusion we jump over the tremendous controlling, determining factors that grow out of the greatest cataclysm that the world ever saw. We have got to pay our war bills, and some of our war bills will consist in just these temporary advancements made to the railroads. Men who are not willing to bear those things in mind, it seems to me, are unable to cope with the situation, a situation that is trying in the last degree. It is not pleasant for me to stand here and recommend expenditures.

I realize, and I think I very soberly realize, the tremendous demands that are going to be made upon the credit of America, and I do not want to make the borrowing of the American Government more extensive than is absolutely necessary. But sometimes you have to go forward if you are to come out at all. And in my judgment—and it is only my judgment, and I quarrel with no man who differs with it—if you undertake at this particular time to force the railroads to finance all previous betterments and all of those that must be made in the year 1919, you will force them into a market where they can not do it, and if they did do it, it would be at a cost to the Government in the increase of rates in connection with its own borrowing that would more than offset any economy in retaining in the Treasury a limited amount of money.

Now, if I am wrong in that, much of this proposition here falls to the ground; but I do not believe, and the Secretary of the Treasury does not believe, as he testified, that we can at this moment say to the railroads, "You must go into the open market and from private financial sources borrow all the money necessary to repay the Government for all the advances it has made in 1918, and in addition to that you must meet the obligations that are going to mature in 1919 and take care of the additional betterments that must be made to keep the roads running."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be granted an additional hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kentucky be granted an additional hour. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, if gentlemen differ with me, if gentlemen think that you can repudiate what underlies this contract and say to the railroads, "You shall not pay these dividends until you have paid us," presumably you may reduce as to the $290,000,000 figure that is put in here as capital investment by the Government something like $175,000,000 or $200,000,000.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. I would like to ask the gentleman this question: As I understand by the statement that the gentleman has made, if we should appropriate in this bill $381,000,000 it would take care of all of the commitments of the Government for 1918 and leave a working capital of $247,000,000 in the Treasury. Now, does the gentleman think it would be any repudiation of any obligation of the Government to eliminate $369,000,000 that contemplates advancing that much to the railroads in 1919? Would that in fact be a repudiation of any obligation?

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not prepared to say it would be a repudiation, but I am prepared to say—and I hope to reach 1919 in a few minutes—that it would be an unwise conclusion, and a conclusion fraught with more evil to the Government than the advance of the money it represents; and that, of course, is one of the factors for Congress to determine. But I do not believe that you can now, or within the next three or four or five or six months, expect the railroads to finance their needs to the extent of taking care of the equipment that we have ordered and of the equipment that must be ordered and of the road improvements; and this would result if they did not do it: That as to this equipment, which the Government has obligated itself to pay, there would be a repudiation, if the Government did not pay, for the $286,000,000 worth of equipment which the Government has already ordered and which is to be delivered in 1919. If we did not pay it, and the railroads were not able to pay it, you would simply have the result of having that amount of debt, owed to the various equipment companies which furnished the rolling stock, not paid. You would have men thrown out of employment. You would cut down overnight the entire amount of employment that would go to railroad extension, and you would involve, in my judgment, the financial stability of this country to as great an extent as you could possibly do it by any one single act.

Now, that is my opinion. I have had but little dealing in connection with finance except as it relates to appropriations and governmental matters. I am not an expert as to what a market can do. But I submit that, in view of what it is going to be required to do for the Government, of at least lending $6,000,000,000 to us very shortly, it is asking a good deal to place upon it the entire burden of financing betterments that ought to amount to $800,000,000 and odd this year for the railroads.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. Right there, in support of the gentleman's statement, let me remind the gentleman of the fact that the additions and betterments for 1918 and the estimated amount for 1919 will amount to over $1,060,000,000, and of course they could not pay it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. In a moment. In regard to what the gentleman has just said, the railroads under private ownership for the past 10 years prior to our taking them over made a capital investment annually, according to the Interstate Commerce Commission, of $566,000,000, and, according to the estimate of Judge Lovett, of $591,000,000. In 1918, as I have explained, our investment amounts to $573,334,000, and the contemplated expenditure for 1919 is $777,000,000, or a total of $1,350,334,119, or an average for the two years of $675,167,059.

Some one says that is nearly $100,000,000 in excess of the average of the railroads heretofore. Figured in cost of work and materials, it is less than the average of 10 years before.

Now, the Lord knows that there was a lot of need in the way of betterments in connection with the railroads in the past 10 years, and we found it out when we came into an acute situation. For more than 10 years past the country has never faced a high tide of industrial output without finding an inadequacy of rail transportation. So that I submit it is not unreasonable to expect an investment for the coming year of $777,000,000, and I do not believe that you can get that done simply by the railroads financing it. Much of it has to be met right away, because this equipment, this rolling stock, is coming in from day to day and the bills have to be paid, and if you do not pay them you will hurt the credit of the railroads.

You are very much in the situation of a banker that made advances to a manufacturer. He comes with a need for additional credit for a limited amount of time; if given to him, he can make out and make payment back. If not given to him, he must shut down and go into the hands of a receiver. The very essence of sound banking consists at times—though it must be done with care and not with recklessness—in making additional advances in order to make secure what you have already done in order to enable the man to live.

Now, except to the individual manufacturer it is not very important whether he lives or not, but it is intensely important whether the railroads live or not; not simply from the standpoint of railroad investment or railroad ownership, but from the standpoint of the prosperity of this country.

Mr. DEWALT. I wish the gentleman would state right in that connection, too, that of this $771,000,000 which is estimated for 1919, $286,000,000 is already contracted for and to be delivered.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is true. I so stated. It represents equipment that we ordered and for which we are responsible.

Now, if I may digress—and I will hasten on, because one could talk for months on a problem so big as this, and I do not want to tire the House—of the $573,000,000 that we have advanced in the way of capital investment, we are going on the basis of making them pay out of their standard return $214,000,000, which we take from the standard return as a surplus over what they need for their fixed charges and those dividends which are recognizable as proper to be paid, and from other sources we reduce the total amount down to $290,000,000. Of that $290,000,000 that we have invested, what will be the situation? As to that part which represents rolling stock, probably there will be equipment trusts taken in the future. When those equipment trusts are given they are usually conditioned upon an initial payment of 25 per cent and an annual payment of 5 per cent for 15 years thereafter; and after there have been two annual payments, certainly after there have been three, which will represent 40 per cent of the loan, you will have a security that is of the highest marketable value, because the depreciation in value of rolling stock from year to year will be nothing like sufficient to eat up the 40 per cent of payment; and, having the leeway that you will have, you can in an ordinary market float the equipment trust without great difficulty. So that presumably the Government will be able to take, of this amount which it has put in for equipment, the equipment trusts of the railroads; and even if the railroads did not have the money to make the initial 25 per cent payment, and the Government advanced that and advanced the two-year 5 per cent payments, making 35 per cent, it could then take those equipment trusts and sell them in an ordinary market for their face value, and would thereby have reduced its indebtedness from the 100 per cent represented to 35 per cent of the loan.

Now, touching the investment made in road improvements, where they have bonds that they can issue under mortgages that have been created, we can take those bonds as security. Where they have not, and where they can issue additional mortgages on property not already covered by mortgages, we can take that security. In any event, with anything like normal conditions we ought to be able to have the railroads begin to pay back some of this money at the end of this calendar year or the early part of the next year, and in the course of a limited number of years they ought to be able to reimburse the Government entirely. Now, they will not only be able to do it, in my judgment, but they will be desirous of doing it, because they are being charged 6 per cent interest. The good roads, at least, will be able to refinance their capital investment in normal times at a rate of interest less than 6 per cent, and manifestly being able to do it they will be anxious to do it, and as early as they can they will refinance themselves and so pay the Government.

It is possible that as to some of this $290,000,000 there may be some bad debts. I am trying to tell the House every phase of this problem I see. I do not know enough about the credits and the management of railroads to take even the presumptive allocation of this amount in the various roads and say, "This is going to be a bad debt," "This is going to be a good debt," "This may be a doubtful debt." But I think it is fair to presume, and the Director General thinks it is fair to presume, that the very great part of this investment will be repaid to the Government.

In addition to that $290,000,000, which represents additions and betterments, we have advanced to inland waterways $4,361,486. I shall not take the time of the House to go into the details of that. It represents $500,000 of an operating loss. The rest of it represents an investment in boats and in barges, and relates practically to three waterways—the New York Barge Canal, the Warrior River, and the Mississippi River.

It is believed that a little longer period in operation will serve to demonstrate how much of truth or falsity there is in the general belief, so often expressed on this floor, that with a proper arrangement for receiving and delivering freight from rail to water and from water to rail many of these waterways can be made productive and profitable and serve to relieve the tremendous burden upon the railroads. But the investment has been made to that extent; the bills have been paid and represent that expenditure for boats and barges on these three streams, less $500,000, which is an operating loss.

Mr. HARDY. Is not that investment so infinitesimal that it gives really no test of the problem?

Mr. SHERLEY. It does not give a final test, but I think it might give a very good one as to these particular streams, and the Director General of Railroads rather hopes and believes that it will justify much that has been said in connection with waterway improvement and development.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. FREAR. The Director General has also stated, has he not, that unless the railroads are kept in public use it will be a waste of money?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; I have never heard that statement.

Mr. FREAR. Was not that the suggestion in his report?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not know what Mr. McAdoo may have suggested.

Mr. FREAR. That is what I mean.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am speaking of the present Director General, Mr. Hines. I think this is true, and I think it ought to be true, that when we come to legislate instead of talking about the railroad problem we ought to provide for an interchange, compel an interchange of freight from rail to water and from water to rail.

I have long ago come to the conclusion that most of our investment in river improvements is wasted unless we are going to do away with antiquated methods in connection with water transportation. The negro and the mule on the levee as a means of interchange will have to be superseded if you are to have water transportation worth your while. If you expect the rivers to create and originate enough freight to warrant their being used in any large degree you are mistaken. It is possible that the Ohio might do it for down-river freight, on account of the tremendous tonnage that originates at Pittsburgh on that river, but speaking by and large it is hopeless.

Gentlemen, you have got to have a physical connection with the handling of freight back and forth between the rivers and the railroads, but that is another problem.

Mr. FREAR. If the gentleman will permit one question more. The direct relation of the Director General's suggestion is more in line in the controlling of the rates of the railroads, because if that is eliminated there is very little hope.

Mr. SHERLEY. You have got to control the rates, and you have to do more than that. In my judgment, you ought not to prohibit water and rail combinations, but you should compel it and control it. I have fought for that for 10 years, and for that reason I have not of late years been much enamored with the river and harbor bills passed by Congress.

In addition, there was an investment of $51,475,000 in the New York, New Haven & Hartford. The reason for that was this, and I shall not take time to go into the details of it—they had to refund a lot of their investments. They had two-year notes out that were maturing. They were not able to get a renewal of those loans. The Government undertook to investigate the situation, and came to the conclusion that they were not able to renew those loans. They could not.

Mr. DEWALT. Forty-three million?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; and the betterments ran the matter up to fifty-one million. It became perfectly apparent that if they did not meet the notes at maturity that would mean repudiation, with a receivership. The Government could not afford to have a receivership of the New York, New Haven & Hartford at that time. It either had to have it or make the loan, and it made the loan.

That is the fact, and I am not here to undertake to pass personal judgment on whether the loan could have been privately financed or not, but men who were charged with that high responsibility determined that it could not be, and they made the loan. It is there, and we have to meet it as an actual fact.

Mr. DICKINSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. DICKINSON. What is the gentleman's opinion as to whether that railroad corporation is not now about to go into the hands of a receiver after this loan has been made?

Mr. SHERLEY. I have no information as to that. I have information that the obligations they took were secured by a mortgage under which prior loans come in on a parity with this, and the security is deemed sufficient to take care of the loan that the Government made.

Mr. DEWALT. The gentleman will remember that this was at the time of the third liberty loan.

Mr. SHERLEY. I understand it was, but, as I say, I am not sufficiently acquainted with the financial stability of the road to prophesy the future, and I think I am not required to in considering this proposition.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Was all of this investment in the road made through the Railroad Administration? Was not a part made through the War Finance Corporation?

Mr. SHERLEY. The War Finance Corporation may have temporarily helped and have been reimbursed when the Railroad Administration made the loan, as it has done a number of times. But the fact is there is now an investment by the Government as a loan to the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad of $51,475,000.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does that represent the total amount the Government has financed the road?

Mr. SHERLEY. It does, as I understand it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. My impression was that a substantial sum was loaned by the War Finance Corporation.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think not. I did not have occasion to go into that.

Now, coming to the matter the gentleman asked me about, how I arrived at the $381,000,000. I arrived at it this way: The $290,918,283 betterments that I have undertaken to explain; working capital, $339,521,350, I have explained as to how that was arrived at; financing inland waterways, $4,361,486; New York, New Haven & Hartford, $51,475,000; operating deficit, $196,000,000; total, $881,806,904. From which is to be subtracted the $500,000,000 furnished under the appropriations heretofore made, leaving $381,806,904 as the amount believed necessary in order to liquidate and clean up along the lines I have indicated the 1918 transactions.

Now we come to 1919, and I will try to be brief. This financial statement is predicated on the belief that there will be no operating deficit for 1919. Whether that belief is justified you can judge as well as I.

There has been a deficit in 1918, but it is to be remembered that in 1919 there will be a benefit over the whole year of increased yield from freight rates, whereas in 1918 there was only the benefit of five and a half months. Assuming as efficient an administration as you can expect under the circumstances, the whole question of whether we will have an operating deficit will depend very largely upon the general conditions of the country. And by efficient administration I mean as efficient as you can expect from a central Government agency—and the trouble there is not simply that it is governmental, it is also this: You can get efficiency by consolidation up to a certain point, but fortunately for mankind there is a limit to which you can make consolidation and keep efficiency.

I think some of the great trusts will find that out, if they have not already found it out, and certainly the operation from one central control of a railroad system for 110,000,000 people is too big a task, in my judgment, to be done efficiently, and if there was no other reason than that it would be a sufficient reason against Government ownership; it is not a practical thing to do.

There has been a falling off in railroad freight during the month of January. That will probably continue for four or five months. Indications are for a large harvest in the fall and to a large resumption of activity in the country. If these indications should turn out to be facts, we will have a volume of business in the fall that will more than take care of the slack business in the early part of the year, and we ought to come out without a loss. Whether we can, I do not know, and every gentleman is welcome to his own opinion. If we do not, there will be that much more in the way of loss to the Government; but at present this statement is predicated upon the belief that there will be none; and when I say "this statement" I mean the statement of the Railroad Administration in presenting the estimates to the Congress.

As to 1919, we have made commitments in connection with inland waterways for additional equipment of $12,840,000.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I would like to be advised about these contracts that have been made for equipment for the present year. Are any of those contracts in such shape that they may with safety be canceled?

Mr. SHERLEY. I should say that of all the contracts that are figured in here none of them could be canceled, because most of them were made long ago—last year. Mr Hines so testified (see p. 118 of the hearings). The highest sort of pressure was placed upon the people to fulfill the contracts, and I believe no one is of the opinion that they ought not to be carried through. I am not speaking now of the water contracts, but of the rail contracts for equipment, because practically nobody questions the need of this amount of equipment. Here is what the railroads would like: I think some of them would be very glad to have us get this equipment, pay for it at the highest cost of the contract, they not to accept the allocation of it to them, and when the roads are turned back to them continue to use that equipment and then take it in upon the basis of what they would determine was its value as of that time, because that would reduce their capital investment that much; and it has been a habit for a good many years past for a good many railroads to manage their property by using other people's rolling stock; and I expect they would have no objection to using the Government's.

Mr. ESCH. The allocation of cars under the 1918 contracts was really made compulsory on the carriers. Is that policy to be continued in respect to the 1919 contracts?

Mr. SHERLEY. I would not say that the allocation was compulsory, but, when made, the price is accepted by the railroads.

Mr. ESCH. But they have refused in some instances to accept them because they were delivered to them at war prices.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is just the point. What they would have to prove would be not that the price was wrong, but that it was not right to allocate to them a given number of cars. Unless they could prove that, the price at which they were allocated is not disputable, as I understand it.

Mr. ESCH. Now, that peace has come, will there be that necessity in the current year?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think so. I think it will be wrong if the railroads were permitted to say, "We do not want these cars at the price you have paid for them, but we will take them provided you reduce the price." The only question that the railroads should be permitted in good faith to present is whether the allocation of a given number of locomotives or of cars to a particular railroad was fair, considering their need and the total equipment that was ordered, and so forth, but having once determined that that allocation was fair they ought to pay the price, because if they had been running the railroads they would have had to have those cars to have performed their duties as public carriers, and they would have had to pay the price the Government paid, and there can not be an equity in my judgment otherwise.

Mr. ESCH. That allocation was based on war conditions, and 100,000 cars were ordered.

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; it was based on war conditions to a certain extent only. Where they can show that the doing of a particular thing was necessary because of a purely war need, they may have some claim against an allocation, but with the railroads themselves ordering additional equipment and wanting additional equipment, wanting any that the Government has ordered, with a lot of the 1918 equipment, equipment they themselves ordered, I take it that the only real question is whether in particular instances there have been as to a limited number of cars or locomotives proper allocations. But, then, I am not deciding that question. That would be a matter the railroads and the Government will probably litigate about for some years to come.

Mr. HARDY. For the efficient transportation of this year's fall crop, if it should be such as the gentleman just indicated, we would be likely to need even more equipment than is ordered.

Mr. SHERLEY. I have not the slightest doubt that the amount of equipment is less than what it ought to be, if you are efficiently to run the roads at their highest maximum efficiency.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman was starting to explain about water transportation equipment.

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I was wondering whether any provision had been made for the interchange of equipment or freight rates between the railroads and the water transportation.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think that under the present Government control there is some adjustment of rates, but I did not go into that subject to any extent, and I have not any real information upon it.

Mr. MADDEN. The only question which occurred to me in connection with the development of the water transportation facilities was whether it would be worth while for the Government to invest a large amount of money in equipment for that purpose unless we could interchange with the railroads.

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, I agree with the gentleman, but I would be very much more concerned with the question that he raises if it were a question whether we should invest rather than a question of paying for an investment we have already made.

Mr. MADDEN. If the obligation is already made——

Mr. SHERLEY. That is the fact and the Committee on Appropriations was faced with that fact. It has brought that fact to the House.

Mr. MADDEN. I did not understand the gentleman to say the obligation was already made, otherwise I would not have asked.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, if gentlemen will permit I would like to state the theory of the 1919 program. We have agreed—it is about to be consummated, is practically consummated—to finance to the extent of $20,000,000 the Boston & Maine reorganization.

There, again, was a railroad the history of which we are all more or less familiar with, and about which we have opinions more or less favorable, but the fact remains that the Boston & Maine is in a situation where the administration felt that it was necessary to undertake to the extent of $20,000,000 to finance its reorganization, and that matter has gone to the extent of a practical accomplishment. Now, we have, further, $286,000,000 worth of equipment which is to be delivered this year, and it is figured, after a very serious and marked curtailment of plans for betterments and equipments for 1919, that, in addition to that, there will be the need of $491,000,000 worth of betterment, including equipment. I shall insert at this point a portion of the testimony of the Director General relative to equipment to be delivered in 1919:

For example, apart from this $286,000,000, which represents equipment which the Railroad Administration ordered last year and which is to be delivered this year, it is estimated that the other capital expenditures during 1919, including the equipment, will be $491,000,000. Now, of that amount $109,000,000 represents equipment which the corporations themselves ordered prior to January 1, 1918, but which could not be delivered during 1918, on account of the delay in obtaining deliveries, and that will come along and be delivered in 1919.

The CHAIRMAN. And that is exclusive of the $286,000,000 of equipment?

Mr. HINES. Yes. That could be definitely allocated, as I understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. The importance of my inquiry lies in this: That the extent to which you may have good or bad debts will depend upon where this capital investment goes.

Mr. HINES. Yes. We estimate, roughly, that of this $491,000,000 about $201,000,000 will be for equipment, and that includes the $109,000,000 which the corporations have already ordered. That equipment, generally speaking, will represent a good security, because it can be made the basis of exclusive security for the debt that is created to pay for it; the remaining $92,000,000 for equipment would be, broadly speaking, in the same condition, although there may be a substantial part of that that would represent the rehabilitation of existing equipment. For example, where wooden cars would be given steel underframes in order to strengthen them and prolong their life; in that case the car was already covered by an equipment trust or by a mortgage, and it would not be any better security after this additional expenditure was made on it; but, broadly speaking, the $201,000,000 for equipment would represent in itself a good and exclusive security to protect the loan.

The other $290,000,000 would represent capital expenditures spread over the different companies, and so far we have not a reliable allocation of that, because the final authorities have not yet been passed upon, but in acting on that matter we are governed by the principle that we will not make expenditures now, under peace conditions, on a railroad company which can not give us good security, unless they are of an imperative character and in the public interest, but that represents on those roads that can not give good security a relatively small amount.

I received a letter the other day, a copy of a letter sent to the Director General, from one of these railway supplies associations in which they very seriously criticized what they seemed to think was the niggardly policy of the Government as to betterments for 1919. There are many people who believe that we ought at this time to go into a very large betterment program, having in mind the general industrial conditions of this country. Certainly there is more warrant, in my judgment, for undertaking to make expenditures in regard to betterments for the railroads now because of a broad governmental policy of giving employment generally to the people of America than for undertaking to build a lot of highways in remote sections of the country. Now, I am not undertaking to go into the question of how far the Government ought to undertake to stimulate business by making appropriations. My own opinion is that that is a pretty dangerous road to travel. I am not in favor of the Government, just for the sake of giving employment, undertaking to do various things unless those things have to be done. I think it is a time of economy for the Government and of individuals. I know of no way that the Government will pay its debt any more than an individual will pay his except by earning more than he spends. The people of America will get rid of high prices, they will get rid of bonded debts, they will get rid of heavy taxation when they practice thrift as a people. You can not beat that into the heads of most men, and yet it is as old as the world itself. If we could borrow of France half her thrift, our governmental indebtedness would disappear so fast as to be a marvel of the age, but a lot of people think you can lift yourselves by your bootstraps, that by continuing to spend money you can reduce what the Government owes. My opinion is that the only justification for expending money for these betterments is not to give employment over the country but because the betterments are essential in order to operate the railroads, and that without the operation of the railroads you get stagnation and paralysis of the business of the country.

Now, that makes a total of outlay for 1919 of $809,840,000. It is estimated that of that amount the sum of $368,193,096 must be for the present financed by the Government, the difference of four hundred and forty-odd million dollars being looked upon as the extent to which the railroads can finance through private sources, and most of that must be met shortly during this year.

I will place in the RECORD at this point the financial statement for 1918 and 1919:

Requirement for 1919	368,193,096

Now, the gentleman from Texas, by his question of a few minutes ago, rather implied, I take it, that we might vote only $381,000,000, hand the railroads back, and say, "We are done with a bad job of which we have made a bad mess." Well, I wish it were that simple, because I am just as anxious as the gentleman to get rid of the railroads and I will go as far during the few remaining days of my legislative life as he will in that direction, but I do not believe that that is a possible thing now. I take it you can not turn the railroads back to their owners short of three or four months. It might be possible to do it by the 1st of July and most of these obligations will have to be met prior to that time.

I do not desire there shall be any more opposition against the return of the railroads than now exists. There are a whole lot of financial interests in America with investments that would be very glad to have the railroads never come back. To throw upon them immediately the burden of financing what they can not carry will be a very great argument against giving the railroads back, because they will say, "It is not possible to carry this load; it means absolute ruin." Now, another thing. We ought to press the railroads to do their financing through private interests, to make these betterments and to repay us as fast as possible. But do you believe you can serve notice on the railroads by failure to make this appropriation that they are expected to take care of the financing for 1919, when they have to go into a market at a time the Government is undertaking to float a liberty loan? That is the situation; that is what faces us, and that is the reason that the committee felt it was warranted in presenting the matter to the House with a favorable recommendation. Now, I may be all wrong in some of my conclusions. It may be that the railroads have a credit that I think they do not have and that they can immediately do the financing that would be involved if we did not make any part of this appropriation.

If gentlemen think that, I shall not quarrel with their judgment. I realize I am dealing with factors so huge, with matters about which I necessarily know so little, that my judgment is not to be taken as of any great weight. I was impressed, however, with the statement made by Mr. Hines and the statement made by the Secretary of the Treasury. Mr. Hines is one of the most intelligent witnesses that ever came before the Committee on Appropriations, and he showed a frankness and willingness to furnish us with information that was refreshing. If we did not get the information in these hearings that the Congress ought to have, it is because of the lack of grasp and knowledge of the great problem that the committee itself had and not because of any indisposition on the part of Mr. Hines and those associated with him to furnish that information. I shall incorporate at this point quotations from the testimony of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Director General upon this subject:

* * * * * * *

Secretary GLASS. Well, Mr. Chairman, there are two points of view as to the desirability of permitting the railroads to go in the open market right at this time to finance their necessities. One point of view is that the sooner we get back to the normal processes of effecting loans the better it will be for everybody concerned and for the Government. Ordinarily that would be the sound view; theoretically it is the sound view. But there are considerations which immediately relate themselves to the necessities of the Government, aside from the requirements of the railroads. While the railroads are doing their financing in the accustomed way, the operations of the Government may be badly disturbed. To begin with, there are a good many railroads that can not finance themselves under present conditions; those failing to finance themselves in the open market would go into the hands of receivers. That very fact would create a state of demoralization and of alarm that would reflect itself in the general business activities and would very seriously interfere with Government financing. It would be somewhat akin to the situation we frequently have in periods of depression when the mere failure of one or two large banking institutions precipitate a distressing situation throughout the country and affects communities and institutions that have no immediate connection with the business of the failed institutions.

Therefore, I say the failure of any number of these railroads to finance themselves—and that would be inevitable—would have an appreciably bad effect upon Government finances. It is true that to the extent the railroads are able to do their own financing through private sources, to that extent the Government would not be compelled to raise funds to help finance the railroads; but, as I have indicated, in the process of doing that they may cripple the Government's financial activities. Then, the question of the rate of interest at which the railroads may finance themselves enters into the question. If they have to pay a high rate of interest and commission, to that extent it demoralizes the market for the Government's financial activities and affects the rate at which the Government may finance itself; and while I appreciate that it is very desirable to get back into the normal ways of financing railroads, through private banking institutions, through private credits, it is not desirable to have the railroads at this particular time go into the open market for a loan aggregating nearly $1,000,000,000. We are making a point to discountenance a great many enterprises seeking private bank credits.

* * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. It has appeared, incidentally to other matters, that most of the money which you calculate the Government will have to pay out will need to be paid very shortly—$381,000,000 of it, representing the last calendar year's transactions, you need in order to fully meet the present program in connection with the payment of rentals?

Mr. HINES. Yes; and the settlements generally with the corporations for the calendar year 1918.

The CHAIRMAN. How rapidly do you expect to make those settlements?

Mr. HINES. My judgment is that within the next 60 days we will be confronted with demands from a large number of companies for settlements for the calendar year 1918. Under existing conditions I anticipate that contracts with the rest of the companies will be signed very rapidly, as all the details have been pretty well thrashed out, and as rapidly as these contracts are signed the companies with which the contracts are made will be seeking the earliest practicable settlement; so that my judgment is that not only a large number of the companies will be seeking settlements within the next 60 days, but that practically all the companies will be pressing for settlement within 90 days.

The CHAIRMAN. How do you pay these rentals—in quarterly payments?

Mr. HINES. The rentals are due quarterly according to the contract, but of course they do not become so due until the contract is signed; but under the contract they are due quarterly.

The CHAIRMAN. In point of fact, you have been making advances on account of rentals from time to time?

Mr. HINES. To a considerable extent; and that is all reflected in the figures which go to make up this net amount of $381,000,000 due for 1918.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, how rapidly will you have to meet payments for the betterments that you have undertaken, and which involve additional expenditures that you figure on making out of this appropriation?

Mr. HINES. As to the equipment, $286,000,000 for this year, that entire amount will probably be due and payable by the end of May, and it ought to be paid at the rate of about $50,000,000 per month. On account of the present shortage in our cash, we have been able to pay but about $25,000,000 in January, so that we are holding back bills that ought to be paid. The whole amount of $286,000,000 ought to be paid by the month of June. Aside from that, there is the Boston & Maine $20,000,000. I anticipate that that will be expected in order to close that reorganization within 30 days, or certainly within 60 days. The $12,000,000 for inland waterways, I believe, will all be due and payable by the 1st of May, as it is expected that all of those units of equipment are to be ready for use by spring. In addition to that we have the current program for additions and betterment work that would run on the average throughout the year at the rate of about $50,000,000 per month, although in the winter months it would probably be less than the average and in the summer months more. Of course, it is anticipated that to a considerable extent these expenditures will be taken care of out of surplus income and out of what the corporations can finance. Leaving aside that matter, I estimate that $700,000,000 for the items I have mentioned for settlement of 1918, for the equipment which the Government has ordered, the Boston & Maine reorganization and the inland waterways equipment will all have to be paid within the first six months of this calendar year, and a very large part of the total within the first four months of the calendar year.

I repeat, the committee believes this appropriation ought to be made; that by making it we will do much to stabilize the credits of the railroads in America; that we will enable them more surely and more certainly to finance to the extent of something under $500,000,000 that this program looks to, and at the end of the year and in the early part of next year to make such additional financing through private agencies as to enable them to pay back to the Government the money we have advanced.

Just one other word. One of the factors that makes necessary the doing of this is the failure of the Government to determine what it is going to do about the railroads. You are not going to get any stable credit in connection with railroads as long as nobody knows what on earth is going to happen to them. The Congress owes it to itself, it owes it to the Nation, to legislate definitely upon the railroad problem.

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. RAYBURN. I know it will be subject to a point of order, but what does the gentleman think of an amendment which I intend to offer, that says Government control shall terminate on January 1, 1920? I think, along with the gentleman, that one of the most important things that this Congress can do is, at the earliest moment possible, to set a definite time at which the railroads shall go back to private control, if they are going back. Then, with the legislation that is necessary to work to that point, they would be put on notice and everybody would be put on notice with reference to that matter.

Mr. SHERLEY. Of course, the gentleman will appreciate that the private view of an individual Member and his legislative view as a Member in charge of a bill may be two different things. So I am not prepared in any way to suggest that I will not undertake to protect this bill against any amendment that is contrary to the rules of the House.

And I desire to say another thing in this connection, and that is this: I think it is important to pass this bill. We have not many days left. I would not like to make the passage of the bill more difficult by making more easy those kinds of discussion that frequently do not result in celerity of action.

Mr. RAYBURN. One of the reasons why I made the statement that I did to the gentleman is this: I think that if the Government control runs for the 21 months after peace is formally proclaimed we probably by that time could save millions of dollars in railroad operation and control. I understand a Member of another body has a bill introduced to the effect that the railroads shall not be turned back until the expiration of 21 months, and has served notice that unless that is adopted there will be no legislation.

Mr. SHERLEY. Of course, I am not responsible for that gentleman's action or for what Congress does. But I say this to the gentleman, that in my judgment Congress is bound to meet in extra session some months ahead of the 1st of July. Other men may not share that view, but I have never doubted it for many, many, many weeks, and I think when it does meet it ought to be able to legislate on this matter by the early summer. And it ought to fix the time for turning over the railroads, and it would be fortunate if coincident with that time there was had that legislation which may be thought necessary in order to properly provide for successful private ownership and management with due regard to the rights of the shipping public.

Now, if the committee please, I apologize for having spoken as long as I have. If there is any particular matter about which individual Members desire to ask me, I will be glad to answer. If not, I shall yield the floor, hoping to have the privilege, if necessary, to make a very short rejoinder at the close of the debate. [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I ask for recognition, unless some member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce wishes to take the floor or unless the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], whom we always like to hear, wishes to take the floor.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing as a part of same an address of former Commissioner Prouty covering some of the subject which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] has so ably discussed to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD as indicated. Is there objection.

Mr. DYER. Reserving the right to object, has that already been published by the Government?

Mr. SIMS. Oh, no; not that I am aware of. It is an address delivered by former Commissioner Prouty in Atlanta, Ga., some time since. He has had charge in part of the railway administration of the Government, and the address is very illuminating. That which he gives are facts and not simply conclusions, and which relate in part to the New England railroads—the Boston & Maine and others.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to take much of that hour.

I listened with great interest to the presentation made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] of the proposed legislation. It was done more intelligently than I could cover the subject, and he has substantially covered all the ground upon which this appropriation is recommended. Of course, I might wander off in an hour, inasmuch as we are in general debate, and attempt to talk from the political standpoint, but I am not going to do it. I do not see that any good would come of it. I might throw a wedge into the machinery on the conduct of affairs from my standpoint. Somebody else might throw another one from another standpoint. But what good could come of it touching this matter in the closing days of the session? It is not so much what has been done, it is not so much the theory as to what ought to be done, but it is the condition that confronts us now touching this $750,000,000 recommended to be appropriated. It is not a theory.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. JUUL. I want to ask the gentleman if this $750,000,000 which we are asked to appropriate in this bill, in addition to the $500,000,000 already appropriated under section 6 of the original act, making a total of $1,250,000,000—if that is the Nation's cost for its first experiment in railroad management, or is there any more that we do not know about?

Mr. CANNON. I do not know of anything more up to this time. I am not a prophet nor the son of a prophet, but if railroad ownership is to be in the Government, conducted by the Government, it will not remain under the control of the Government by my vote. [Applause.]

Mr. JUUL. Would the gentleman kindly tell me and other gentlemen on the floor here how this $1,250,000,000 compares with the total expenses of the entire cost of the Government during the years that the gentleman was Speaker of this House?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, well, I think there has been no year since I have been a Member of the House of Representatives, except perhaps for a year when we were at war with Spain, where the appropriations for one year have ever amounted to $1,250,000,000. I recollect very well in the Fifty-first Congress, when Thomas B. Reed was Speaker of the House, one of the principal protests that was made against the Republican Party being continued in power was that the appropriations had mounted up to $500,000,000 for the first session, making a billion-dollar Congress when it expired. Speaker Reed replied to it in a single sentence and said, "This is a billion-dollar country." Since that time in normal times the appropriations of a Congress have amounted to over $2,000,000,000. I am not criticizing, and I am not going to be switched off from the consideration of this bill to a discussion of that subject. It is not worth while for me to discuss it. The hearings on this bill are not very extensive. I trust gentlemen have read them. If I were to stand here for an hour or two hours, and had the ability, I could not improve on the able presentation made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], and I am not going to try.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. DENISON. I would like to ask it in order to get a little information, so that I would know how to vote on the subject.

Mr. CANNON. Very well.

Mr. DENISON. I want to ask this question of my colleague: Is there anything in this appropriation which, if we vote for it and carry it out and make the appropriation, can afterwards be used in any way as a hammer or an argument in favor of our going ahead and continuing to operate the railroads?

Mr. CANNON. In favor of?

Mr. DENISON. The Government continuing the operation.

Mr. CANNON. I do not think there is anything in this bill that would constitute an argument in favor of Government ownership.

Mr. DENISON. Very well.

Mr. CANNON. On the contrary, I think the bill itself, connected with all that has been done, is a very strong argument against Government ownership. [Applause.]

Mr. DENISON. I have another question in mind, if my colleague will yield further.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. By voting for this appropriation we will not thereby be doing anything that will commit the Congress hereafter to Government ownership.

Mr. CANNON. That is, we will not be estopped from opposing Government ownership?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. In my judgment, no.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Unfortunately, I was not able to hear the argument of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], and I have not had a chance to read these hearings. Do I understand this $750,000,000 which the Government proposes to give to the railroads is supposed to represent the loss incurred by Government control?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no.

Mr. GORDON. I understood that in the gentleman's answer to the question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUUL].

Mr. CANNON. The $500,000,000 was appropriated before, you know, as a revolving fund, and this makes $750,000,000 in addition to that.

Mr. GORDON. It is not intended to make up any deficiency or loss from Government ownership, then?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, well, that is as a man may think. I will state again that in my judgment Government ownership will beget great trouble, and therefore I am against it.

Mr. GORDON. I understand that; but I thought the gentleman was using this as an argument against Government ownership. I am not committed to Government ownership of railroads myself, but I would like to know whether or not it is correct to say that the $750,000,000, or any part of it, is for the purpose of paying for any deficiency arising from the Government's operation of railroads?

Mr. CANNON. You may have your opinion about it and I have mine. But I wanted to say that I am not going into that question, and with a single sentence I will proceed to talk about this bill for a few minutes from another standpoint. I think there has been a large expenditure made under stress in hiring people to be good, an expenditure that was unnecessary, and that explains in large part this deficiency bill. But what is the use in talking about that now? I might talk all this afternoon with my limited knowledge about what has happened, and what has happened in connection with railroads, and what has happened in connection with shipbuilding, and happened in connection with strikes, and what has happened in connection with paying $10 to $14 a day of eight hours and time and half time for over eight hours in some of the Government activities. There is plenty of time to talk about that. One of my very sincere regrets is that the gentleman from Ohio is not to be in the next Congress to help us talk about these things when we post books a little later on. [Applause.]

I listened to the Director General, Mr. Hines, with great interest. I indorse what the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHEELEY] has said about him. He is fair and able. And I listened to our late colleague, the Secretary of the Treasury, a quiet, modest man, who rarely lifts his voice as loud as I do when I forget myself and yell. He is a pretty level-headed man. At times I have thought that if he had lived up in Illinois or Wisconsin, he with his industry and good judgment would have been a very valuable asset to the Republican Party. But he lived down in Virginia. He is still Carter Glass, and now Secretary of the Treasury, and, in my judgment, his selection to that great office was a very happy one. [Applause.] Now, he came before the committee. I am not going to read what he said, but he thought it was absolutely vital that a few of the railroads that might be able to do their own financing and pay their regular dividends and fixed charges should not go onto the market in competition with the United States Government. When the Government of the United States would be placing on the market a 4¼ or a 4½ per cent Government bond, or whatever the rate might be, under legislation that I trust we will enact before this Congress adjourns, he did not want to be placed in contact with the demoralization that would come if we failed to keep the pledge that we gave in the Army act which authorized the President to take over the railroads and that the Government should pay for the use of the railroads, which, I believe, is called a rental, the average dividend for the three prewar years.

Mr. WELLING. The standard return.

Mr. CANNON. The standard return. Of course, if they can not pay their fixed charges, there will be receiverships; and if the strong roads should go into the hands of receivers, what would become of the smaller roads? I hold no brief for the railroads, or for their stockholders, although the savings banks and the trust estates and the many people who own the bonds of the railroads in small quantities or in larger quantities, as the case may be, have had the purchasing power of their securities reduced one-half since this war began. Why, your salaries have been reduced one-half since the war began, I mean in a purchasing capacity. There would be hell to pay and no pitch hot if we should make our salaries $15,000 a year, and yet $15,000 will not buy as much as $7,500 would have bought when this war began. And so it runs.

Mr. JUUL. Will my colleague yield? I understand my colleague was a member of the subcommittee?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. I want to know from my colleague whether the condition shown by this bill is to continue to be the normal condition? We took over the railroads in January, 1918. We have been running them 12 or 13 months, and it is necessary to come to the aid of the railroads with $1,250,000,000. Is that correct?

Mr. CANNON. When that legislation was first enacted we came to their aid $500,000,000.

Mr. JUUL. Now, if the gentleman will permit me, will it be necessary in the future to come to the aid of the railroads to the tune of $100,000,000 a month in order to manage the roads? Is this just during the stress of war, or will this continue?

Mr. CANNON. Well, the mother church says that when you die and stop in purgatory they can get you out, but that when you get into hell there is no escape. [Laughter.] Now, I believe that this bill should pass, with any legislation necessary to be enacted before this Congress expires on the 4th of March next, and so far as I am concerned I feel that I will not take the time of the House longer to speak on the bill.

I yield to my friend from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] five minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I expect to vote for this bill, because we must not repudiate our obligations under the law taking over the railroads. But that does not signify what I would do or how I would vote on Government ownership of railroads. I am sure we are all interested in knowing the sentiment of our neighboring cities, and we will all be pleased to know the sentiment of the chamber of commerce of the city so ably represented here by the gentleman from Philadelphia [Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania]. I see he is not present in the room, and I do not know how this letter which I hold in my hand came to be sent to me. By special request, I am asked to present it to the House.

At the present time I would not vote for Government ownership of the railroads. My personal opinion has been that the Government ownership of railroads is not conducive to the best interests of the people of the United States. I think that under Government ownership we have had poorer service and higher rates, both freight and passenger, and I do not believe we would have had as poor service if the rates had been increased under private ownership as much as they have been increased under public control. Of course I am aware that there has been an emergency.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Do you think the increase of rates made the service worse?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; just what happened after rates were increased.

Mr. GORDON. Then we ought to put them down.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is what I am for. I think that helped to do it. Does not the gentleman think that the food in the dining cars has been poorer since the Government has been in control?

Mr. GORDON. The railroads were taken over because they had broken down and ceased to function.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Oh, no. More trains were functioning under private ownership than are now functioning under Federal control.

Mr. GORDON. That is a matter of history. It is only a year ago.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I would beg to differ with the gentleman in that respect.

Mr. GORDON. Now, if they stopped running under private ownership because their rates were not high enough——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Who said that?

Mr. GORDON. I understood you to say that just now.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Oh, no; do not misunderstand me. I said if we had increased the passenger and freight rates under private ownership as much as we have increased the rates under Federal control, there is no question in my mind that the skilled men who were trained and experienced in railroad affairs could have continued to manage those railroads and could have provided us with better service than we are receiving now. I will say further to the gentleman that the service by the railroads we have had under Federal control has not been such as to recommend Government ownership of railroads to the country.

Mr. GORDON. It has been worse than it was under private control, hasn't it?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think it has.

Mr. GORDON. Of course, and we have raised the rates.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Why, certainly.

Mr. GORDON. And the raise of rates, therefore, made the service bad.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is the way it has come out. We certainly raised the rates, and, as surely, we have not had better or as good service. Does anyone deny that? Now, Mr. Chairman, I voted to take over the railroads, as a war emergency, and I would have voted every dollar necessary. We voted the man power of our country, as well as all its resources, to whip Germany and to win this war. I did it willingly; but now that the emergency is over, unless a new emergency arises, I am for putting the roads back just as soon as we can, unless it can be proven to me that it is better to keep them under Federal control, and I do not think it can be. I am not so hidebound that I would not change my opinion if it was proven to me that Government ownership or Federal control was better than private ownership or private control.

The cost of the war has greatly increased our public debt. I would not vote now, and I do not think that we should purchase the railroads and increase our public debt by $20,000,000,000. The interest on which sum, at 5 per cent, would be another $1,000,000,000 annually. I say that the experience which we have gone through is not such as to recommend Government ownership of railroads. I ask that the letter be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

PHILADELPHIA CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Philadelphia, February 13, 1919.

Hon. J. M. C. SMITH,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I give you herewith copy of resolution adopted at the meeting of the executive committee of the Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce held on February 4:

"Whereas the Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce believes that the principle of Government ownership, control, or operation is not in accord with the principles of democracy; and

"Whereas during the war emergency the application of the theory of Government control was enforced for the general good; and

"Whereas the emergency created by the war having ceased with the signing of the armistice: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce records its strong disapproval of the continued exercise of Government control or operation of public utilities, and particularly the continued control of the mediums of wire communication in this country."

Will you please be good enough to present our views to the House of Representatives?

Trusting that we may have your cooperation,

Yours, truly, N. B. KELLY,
General Secretary.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, as a member of the Appropriations Committee I voted for a favorable report of this measure. I will likewise vote for its passage, and very briefly I wish to give some of the reasons that actuates me in doing so.

If this money is not appropriated it might result very disastrously, not only to the railroads of this country but to every business interest in the country. If this money is not appropriated it must of necessity prevent the Government from paying to the railroad owners what it has agreed to pay under the contract entered into with them, when the railroads were taken over. If the Government should fail to keep its contract and fail to pay what it owes the railroad owners, the railroads in turn must of necessity make default in paying their interest charge. That, to my mind, will be a very disastrous thing to occur. It might precipitate a panic in this country. Panics have been precipitated with far less cause in times past, and the conditions of the business world to-day are such that, in my opinion, every safeguard should be taken to prevent the possible occurrence of a panic. While I expect to vote for this measure for the reasons I have assigned, solely, I wish at this time to emphasize the thought that was suggested by the chairman [Mr. SHERLEY] of the necessity of this Congress at the earliest possible moment enacting some law whereby the future of these railroads is to be determined. And, in my opinion, that law should be enacted at the earliest possible moment which will turn these properties back to their original owners. [Applause.]

To my mind this bill of itself is a living monument to the utter fallacy and futility of Government ownership and Government operation. Some one has asked how much of the seven hundred and fifty millions, or the total of one thousand two hundred and fifty millions, which will have been appropriated if this bill is passed, means a deficit resulting from Government operation of the railroads. No one can ever know. It is absolutely impossible to figure out the intricacies of the manipulation of all the railroads, the hodgepodge into which they have been placed, but I think it is safe to say that $300,000,000 of this sum is lost to the Government of the United States, as compared to what would have been had the railroads been continued under the operation of men who were trained in the conduct of that service.

The reports in this case disclose the fact that the war had progressed about four months before the operation of the roads was actually taken over by the Government. While that is literally true, during that four months of time the Government, while not physically operating the roads, was directing their operation, and in accord with that direction the congestion that occurred throughout this country resulted not only in much loss of time, much loss of transportation, but much loss of money, which is directly attributable and traceable to the direction that came from the administration here in Washington.

There was congestion on the railroad tracks in Philadelphia, there was congestion on the tracks at Jersey City, on all the tracks adjacent to New York City, with all kinds of freight, perishable and otherwise, all bound for exportation from the docks in the city of New York, while the docks in Philadelphia, whose tracks were congested with goods bound for New York, were practically idle. The docks at Baltimore were idle, the docks at Galveston were idle, the docks in South Carolina were idle. So, if you please, a great amount of this loss which was attributable to the administration of these roads never would have occurred if it had been left to the men who knew how to control railroads. That is but a sample of the operation of Government control.

Mr. DECKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. DECKER. Has the gentleman given time to the thought that the reason why the Government, after it took control of the railroads, after we entered the war, diverted so much traffic and concentrated it through the port of New York. I refer to the danger of submarines and of taking that route from the standpoint of safety.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. There has never been any explanation given to me of that kind.

Mr. DECKER. There was before our committee.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do know that when the Philadelphia papers and the papers of the South began to point out that the docks in their respective cities were idle and that transportation there could be had more expeditiously, they began to divert it, and that was what relieved the congestion.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The Government sent transports to Newport News and transported men, and certainly live freight was as valuable as dead freight.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; exactly so.

Mr. DECKER. I would like to call attention to the fact that I think it hardly fair to say that that is what relieved the congestion. The evidence before our committee, when the subject was considered, was that the congestion was due to the lack of storage facilities in the terminals at New York, and that after we built the terminals it relieved the congestion and the traffic was greater than it was before.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. There was no attempt at storing these goods. They were left stored, if you please, in the freight cars. They were left stored on the sidetracks, thousands and thousands of them, when the sidetracks adjacent to these other places were idle.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. I think the gentleman has also overlooked the further fact in the control of the railroads by the Railroad Director of Mr. Garfield's order, which shut down the entire country for various days during that period. That ought not to be lost sight of.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is true.

Mr. CLEARY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I think the reason the stuff was all sent to New York—that is, too much of it—was because nearly all of these great lines run to New York, and there are so many steamship lines running out of New York. The expectation was that they would get better transportation, because there is where the ships nearly all left. I think that is the reason.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That may be true, but good management would have directed that they be diverted to these other places, and they were afterwards diverted, and the congestion was thus relieved.

There is another thing that I think points a moral in this business, and it is well to advert to it at this time. The railroads of the country for years have been appearing before the Interstate Commerce Commission trying to get a raise in freight rates. They were telling the authorities that it was impossible for them to conduct their railroads and keep up their overhead charges and pay the constantly increasing wages and pay the constantly increasing price of building material and live, and yet they were turned down repeatedly and were never given the raise that they asked. They said to the public that if the Interstate Commerce Commission would give them an additional 15 per cent freight rate they would run the business of the country and conduct the railroads without asking a single cent or raise in the passenger traffic or any other additional pay. That was denied them, but immediately when these railroads were taken over by the Government the freight rates were not only raised 15 per cent, but they were raised 25, 75, and as high as 125 per cent, and in addition to that the passenger rates were raised almost 100 per cent.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And they were given $500,000,000 besides.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. WOOD of Indina. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have a couple of minutes more, at least.

Mr. CANNON. I have apportioned all of my time, but I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I desire to cite the case of a reputable manufacturer of pig iron in my district who had to store $70,000 worth of iron ore at Toledo through the winter. He had been paying 10 cents a ton for the transfer of ore from the ship to the car and the storage. The Interstate Commerce Commission cut it to 8 cents, and now he pays 40 cents for the same service.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. These examples might be multiplied without limitation, all going to show that the practical operation of railroads under Government control demonstrates but one fact, as to which there can be no dispute, and that is that the Government's operation of railroads in this country, like its operation of anything else it undertakes, is a most expensive luxury. The Government can not operate anything within 25 to 50 per cent as efficiently both as to cost and conduct as a private individual can do it. If you wish additional illustrations of that, then I advise gentlemen to go about this town, where Government ownership is operating to-day in the construction of public buildings and otherwise. It would simply astound those who have not already seen it to discover not only the waste of time but the waste of money and the waste of energy. They are timeservers, from the boss to the lowest mechanic, and that same degree of indifference has already taken possession of those who are operating the railroads, from the section man up to the highest official. When the Government undertakes to operate anything it seems those in its employ think they are simply appointed to draw their salaries and do as little service as it is possible for them to do, and the sooner we get rid of the whole business the better for the country and all concerned. [Applause.]

By unanimous consent, Mr. WOOD of Indiana was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose at this time to discuss the much vexed question of Government ownership. I do wish, however, to say a few words with reference to the management of the railroads since they have come under Government control, regardless of the merits of that particular question. The management of Mr. McAdoo has been heralded as a great success and proclaimed as such in all of the Government's advertising periodicals, and, as gentlemen well know, they are very numerous. There are some of us who have our doubts about this matter, to put it mildly. Mr. McAdoo raised the rates from 25 to 200 per cent. He delayed freight to an extent that never would have been endured for a moment under private management. He took off trains and jammed passengers into cars as though they had been live stock and he wound up with a deficit of over $200,000,000. After having given this remarkable display of efficiency, Mr. McAdoo, as we all know, resigned his position, saying that the salary was too small. Possibly it was, as salaries go, taking into consideration all the Government positions which he held, and yet I am inclined to think we could have gotten this kind of a result even cheaper. [Laughter and applause.]

Let us for a few moments consider what this management has been and how it originated. Gentlemen have intimated that the Government ownership came about because the railroads ceased to function. I am inclined to think that there is a grain of truth in that remark. They ceased to function, however, largely because of the persistent interference by the Government, not merely in regard to rates, but in respect to the movements of freight.

Whenever a little petty Government agent could put a tag on a car so that it would be specially routed to whatever point he wanted it to go, the directions had to be followed to the exclusion of all other freight, and the result was that the cars were jammed into New York, regardless of whether there was any way of getting them out of there, until the tracks were in such condition that freight could not be expedited over the country at large. It was the same everywhere, and as a result, something had to be done, and something was done, as I have related. Was it any improvement upon private management? I shall not discuss that. I shall only say that we know what happened. The Government took over the railroads, and now we are paying the fiddler to the tune of over a billion of dollars, some of which we may get back, but much of which, I fear, we will never see again.

We know about these advances in rates, we know about the delays in freight, we know how trains were taken off, we know there is a deficit of $200,000,000, and now the gentleman from Kentucky comes and says—and I wish I had his optimism—that probably we will not lose anything the next year. Yet, the expenses in last December, and that is the latest month, I think, we have any account of, were $136,000,000 over what they were in December, 1917. We have to go back there to make a comparison.

Mr. DECKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I have only five minutes; if I could get more time I would yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DECKER. What does the gentleman estimate is the increase in the cost of material and labor in those respective months?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Well, the cost was very much larger, and I intended to make a more complete statement for the reason that some back wages were paid in the month of December, and that is one thing which made the increase very large. There was a large increase in the price of material and cost of labor, but what I wanted to call to the attention of the committee was that the gentleman from Kentucky seems to think that all matters were going to be better next year. On the contrary, we have every indication that they will be worse. Railroad traffic has been falling off right along. For that matter there never was a time when the railroads could be operated so profitably as they could during the war.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, I made no personal prophecy. I stated the testimony that in the next five and a half months there would probably be a falling off, and in the balance of the year, which is always a heavy freight-moving time, the traffic as great as they now contemplate it will be, that we would probably break even, but I personally made no prophecy touching the matter.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman certainly does not get any encouragement from the result in December, which he says is one of the heavy——

Mr. SHERLEY. No; but it is only fair to say this: That December was too close to the war conditions to bring about these economies in the reduction of operation, but in January they will show a great falling off in cost, and it is expected that February will show a further reduction in operating expense.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. There again my friend is much more sanguine than I am. I see no reason why the cost should fall off except in this way, that the freight traffic has fallen off and the passenger traffic is falling off, and probably will continue. Then, of course, there will be a lessening of expenses, but let us be fair——

Mr. SHERLEY rose.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I hope my friend will pardon me. If he can get me more time, I will gladly yield, but with the few minutes I have I can not. I want to state right here what I started to say before my time expires. The gentleman from Kentucky gives as a reason why we should appropriate this enormous sum, which totals over $1,000,000,000 for the two years that the railroads expended heretofore, something like $1,000,000,000 for maintenance of way and equipment each year. As I remember, he spoke of last year, 1918. Now, it is a fact that for 1916 and 1917 they expended each year about $1,000,000,000 for maintenance of way and equipment, a little over $1,000,000,000 for 1917 and a little less for 1916.

Mr. MANN. Maintenance or improvement?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Maintenance of way and equipment. I am not speaking now solely of permanent benefits. As a result, they showed for the years 1916 and 1917 as a net operating income, after all of those expenses have been taken out, except, of course, interest on debt and such matters as that, $971,707,800 for 1917 and something over $1,102,383,000 for 1916.

Mr. SHERLEY. I made no statement in connection with maintenance. I was speaking of capital investment.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Let me correct my friend, then, because his figures are altogether too large. There is no such amount of capital investment as he stated.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will turn to the hearings, I can show the tables of the Interstate Commerce Commission as to the annual amount for the past 10 years that has been made in the way of capital investment by the railroads of America.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I have the figures right before me, in my hand. It is impossible in 10 minutes to go into a discussion of these matters. What I want to come to when I really got beside the point was this: They now want $750,000,000 at this time in order to carry on the railroads in the condition they are in, and they state it is to be used in a large amount for equipment and permanent investment; $286,000,000 equipment which was bought in 1918 to be delivered in 1919, and other capital expenditures—$491,000,000—but in 1916 and 1917 the railroads paid for those things and paid their dividends besides. It is true that the amounts to be expended now are somewhat larger, but no very great amount larger, and I can not see the reason why such an enormous sum should be provided in this bill, and I do not believe that the Government will ever get a large portion of this money back.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Could the gentleman possibly let me have five minutes?

Mr. CANNON. My time is entirely exhausted.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I would ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois have whatever additional time he wishes.

Mr. CANNON. I do not desire any further time except time to yield to gentlemen.

Mr. SHERLEY. I suggest the gentleman from Illinois take an hour's additional time and then he can distribute it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I would like to have at least five minutes more.

Mr. SHERLEY. I would suggest the gentleman from Illinois be recognized for an additional hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Illinois be extended for one hour. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. I yield five minutes' additional to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman has referred to the net losses alone, not of operating expenses, of some $200,000,000. Can the gentleman state how that was effected, on the one hand, by additional revenues from increased cost and, on the other, by additional expense by reason of increased wages?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I have not those figures at hand, so I can give the exact amount.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The reason I asked the gentleman was that if he did not have that I would be glad if the gentleman from Kentucky would state it.

Mr. SHERLEY. The amount of increase as the result of wage was $583,552,000. The increase in receipts as the result of increase of rate was $560,504,530.

Mr. LONGWORTH. So that the two about balance each other?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; if that is what the gentleman was coming to.

Mr. LONGWORTH. So it can not be said that the increase in wages was responsible in any degree for the loss in the operation of the roads?

Mr. DECKER. That depends on whether you take into consideration that the increase in rates was for 6 months and wages for 12 months.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And you can not lay the loss in operation either to the wages, on one hand, or increased expenditures, on the other?

Mr. DECKER. It is not fair to compare increase of rates for 6 months with the increase of wages for 12 months.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I wish to show some of these figures, and I wish we had more details.

Consider the figures for equipment. Do the railroads want all this equipment? Was it ordered at the request of the railroads? No. A considerable portion of it was ordered over the protest of the railroads. They did not want it contracted for. That was notably the case in reference to locomotives, where an unsuitable kind was in many cases ordered, and also with freight cars for the Southern Pacific Railway, which the railway was building about 50 per cent cheaper than the Government administration was paying for them. The large railroads would have preferred in many cases to do their own buying and pay for the equipment themselves. But the Railroad Administration would not let them do it. That is the way you get these figures mounting up in this kind of style. It seems as though there has been a perfect craze to expend money here in Washington, and as soon as anybody gets down here he is bitten by that "bug" as to expending the money.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman think an investment in capital account for the two years at a rate averaging about $675,000,000 in view of the present costs is high?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Well, it is hard to say.

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, the gentleman needs to say if he is going to draw a conclusion.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I am drawing the conclusion that we ought to use our money in the best manner possible and not make expenditures that are not necessary.

Mr. SHERLEY. But the gentleman was leading the House to believe that there had been a perfect saturnalia of expenditures in regard to equipment. I submitted figures that showed for the 10 years previous the annual investment in regard to capital account was something over $560,000,000 annually, and for the two years 1918 and 1919 it will be $675,000,000. It was $566,000,000 annually for the 10 years previous. Now, compare $675,000,000 with $566,000,000, having in mind what a dollar will purchase, and I submit to him as a practical fact that the investment in capital outlay is less than the average of the 10 years before.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Well, I submit to the gentleman in turn that no conclusion whatever can be derived from his figures, because he does not take into consideration what the railroads themselves spent in making the total amount that is expended for capital purposes.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman is simply mistaken in his facts. The figures I gave him as to expenditures of last year and this year include everything that was expended in connection with the railroads in capital account.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does the gentleman tell me he has the figures complete for last year for capital expenditure? I would like to know where he got them.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not mean to say that I have them to the penny, but I mean to say that the testimony before the committee, and it was available to the gentleman, shows there was an expenditure last year in capital account of $573,000,000, in round numbers. That is what I mean to tell the gentleman. I have no objection to any conclusion, but I am trying to keep the House straight on the facts.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think the gentleman undoubtedly is making that endeavor, but I do not think he is succeeding very well.

Mr. SHERLEY. That may be.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is quoting, as I understand, from round figures given by somebody in the hearings.

Mr. SHERLEY. I submit that in the absence of better evidence we are warranted in taking the statements of Mr. Hines as to what the records show as to expenditure. If the gentleman means either to imply that Mr. Hines does not know or willfully misrepresented, all right. I found him well informed.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I doubt whether anybody was in position at the time the gentleman had his hearing to give those figures very accurately.

Mr. SHERLEY. As to the figures for the past 10 years, they are from the Interstate Commerce Commission, and he will find the statement in the RECORD for each year.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes. I have the estimate, but we do not get anywhere from that at all.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I have stated, the railroads spent in 1916 and 1917 for each year about $1,000,000 for maintenance of way, including structures, and for equipment. After making this expenditure they still had left as net operating revenue about $1,000,000,000 for each year. Now, we find that the Government is expending over half a billion each year (1918 and 1919) on the railroads and only a little more is being put into maintenance and equipment than before, so far as I can ascertain. I know of no place where the correct figures for 1918 can be obtained.

I do not care what the figures for capital expenses are, concerning which the gentleman from Kentucky has said so much. They are only estimates anyway, and for that reason are not included in any railway reports. The Interstate Commerce Commission, of course, can make a better estimate than I can, but it has nothing to do with the question before us, which is not whether too much was spent last year in keeping up the railroads, for no one claims that, although many claim it was not spent in the right way, but whether too much of the people's money has been spent for that purpose and whether too much is likely to be spent under this bill. I claim that this bill carries at least $200,000,000 too much, and if I had time would undertake to prove it; but as usual, when hundreds of millions are to be appropriated to be spent by this administration, the bill must be jammed through with no real opportunity for debate. We will try to amend it, but I assume the amendments will be voted down. Then we will have to take our choice between letting the railroads break down while in the hands of the Government or voting for the bill. As between the devil and the deep sea, I shall take to the sea and vote for the bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Iowa five minutes additional time.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman himself can yield to the gentleman from Iowa, as my additional time is taken up.

I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KREIDER].

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, it seems to me that the discussion on this bill has taken rather a wide scope, and I think statements have been made that can hardly be borne out by the facts.

In the first place, it has frequently been stated that the railroads prior to their being taken over by the Government practically ceased to function. That is not a correct or a true statement. The Government took over the railroads for good and sufficient reasons. The railroads, it is true, were not equipped as they should have been equipped. The railroads in times past had undoubtedly sinned, and they have had to suffer the consequences of their sins. The pendulum has been swinging back for some time, and unfortunately it seems to have swung back too far, especially in the years just preceding the war. The railroads found themselves between the upper and the nether millstones.

The truth of the matter is that legislation by the States and the Federal Government, executed through various agencies, has fixed the rates for both the passenger traffic and the carrying of freight, and in turn legislation was passed compelling the railroads to adopt certain equipment and appliances and passed full-crew laws in many States, fixed the hours and conditions under which the employees worked, and fixed the wages of the employees, and in so doing did not let a sufficient margin so the railroads could maintain their properties and equipment as they should.

We must remember that railroad freight and passenger traffic increases under normal conditions at the rate of about 8 per cent per annum. That is to say, extending over a period of eight years your freight and passenger traffic will increase about 50 per cent, and the railroad that has sufficient rolling stock on a certain date will find that it needs 50 per cent more eight years later. If it has sufficient terminal facilities, they should be increased by 50 per cent eight years later.

Now, the railroads, because of the poor earnings and bad showing, unfortunately found themselves in a position where they could neither borrow the money nor make it fast enough to keep up their equipment, and when the war came on they were taxed to their utmost capacity. Then, on top of this, priority orders were issued, many with conflicting authority, and they were compelled to handle the traffic to a great disadvantage and in a very unsatisfactory manner; in fact, in many cases more than doubling and tripling the work in the yards, which had already become congested, as well as at the terminals. In some cases more time and energy were devoted to shifting and making up the trains than would have been required to move the trains over the entire division of the road.

Now, when those conditions were imposed upon the railroads and the congestion at the ports began to pile up it was impossible for the railroads to handle the traffic, and the cars were utilized as storage warehouses instead of being used to move the freight. That was the condition. The Government stepped in and did what the private owners could not do. It refused freight. It compelled the loading of cars to their maximum capacity. In many commodities it refused less-than-carload lots and allowed the freight to accumulate until they had full carload lots from and to certain points; they used all the facilities of all the roads in routing, and so forth. Now, had that been permitted under private ownership of railroads the question, of course, remains, Would they have given better service? I am not going to say whether they would or would not. But, in my judgment, Congress ought to pass legislation in the near future providing for the turning back of the railroads to the private owners, but they should be kept under Government control and supervision. Freight rates and passenger rates should be fixed as heretofore by the Interstate Commerce Commission or some similar body, but this same body should also control the hours and conditions under which the men are employed and fix the wage of the employees.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. KREIDER. May I have two minutes more?

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. KREIDER. I was just about to say that in my judgment the railroads should be controlled by the Government through the Interstate Commerce Commission or some similar body, but the wages of the employees and the conditions under which the employees labor and the hours of labor should also be controlled by the same body; for, after all, the railroads must be operated for the benefit of the public and should render the best possible service at as low a rate as is consistent with the payment of satisfactory wages to employees and give a reasonable return on the investment. Of course, we must have the most economical management consistent with satisfactory service to the public.

We can not say to the railroads, "You have got to give us the service" and not let the railroads charge a sufficient amount for doing so; in other words, we have got to pay for what we get.

Again, for political reasons I should hate to see Government ownership and control of the railroads. I should hate to see the railroads of the country made a political football, the control of which should be fought for at each election. I should hate to see omnibus bills passed by Congress providing for the construction of railroad depots, bridges, and extensions, as is now done for the building of post offices and for the improvement of our rivers and harbors.

I am sure that if the people of the country will fully understand what Government ownership of railroads may bring to us they will not want it. I have not spoken of the financial end, because the facts and figures available are so incomplete and so many factors enter into the proposition relating not only to operation but upkeep of the property that conclusions reached differ so widely, ranging from a loss of three hundred millions to one billion two hundred and fifty millions of dollars for the first year's experiment. Perhaps about midway between the extremes will be found the correct amount, namely, about $750,000,000 to $800,000,000 loss I believe, from information available and in the light of past experience, that the people want and will approve Government control and private ownership. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CURRIE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the matter that we are all anxious to learn about to-day, as nearly as possible, is just what the Government control and operation of railroads is costing the country.

It has been pointed out by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and it also appears in the report of the hearings before his committee in the testimony of Mr. Hines, that while the Government was obliged to bear the burden of increased operating expenses of the railroad systems for the entire year of 1918, yet it received the benefit from the increased freight and passenger rates for approximately only one-half of that year. It occurs to me that these distinguished gentlemen are somewhat in error. It is true that the order of the Director General of Railroads increasing the freight rates by 25 per cent became effective June 25, 1918, and the increase in the passenger rates by order of the Director General became effective June 10, 1918. The fact remains, however, that the railroad systems of this country had been operating under war conditions for some three or four years; and, appreciating this fact, they had applied not only to the Interstate Commerce Commission for the right to increase interstate rates but had applied to the respective State railroad commissions for permission to increase their intrastate rates. The Interstate Commerce Commission did, on the 12th day of March, 1918, grant an increase of 15 per cent upon so-called commodity rates, and the Interstate Commerce Commission had theretofore, on the 27th day of June, 1917, issued an order, effective August 1, 1917, increasing what is known as the classification rates by 15 per cent. So that instead of the Director General or the Railroad Administration of the United States having the benefit of only a 25 per cent increase for approximately one-half of the year 1918, they actually had that 25 per cent increase on top of a 15 per cent increase, which makes a total, at least for the last half of 1918, not of 25 per cent but of approximately 44 per cent increase over the original rate.

In addition to that—I know it was true in the State of Michigan—prior to the increase of 25 per cent ordered by the Director General of Railroads vast increases had been granted by the State railroad commission so far as the intrastate rates were concerned. My attention has been directed to an instance of this in the district which it is my honor to represent. A lumber company had a rate of $2.50 per thousand on logs. In April, 1918, the railroad company increased that rate to $3.75 per thousand. Then came the order from the Director General of Railroads, and which automatically applied, further increasing the rate by 94 cents per thousand, making a total increase of over 82 per cent.

I dare say that similar conditions prevailed throughout the various other States of the Union. So it is not fair to the people of this country for us to refer to this 25 per cent increase alone when we are judging as to what it has cost this country to permit the railroad systems to be operated by the Director General of Railroads. In addition to the $200,000,000 which the Director General of Railroads admits has been a net loss to the Government by reason of its operation of the railroads, there must be added what it has cost the customers of these railroads in increased freight rates and in increased passenger rates, which will approximate $800,000,000, or make a grand total cost for one year approximating a round billion of dollars. In the original act we appropriated $500,000,000. This bill proposes an additional appropriation of $750,000,000 more. How much will be recovered by the Government eventually no one can tell,

I believe that the President of the United States should reconvene Congress at an early date, so that not only those upon the Republican side but those upon the Democratic side as well who do not want this expensive proposition to be continued longer than necessary may unite and pass the necessary legislation to return the railroads of this country to their owners under proper safeguards, in order that they may be operated in an economical way. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I listened with a great deal of interest to the very able statement of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], and I agree with him that we must vote this large sum of money for the railroads, most of which will be returned to the Government after we have restored these properties to their owners. It seems to me, however, that it is well to say again, as I have said before, that it was a mistake for the Government to take over the railroads even as a war measure. It did not have to be done. There was an unparalleled situation due to the extraordinarily cold winter, with everything frozen up, with coal cars unable to be unloaded because the coal was frozen into a solid mass, and with the sidings near New York tied up with freight cars, which the Government was not unloading and shipping the contents across the ocean, as it had agreed to do and should have done. The railroads had been starved by the Interstate Commerce Commission, which for years had not allowed them the rates that they were entitled to. Rates had been reduced and reduced, and when expenses increased, instead of giving the railroads the increased rates to which they were entitled and which they had to have in order to meet the increased expenses of wages and cost of equipment, the Interstate Commerce Commission refused to give the increases necessary, and when they did allow something took so long to do it, extending their inquiries over a year or two, that the increases were of very little benefit. If they had been given promptly, they might have averted a great deal of trouble.

The Federal Government took over the railroads largely because Congress did not have the courage to do what most of us, probably the majority of us, in our hearts thought ought to be done, which was to suspend the operations of the antitrust laws and allow the railroads to do themselves what the President has since been doing with them. We had to have somebody break the laws of the country or else suspend the operations of those laws, which were hampering the railroads in time of war. Instead of suspending the operation of those laws or repealing such of them as should have been repealed, and will have to be repealed or modified later on, we decided that the easiest way was to hand them over to the President and let him break the laws, which is what he has been doing. If we had allowed the railroads to pool their earnings and pool their freight and operate as they wanted to, routing their freight over short lines, and so forth, and had given them only part of the increases of rates which have been given under Government operation, a great deal of this difficulty could have been avoided; and if the Interstate Commerce Commission had treated the railroads fairly, we would not have been confronted by this situation to-day. We are confronted by a situation, however, and not by a theory, and therefore I see nothing to do except to vote this large sum of money for the Railroad Administration, in order that the railroads may be put in some kind of a sound condition before we give them back; and I hope we shall give them back to their owners as soon as matters can be so straightened out that it can be done safely.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman was speaking of the difficulties which caused the railroads to break down, as has been said. Was not one of the great difficulties the fact that the Government interfered in the matter of priority, indicating what freight should be taken over the railroads first, and in that way causing a great deal of unnecessary expense and trouble in making the necessary shifting and switching of trains? At any rate, it was very expensive, whether it was necessary or not.

Mr. PLATT. I think that is absolutely true, and a good many contributory details like that might be mentioned. Priorities were given very recklessly at first, and they made it necessary to tear trains apart to take cars out and put them in other trains so as to go on sooner, which threw the whole operation of railroads into confusion.

That, combined with the cold weather and the tremendous amount of snow and the failure of the Government to unload and ship promptly war material consigned to it, caused the trouble. The abuse of priorities had a great deal to do with the confusion into which the railroads were thrown before the Government took them over.

Mr. RAYBURN. Does not the gentleman think that the priorities were absolutely necessary?

Mr. PLATT. Not as they were granted at that time.

Mr. RAYBURN. It became necessary to pass the priority shipment bill, which we did pass.

Mr. PLATT. We had to give priorities, but Army and other officials were giving priorities recklessly for things that were piling up in New York, that the Government could not at once use. There was no coordination about the matter.

Mr. TILSON. Was it not the abuse of priorities that caused the trouble?

Mr. PLATT. The abuse of priorities before the War Department was overhauled and before there was even an attempt at coordination had a great deal to do with it. The Fuel Administration, I may add, was also somewhat to blame for the tangle, and there were other factors which time will not permit me to mention.

Mr. CANNON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have expressed in another place and at another time my position on Government ownership and the operation of the railroads, and I do not intend to repeat it here. I think all will agree that what the public wants is service efficiently and economically rendered. I believe also that everybody will agree that we are now paying a higher rate of service, both for passenger and freight, than we have ever paid since the railroads were properly organized. All will agree that we see the largest traffic, both in passenger and freight, that we have ever had. All will agree that we have the largest gross income that the railroad system has ever had, and yet we have such a lack of economy and such a lack of efficiency that we are running a deficit that must be made up, due to conditions that everyone here recognizes, and that at the same time we have less efficient service rendered to the public than we ever had before.

Whether that is absolutely inevitable or not, it is perhaps fair to say it is in time of war. I admit that. But I think we have seen enough of Government operation so that none of us is inclined to favor it as either an economic proposition or as an efficient proposition. Enough on that particular point.

One of the things that I think is very serious was referred to by my colleague from Michigan awhile ago, and that is the possibility of political influence in the railway system. With probably 2,000,000 employees closely organized they can pretty nearly speak as one person, and consequently have reached the point where certain people think the railways are run in the interest of those who serve them as employees. That is the Soviet system; that is precisely what Russia now is building upon. I think it is seriously out of order. I do not mean that all of the employees of the railways take that position, but I mean that some of the leaders of the employees seem to think that the major thing in running the roads is the payment of wages. On the other hand, we can see the owners of the roads operating on the basis that the major thing is more profit. We have reached the point where we must recognize that the major thing is the public and service to the public. It is not run for profit only, nor is it run for wages alone; there must be a cooperation between profit sharing and wage earning in the interest of the public service, and, as far as Congress is concerned, we must look at the third party, to the service of the public, rather than to either one of the others specifically.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman says he is opposed to the Government ownership of railroads. In what degree will the present bill encourage public ownership? I intended to ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] that question, but I was not here when he closed. I want to know whether the passage of this bill will tend to increase the demand for Government ownership. I direct the gentleman's attention to this point. We have already let them have $500,000,000. We are going to let them have $750,000,000 more. In my judgment not one dollar of that will the Treasury ever see again. What are the people going to say when they have $1,250,000,000 invested in railroads—nearly one-fifteenth of their value—when the time comes to turn them back?

Mr. FESS. I will agree to the inference my friend is drawing without making the positive statement—that as we invest public money in industries the public might say that we want to be guaranteed the return of that in some form. But my friend will not ask me to vote against this particular measure, which seems to be absolutely necessary, simply because it is going to give additional argument on the part of the public, because I want to say to my friend that we have got to have courage enough in this House to resent this tendency that is growing up in the development of public opinion.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FESS. Can I have five minutes more?

Mr. CANNON. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. FESS. I am grateful to my friend.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. SHERLEY. What does the gentleman say about the probability of increasing the demand for Government ownership as the result of prolongation of Government control now, and in that connection what does he say as to making it more difficult to turn the roads back, if we throw upon them now a heavier burden of financing than they can possibly carry?

Mr. FESS. I sympathize with the position of my friend from Kentucky. I do not know whether I catch fully his inference or not. I am not in favor of making an indefinite extension of Government control.

Mr. SHERLEY. The point is this: If you do not at this time help as this bill provides, but force the railroads to do their own financing to such a huge extent, do you not create a condition in which they can justly say we can not take the roads back?

Mr. FESS. That condition is already reached, I will say, when it was suggested that we would have to turn the roads back soon unless we got remedial legislation. I have been disturbed about that, because we simply can not turn the roads back to the owners and have them operate upon a profit basis with the limitations in respect to them that we have now on the statute books. I agree with my friend the chairman of the committee that because we vote an additional sum it might give an argument in favor of continued Government ownership, yet that is no reason why we should refuse this when it seems absolutely necessary to do it, and I am going to join with him in voting this additional amount.

The thing that disturbs my mind is the possibility of political influence in the railway organization. That absolutely bewilders me. It staggers me when I think that here are 2,000,000 men, voters, who, affiliated with their families, make 5,000,000 people, and if you affiliate those families with the various affiliated industries of the railroads you have 20,000,000, or one-fifth of the population of our country. I think an alarming situation confronts us if we come to vote openly for a policy that will give voice politically to any such tremendous voting power, which would operate upon the basis simply to the interest of the individual voter. That is a thing that I have been afraid of, and from everywhere are coming to us petitions from railway employees asking us to continue Government operation. This Congress has got to be courageous enough to speak out and say whether because there is a great group of voters, because they ask for it, we are going to give it, when there is no other reason as far as I can see for doing so than that they would rather be the employees of the Government than the employees of the owners of the railroads.

There is another thing that I think attention should be directed to. While we are afraid of political influence, yet is there any Member here who will say that in a town largely made up of employees of railroads those men can not be active politically because of their affiliation with the railroads? There is a town near me, a junction point, though not in my district, where the major portion of the population is made up of railroad employees. If you are going to say that none of them can have anything to do in the holding of office or in participation on committees with political organizations, in a way you are going to disfranchise the major portion of the whole town, and it seems to me that is unwise. Let me read a letter to Mr. Pugh, of Toledo, Ohio, who is a member of the Ohio State Legislature:

[United States Railroad Administration. Walker D. Hines, Director General of Railroads. Toledo Terminal Railroad. A. B. Newell, general manager. Terminal Station, Toledo, Ohio.]

FEBRUARY 3, 1919.

Mr. R. B. PUGH,
1721 Lagrange Street, Toledo, Ohio.

DEAR SIR: I understand that you asked for leave of absence on January 6 for a few days and that since then you have not reported for work, but during this period you have attended to your duties as a member of the Ohio State Legislature at Columbus.

Article 8 of General Order 48 reads as follows:

"In all cases where railroad officers, attorneys, and employees were nominated for political offices and had become candidates therefor prior to the issuance of General Order 42, August 31, 1918, they will be permitted to hold and complete the terms of office to which they may be elected at the general election to be held November, 1918, to the extent that the holding of such offices shall not interfere with the performance of their railroad duties. After the completion of such terms of office they shall be governed by the provisions of this order."

Inasmuch as your attention to legislative duties has interfered with your railroad work, your connection with the Toledo Terminal has automatically ceased.

Yours, very truly,

(Signed) A. E. NEWELL.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I believe that order has been set aside by the Railroad Administration.

Mr. FESS. The letter was dated February 3, 1919, and is from Walker D. Hines or his representative.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I understand that the order has been set aside.

Mr. FESS. It ought to be set aside.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. FESS. That is what I wanted to call to your attention. There is danger both ways—danger in allowing political participation and danger in the un-American attitude that because a man is doing this he can not be politically active. The thing to do is to take the railroads out of the hands of the Government. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, if I knew any way that I could find it possible to vote against this bill, I should do so on general principles. I am so opposed in principle to anything smacking of Government ownership of our public utilities that I am inclined on first impression to be against the bill; but I can not see any reason why I should vote against it, in view of the particular situation that confronts us at this time.

In the military appropriation act of August 29, 1916, we said that the President in time of war is empowered to take over these railroads. Following that, on March 21, 1918, we passed an act for the payment of compensation to the owners, and provided in section 14 as follows:

That the Federal control of railroads and transportation systems herein and heretofore provided for shall continue for and during the period of the war, and for a reasonable time thereafter.

And we then proceeded and said that the time should not exceed 21 months after the time the President proclaimed peace. No action has been taken by this body, nor has there been any measure proposed, that would terminate that control of railroads sooner than the time fixed in this act, and therefore at this time we have control of these public utilities, and like the man who had a bear by the tail, we do not know how to let go. That is the way I feel about the thing. Here we have incurred these large expenditures we have entered into these contracts for this equipment that shall be used on these railroads, and unless we repudiate those contracts, unless we repudiate the pledges we have made by our legislation, we must have some appropriation measure of this kind. I hope that the time will speedily come when we can put an end to this management and conduct of railroads by the Government. I have no use for it. It has been inefficient, it has been costly, and it will be more costly as time goes on. I do not believe the Government can run these railroads as efficiently and economically as they can be run by private ownership.

It has been extremely interesting to look over the hearings on this bill and to get some kind of idea of what animated the President of the United States and those who had charge of the executive departments of the Government when they took control of the railroads. When we passed the act authorizing the President to take over the railroads we said to him, "If you find it necessary, Mr. President, to do this to carry on this war, do so." I did not believe then, nor do I believe now, that it was the intention of Congress that we were then authorizing the President or the executive officers of this Government to embark upon a great program of governmental control. The President said he might need this power, and we trusted him with the execution of the power, trusting that he would not misuse it or use it unnecessarily. But they took over the whole railroad system, and the principal reasons are given in these hearings by Mr. Hines. They are three in number, and I wish to refer to them. I want to call your attention briefly to the hearings. I have no doubt that many of you have read this, though some of you may not have. The first reason I find is the reason given by Mr. Hines on page 6 of the hearings, where we find him saying:

At the end of December, 1917, the extent of congestion was extraordinary. That was due to a considerable extent to the fact that in handling war material all sorts of priorities had been established by different departments of the Government, and this car had to be moved in priority to that car, and all sorts of Government stuff had to be moved in priority to private shipments.

But Mr. Hines says that the congestion was due to the overlapping activities of a lot of boards here that did not know what they were doing and were not coordinated, which so confused the railroad situation that the Government had to take them over to relieve that condition. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] spoke about that. Mr. Hines says, in substance, that one of the controlling, moving reasons that the Government took over these railroads was inefficiency in some place, stupidity at some other place, overlapping activities of a lot of boards that, as I said, did not know what they were about most of the time. The second reason that Mr. Hines gives is on page 18 of the hearings. In this Mr. Hines is speaking about the matter of compensation of the roads, and he says this:

The interest rates were very high; the companies were claiming that their rates were not sufficient to give them the necessary credit, even in normal times—they had appealed to the commission for increased rates, and the commission had suggested that instead of allowing those rates the situation seemed so complicated that the Government had better take the railroads over.

This reason, under which the President is supposed to have acted, is, in substance, that because the railroad companies had not been granted increased rates their credit was gone and they could not finance themselves. What was the remedy? Let the Government take over the railroads and then raise the rates. In other words, it would not be right for the companies to raise the rates, but would be entirely proper for the Government to do so. This was not a good reason for taking over the railroads; it was merely an excuse.

The third reason, as given by Mr. Hines, is found in his testimony on page 19 of the hearings:

The Government itself was in the market for large amounts of money, and it was distinctly against the Government's policy for private enterprises to go out and bid up the interest rate in order to get money. So that was how it came about that the Railroad Administration started in financing a large part of these additions and betterments. It was a part of the general plan and to aid the general financial scheme of the Government.

It appears, therefore, that the administration thought it necessary to invest $1,250,000,000 in the railroads to protect the market for the liberty bonds. The Railroad Administration has financed the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co. at an expense of $51,400,000 and the Boston & Maine Railroad Co. at a cost of $20,000,000, and has loaned other roads perhaps $100,000,000 outright. If the Government had taken the bonds of these two railroad companies and had loaned to the other companies the moneys they needed from time to time and taken their securities therefor, it would have been much cheaper and better than to have embarked on this costly and ill-advised experiment. If these are the reasons for taking over the railroads, then they ought never to have been taken from their private ownership.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CLEARY].

Mr. CLEARY. Mr. Chairman, of course I am for this bill. I think it is generally understood why the Government had to take over the railroads. In and around New York, for instance, there is the Lackawanna & Western, the Ontario & Western, the Susquehanna & Western, the Erie, the Lehigh Valley, the Philadelphia & Reading, the Pennsylvania, and all these other roads entering New Jersey right along in a line; all have their terminals, and they are all selfish. I had business with a lot of them. A little part of the haul will not do, they want all the receipts, and so it became necessary for the Government to utilize all of these terminals. The Pennsylvania had to be diverted into the Reading and the Lehigh Valley, and so forth, wherever the docks were, naturally, because you can secure docks in that way, and of course all the other roads run their trains on the docks. It was absolutely necessary for the country to take over those roads to their maximum capacity when there was a congestion of freight. There is no gentleman in the House who is more opposed to continued Government ownership of railroads than I am. I have been in the transportation business for a good many years, and I know something about it. There is just one item particularly that brought me to my feet in this connection. The railroad management has gone on largely in the building of barges and boats. It never has been necessary. There was a time during the severe winter last year that some boats were blocked by ice in and around New York, and they were not able to get them just when they wanted them. They had a lot blocked. So they went into the business of building boats to operate on the Erie Canal, or rather not operating them. I talked with Mr. McAdoo here, some gentlemen here were present, and they told me they were running some of them light. Now, it is absolutely impossible to run a canal boat light and make it profitable. You never can do it by running them that way. I think it is absurd, and I think one of the things that can be done to economize is for the Government to drop all water connections. They do not want to take over and operate any canals or waterways; they do not want to build any boats, and there is no necessity for them. They can not operate them with economy; they can not build barges economically; they do not know how to manage it, so the quicker the better the Government drop all connection with canals and waterways. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, with the permission of the committee I would like to make some inquiry as to what additional debate is desired touching the matter which is under consideration. If it meets with the approval of the committee I would suggest that by 5 o'clock we start the reading of the bill and then if possible pass it, and if the gentleman will indicate his desire about the matter we perhaps can arrange it.

Mr. CANNON. I have requests for 10 minutes more time. I think that is all the requests I have.

Mr. BLACK. If the gentleman from Kentucky will yield, I would like to have 15 minutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the committee is willing, while we can not strictly, under the rules, limit general debate without the committee rising, yet if it is the understanding of the committee I might ask recognition for an hour, and then I will be glad to divide up the time among the gentlemen who desire additional time.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Why not divide the time?

Mr. SHERLEY. There is no attempt to use it on any one side. Let the gentleman from Illinois be recognized for half an hour and myself for half an hour and it be understood that at the end of that time we will go to the reading of the bill.

Mr. MANN. How much time is asked for of my colleague?

Mr. CANNON. I have requests for 25 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that he be recognized for 30 minutes and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] for 30 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I thought the gentleman desired to make his request that general debate shall be limited.

Mr. SHERLEY. The trouble is, I do not think the Committee of the Whole can do it.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; by unanimous consent they can.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. May I inquire of the gentleman from Kentucky as to the probable time he expects to get a vote on the bill?

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, I assume, at the conclusion of general debate, we would probably go to a vote right away. The bill is but one paragraph, but there may be some five-minute debate.

Mr. MANN. There may be some amendments offered.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I wanted to procure 20 or 30 minutes, not exactly on the subject of the bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, I hope the gentleman will not ask for time unless it pertains to the bill. I have asked a number of gentlemen to refrain unless the discussion was in regard to the bill. It is very desirable that we should finish this bill this evening.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I am entirely willing to defer the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to one hour, the gentleman from Kentucky to control 30 minutes and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] 30 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN].

Mr. McFADDEN. As I understand this bill, it provides $750,000,000 additional to apply to the revolving fund of the Railroad Administration of $500,000,000, and in view of this I think some explanation is due Congress.

There are one or two questions I want to propound to some one on this committee, if they can answer them. If not, I want some one from the Railroad Administration to answer the questions.

The other day I put in a resolution, which is now resting before the Rules Committee, asking for an investigation of some things pertaining to the finances and purchases of the Railroad Administration. Up to this time the Rules Committee has taken no action. I want to get this matter in the RECORD, and I would like some explanation from some one as to this situation.

The following news item appeared in the Federal Trade Information Service of January 3, 1919:

GEORGIA & FLORIDA RAILROAD RENTAL.

The Railroad Administration yesterday signed a contract with the Georgia & Florida Railroad whereby an annual rental of $88,000 will be paid the road. The road is in the hands of W. P. Sullivan, L. M. Williams, and John F. Lewis, receivers. For the test period the road's annual deficit averaged $562. A contract also was signed with the Augusta Southern, a subsidiary of the above, for a rental of $28,000.

It would be interesting to know why the Georgia & Florida receives such favorable consideration and whether it presages similar treatment of other special compensation cases. John Skelton Williams was at one time president of this road and chairman of the board.

Now, in some of the charges which I made the other day on that bill I asked for an investigation of the relations existing between the Comptroller of the Currency as director of the finances and purchases of the Railroad Administration. The Rules Committee has failed to act, and I hope there is some one here in the House that can give me light on this subject.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. McFADDEN. I will.

Mr. MONTAGUE. In respect to the reference to Mr. Williams. The gentleman has made charges against the Comptroller of the Currency, Mr. Williams, and I am authorized by him to say that he courts the fullest investigation of all the charges made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. He would welcome them.

Mr. McFADDEN. I am glad to hear that. But that is not an answer to the question that I am asking.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not reply to that. It is obvious that the gentleman is concerning himself about Mr. Williams more than he is concerned about the rental of the railroads, and that is the reason I made the answer I did.

Mr. DECKER. How much does the gentleman say the railroads paid in rentals.

Mr. McFADDEN. Eighty-eight thousand dollars in the case of the Georgia & Florida Railroad, and $28,000 in the case of the Augusta Southern, a subsidiary of the former, and I am quoting from an article that appeared in the Federal Trade Information Service.

Mr. DECKER. Eighty-eight thousand dollars a year?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. DECKER. How long a road is it?

Mr. McFADDEN. I can not tell you as to that. I have before me here, however——

Mr. DECKER. What is your objection to its being paid a rental?

Mr. McFADDEN. The test period on which compensation is based shows a deficit of $562 annually.

Mr. DECKER. In giving the information you seek I can best do it by asking you a question. Suppose you owned a railroad on which you have spent a million dollars, and suppose that that railroad had not reached the point where it would make a profit on the investment, do you think that I or anybody else would have the right to take your railroad and use it for a year and not pay you anything for it, simply because it was not paying a profit?

Mr. McFADDEN. If it was a railroad in which myself or my family was interested and I had charge of the financial part of the Railroad Administration, I should think it ought to be investigated.

Mr. DECKER. Do you think that Mr. Williams has anything to do with the settling of the contracts between the railroads and the Governments?

Mr. McFADDEN. I did not say that.

Mr. DECKER. I say he has not, and it is an unjustifiable insinuation. I never saw him in my life, and I am a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and helped to write the bill under which this is settled. I do not know him, but I do say it is an unjust insinuation. Mr. McAdoo and the President of the United States are responsible for those contracts, and if you can not give further facts than that I wish to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that his insinuation is unjustified and uncalled for, because that rule we fought in our committee——

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri is taking up the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DECKER. Well, he wants information and I have given it to him.

Mr. McFADDEN. I think not and I refuse to yield further.

I have here before me a hearing before the subcommittee of the House Committee on Appropriations covering the deficiency appropriations for the fiscal year 1919, Sixty-fifth Congress, third session, and I am reading from page 39. It says:

The CHAIRMAN. You were permitted under the law, certain facts appearing, to grant compensation in excess of the maximum that might be stated by the Interstate Commerce Commission to be the return earned on the three-year prewar basis. That was section 6 of the act, was it not?

Mr. HINES. It was paragraph 6 of section 1.

The CHAIRMAN. In point of fact, have you made any such contracts?

Mr. HINES. As a matter of fact we have not yet executed any contracts which include any allowance for compensation in addition to the standard return, with one exception so far, and that is the Missouri & North Arkansas Railroad, where the compensation which we fixed was $161,230 per year, in excess of the standard return.

The CHAIRMAN. To what extent?

Mr. HINES. That was the excess, $161,230.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you recall what the total amount of the standard return was?

Mr. EDDY. About $13,770. The standard return was the difference between $161,230 and $175,000; the total compensation paid was $175,000.

I think that shows that there is some misunderstanding in regard to this matter, and I hope some Member of the House or some one connected with the Railroad Administration will answer this inquiry.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, he will find there a list of the claims that have been made for extra compensation under paragraph 6 of section 1, and he will find the number that have been rejected and the number that have been allowed and the number that are pending. The gentleman, of course, will realize that it was an impossibility for the committee to undertake to go into the question as to each of these various roads and the compensation that was allowed or should be allowed to them. We could not have done that under weeks of discussion.

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes; I understand.

Mr. SHERLEY. And I knew nothing of any need for an inquiry as to the special road of which the gentleman speaks.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman answer this question, as to who passes on these advances to railroads finally? Does the director of finance do that?

Mr. SHERLEY. There is a committee, as the hearing discloses, that has up with the railroads the question of additional compensation, and then I take it that the matter has to be finally approved by the Director General of the Railroads. He is unquestionably responsible for any contracts that are made as to compensation over and above the standard returns.

Mr. McFADDEN. Does the director of finance have anything to do with that?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not know. I can not advise the gentleman. I do not recall whether there was any testimony in that regard or not.

Mr. McFADDEN. I think it is reasonable to suppose that the director of finance of the Railroad Administration passes on these matters and that his report is probably finally accepted by the Director General of Railroads. If I am wrong in that impression, I would be very glad to be corrected.

A MEMBER. Who is the financial director?

Mr. McFADDEN. The financial director is John Skelton Williams. The Director General of Railroads is Walker D. Hines.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman speaking upon the railroad bill, H. R. 16020, and discussing the question of Government ownership, the economical management of railroads, and such other questions, reminds me very much of the man who was very ill, and the doctor asked him how often he would like for him to come. He told the doctor to come just as often as he chose, and to spare no expense, just so he got him well. When he recovered and received the doctor's bill he felt quite differently and was very critical as to the charges.

Last year, when the Government was operating the railroads during war times, we did not discuss the question of Government ownership, economical management, and parsimony, but it was merely a question of win the war; no matter what expense, "win the war." It is unfair to try to judge the expenses of the railroads by the past year, during war times, when the sole and paramount question before the American people and American Congress was to win the war for civilization.

Last evening Gen. Carl R. Gray, former director of divisional operations of railroads under Director General McAdoo, in his address at the Baltimore Bar Association gave an instance of the service which the railroads performed for the country. The same men, said he, who had always run the railroads ran them during the war, with the difference that they had the United States back of them.

Every restriction and operation—in fact, everything which tended to impede—was pushed overboard. For instance, let me call to your attention that on February 8 Gen. Gray, along with others, was called in conference with Mr. McAdoo and shown cablegrams from the premiers of England, France, and Italy, each almost identically alike, in which the statement was made that if the food program of 1,160,000 tons a month was not lived up to the war would end by April 1, and in favor of Germany. Gen. Gray told them that the railroads went into the factories and wherever they could get all kinds of cars, loaded them with food for the seaboard, and from then until March 15 scarcely a car except food cars ran in the United States. The result was that on that date every ship the United States and her allies could produce was filled, as well as all the elevators, and there were 62,000 loaded cars up against the wharves waiting to be unloaded.

You gentlemen must realize that this great undertaking was not accomplished upon the economical basis which prevails in peace times. It was not a question as to what it would cost to do this; it was a question of doing it; of feeding our allies and of carrying on the war to a successful termination. Then you have the large increase in wages to the employees, which became inevitable by reason of the high cost of food and other living expenses, so that the American railroad employees could live and clothe their families as suited their station in life.

You gave to our boys of the Army transportation at 1 cent per mile. It was just what we ought to have done, but nobody ever raised the question as to whether it was profitable or not. It was for the boys who were to win the war for us, and that was all that was necessary.

We had one of the worst winters in the history of our country. I doubt whether there is a man on the floor of this House who remembers such a winter. This made railroad operation very much more expensive. The railroads were not run in the manner of peaceful days, but upon a war basis, giving priority to all those articles which were necessary to win the war, to the exclusion of other traffic, no matter how unprofitable. Vast expenditure had to be made in equipment and numerous other matters which entered into the question of winning the war. I say, therefore, gentlemen, that you are not fair to the men who operated the railroads when you say they were not economically managed.

The truth is that the railroad management absolutely broke down and had to be taken over. Just why it broke down is a matter of great difference of opinion. Suffice it to say that when they did reach that period and it was necessary for the Government to take them over, it was done, and the railroads were managed and the war has been won.

I was talking to a large transportation man some months ago, and he advanced the idea that the railroad congestion first originated when a fruit vendor refused to pay 25 cents for the hauling of a bunch of bananas to his shop by one of the store-door delivery wagons of the company. Other merchants took up the question and refused to accept the goods and pay the hauling. Thus the state of congestion originated.

The Interstate Commerce Commission disapproved of the store-door delivery, and ordered it to be discontinued. Hence the hauling of the freight from the stations by hundreds of consignees instead of by the prompt system of store-door delivery soon congested the freight yards and freight stations along the Atlantic seaboard. This prevented the prompt unloading of cars, which gradually extended from the seaboard to Pittsburgh and other western centers, and thus, said my informant, the congestion of the railroads first began.

This is one theory, and there are many others. What I am proud of is the fact that with the railroads operating in conjunction with the Government, and with all the other branches functioning, we have won the war, and now comes the question of appropriating money to finance the railroads under this bill. It is one of the things which must be done. The railroads must be looked after. They are the business arteries of the country; without them we can not become prosperous, nor even conduct our affairs. The better they are financed and the better they are operated the sooner we can again reach the prosperity of peace times.

I am, therefore, in favor of doing everything possible for the railroads.

As to the question of Government or private ownership, I am very much of the opinion Gen. Gray was when some one asked him what was his opinion about Government ownership. He replied, "Government ownership and private ownership can wait until we have settled this question of German ownership."

Let us settle this war question, establish peace throughout the world again, agree upon some proper form of a league of nations, and avoid the great devastation wrought by war, both upon humanity and property. Perhaps when we get farther away from the effects of the war, and more established in our business enterprises, we may be better able to judge as to whether the people want public or private ownership. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, did the gentleman use all of his time?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland yields back one minute.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, before I begin, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

By unanimous consent, leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD was given to Mr. KREIDER, Mr. FESS, Mr. SHERLEY, and Mr. GREEN of Iowa.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, necessarily in voting upon the various bills that press upon us during the closing days of a session of Congress we do not have opportunity to read carefully all the hearings on them, and we can only do the best we can and make up our minds from the information which we have obtained from a hurried study of the printed hearings before the committee which has charge of the particular bill, and such other reading and study as we may have opportunity to give.

Members of Congress would often wish that we might have more time to look into the details of these appropriation bills which carry such enormous sums of money. That we do not have such time and can not possibly have it under any system that mortal man might devise is one of the strongest reasons why I am opposed to the socialistic formula of putting the Government into all kinds of business ventures. As long as we can keep our Government within the sphere of operation which properly belongs to a republican form of government and as ordained by the fathers when they wrote the Constitution, to wit: To really govern and control and not to own the means of production and transportation and livelihood of its citizens, then we have every reason to believe that we shall have a government of law and order and representative of all classes of people and not dominated by any group or special interest. In fact, that is the only kind of a government which can and will guarantee safety and protection to all classes and groups of citizens. And now with these general observations I will undertake to discuss some of the features of the bill which we now have under consideration..

I have hurriedly read the hearings on this bill and have listened with a great deal of interest to the able speech of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] in explanation of his reasons for advocating its passage. On this reading of the hearings, and my study of the bill itself, and the able speech of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] I expect to base my decision on final vote on the bill.

On December 14, 1918, during the general debate on the Post Office appropriation bill, I expressed clearly my opposition to the Government ownership of telegraphs, telephones, and railroad systems, and I do not wish to repeat to-day anything I said then, except that I want the people whom I have the honor to represent in this body to know that I am emphatically opposed to a policy of Government ownership of these utilities, and I favor their return to their owners just as soon as it can be properly effected.

It is my belief that it is no time for men who are in responsible public positions to undertake to dodge or evade this important question, or make it the football of politics, but it is time for every man to stand up and be counted on it. And I hope that the people will demand that their Representatives in Congress declare themselves. It is too important a question to be sidestepped or evaded. The consequences which it involves to the people are too tremendous to be treated lightly or indifferently.

In discussing this bill that we have before us now to increase by $750,000,000 the revolving fund which we provided in the bill of March 21, 1918, naturally one of the first propositions that arises in our minds: How has the Government operated these railroads? What, if any, deficit has there been in the operation? What items are covered by this enormous appropriation of $750,000,000? To these questions I will now undertake to devote some brief attention.

If I recall correctly, some years prior to the war and to the Government taking over the railroads, Hon. Louis D. Brandeis, who is now one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, appeared before the Interstate Commerce Commission in a hearing where the railroads were seeking to secure increases in freight rates, and stated that they needed no increases, and that a very large sum, running into the millions, could be saved each year by certain economies that the railroad companies could easily put into effect. According to his opinion, the matter of saving millions in each year on operating expenses would be a perfectly easy thing to accomplish. I think Mr. Clifford Thorne, who was at that time a railroad commissioner of the State of Iowa, made that statement also, and argued it with considerable emphasis to the Interstate Commerce Commission. And it is interesting also to note that when the Senate Commerce Committee was holding hearings on the act of March 21, 1918, Hon. William G. McAdoo, Director General, appeared before that committee and gave his opinion as to the wonder work and the magic and the economies that could be brought about under unified Government control. I wish to read some of the things that Mr. McAdoo said before the Senate committee in that hearing. Here is what he said:

So I hope that very large economies may be practiced. How far they will be offset by increased cost of material and increased cost of labor I do not know, but perhaps one hand will wash the other.

But how has it actually turned out? The truth of the matter is that the right hand has failed to wash the left hand by more than $1,000,000,000.

Again, he says:

I hope that the deficiency will be inconsiderable, and I hope as well that we may have a surplus. (Senate committee hearings, p. 823.) * * * I hope there will be no deficiency. I hope that such economies can be effected as will prevent deficiencies, and I even hope that a surplus may result from Government operation.

But he was cautious enough to add:

Of course, that is a hope. I do not know.

Mr. McAdoo is an optimistic and hopeful statesman, but he surely stretched his optimism and credulity if he really ever brought himself to even hope that there would be a surplus under Government operation and control.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Can the gentleman tell us where he said that?

Mr. BLACK. Yes; that was before the Senate Commerce Committee when they were considering the act of March 21, 1918, which provided for the compensation agreements, and so forth, to the railroads.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. How much does the gentleman think we would have been in the hole if Mr. McAdoo had not increased the freight and passenger rates?

Mr. BLACK. I will discuss that feature directly; but I will make a short answer at the present, and say without any fear of contradiction that there would have been a loss to the Government in 1918 of at least $750,000,000 if the freight and passenger rates had not been increased. Now, let us see how these optimistic predictions by such men as Hon. Louis D. Brandeis and Mr. Clifford Thorne and Mr. McAdoo as to the wonders that would be worked under Government control have actually turned out, because I believe that in the consideration of a great fundamental question like this the American people are entitled to the facts. I read now from the Railway Age of January 31, 1919. If these facts are not correct, I invite correction from any Member of the House:

The increases in expenses came so fast that, contrary to his obvious expectations, Mr. McAdoo was obliged to make large advances in both freight and passenger rates. These advances in rates yielded increased earnings of about $600,000,000 in the six months, July to December, inclusive, during which they were in effect. The increases in expenses wiped out the $100,000,000 margin with which, as Mr. McAdoo told the Senate committee, he began; wiped out the $600,000,000 increase in earnings due to advances in rates; and left the Government with a deficit of $200,000,000 from the year's operations. Taking into account the increased earnings derived from the advances in rates and the deficit incurred, it will be seen that Mr. McAdoo missed his guess as to the final outcome of the year by at least $800,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a word?

Mr. BLACK. Yes, I yield.

Mr. MADDEN. I understand that the class rates were increased 25 per cent and the commodity rates were increased all the way from 100 to 1,000 per cent, and the passenger rates were increased 50 per cent.

Mr. BLACK. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that I really think it is true that the increase in freight rates was larger than 25 per cent when you look at the matter in the aggregate. My understanding is that the average increase on most articles was 25 per cent but on many commodities it was very much more.

The statement is frequently made by those who favor Government ownership of railroads and therefore Mr. McAdoo's plan for a five-year extension of the time of Government control, that the deficit which was incurred in time of actual hostilities, is not a fair test of Government management and that peace-time operation and management will make a much better record.

I wonder on what they base so hopeful a prediction.

The signing of the armistice took place November 11, 1918, and certainly operations during the month of December, 1918, would reflect light on what we may expect from Government operation of the railroads during peace times.

The Interstate Commerce Commission's report for December is now available, and let us see what it shows.

The force and logic of figures are much more convincing in a matter of this kind than flamboyant and sophomoric oratory.

Let us see: In December, 1917, the weather and other operating conditions were as bad as ever known, and yet the operating expenses of the railroads under their own private managements were only $238,582,000. In December, 1918, the weather conditions were as favorable to economical operation as were ever known, and yet the expenses, including a certain amount of back pay to railway employees, under Government operation were over $375,282,000, making an increase over December, 1917, when the roads were being operated under their own private management of $136,700,000. Enormous, is it not? And yet it is true and I stand up here and boldly challenge any one to dispute the accuracy of the figures.

The statistics for December are accompanied by statistics showing the results of the same roads for the 12 months of 1918. The 175 large roads included, having a mileage of 214,000 miles, had an increase in earnings during the entire year of $824,000,000, due in large part to freight and passenger increases in rates, or 21.6 per cent. The increase in operating expenses was $1,090,000,000, or 40 per cent.

One readily sees from an examination of these figures that there was a reduction in the net operating income for these 175 large roads for the 12 months of 1918 of $265,000,000, or almost 30 per cent. And it must be remembered that this enormous deficit was in the face of the high increase in freight and passenger rates which went into effect in the month of June, 1918.

If it be true, as La Fontaine said, "in everything one must consider the end," then it is high time that Congress should begin to consider the end to which some of the policies we are now following would commit us, and we should steer back into the path of a wise and prudent statesmanship.

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] five minutes.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the legislation which Congress enacted a year or so ago, taking over the railroads, makes necessary, of course, the additional appropriation, as shown from the report of the Committee on Appropriations and from the speech of its distinguished chairman [Mr. SHERLEY]. We are bound and compelled in justice and in right to appropriate this money that is now and will be needed. In the few minutes I have I want to call the attention of the committee to the question of Government ownership of railroads as a permanent policy.

I have received a great many requests and letters from people of my city and State and from other places touching this question. From what I have been able to learn I judge that there has been organized and that there is now going on a vigorous propaganda trying to influence the Members of Congress upon this question. I believe that when this question comes up in the next Congress we ought all to be free and to have open minds to do that which seems to be best for the country and the people generally.

I am vigorously opposed to propaganda that is organized and has its headquarters generally here in Washington trying to influence us on matters of this kind without furnishing any facts. I hold in my hand a letter, similar to others I have received, to which I want to call the attention of the House. It is dated St. Louis, February 14, 1919, addressed to Senator SPENCER, of my State, Representative IGOE, one of my colleagues from St. Louis, and myself. The letter is as follows:

ST. LOUIS, February 14, 1919.

Hon. Senator SPENCER,
Hon. Representative IGOE,
Hon. Representative DYER,
Washington, D. C.:

By my vote and the vote of my fellow workmen you were enabled to fill the position you now hold, and if you wish to retain the support of the many thousands of railway employees and their friends who are not directly connected with the railroads in future elections we are asking that you favor us by giving your support and influence favoring the extension of Government control of railroads for another five years, as per the recommendations outlined by former Director General W. G. McAdoo.

The evidence is very clear that should the railroads be returned to private management and control it would be most disastrous to business and the country at large.

I am asking each of you to put forth your best efforts to the end that the railroads of the country remain under Government control.

Trusting that you will see your way clear to take your stand as outlined above and that I may be permitted to have a favorable reply, I am,

Yours, truly,

ALPHONSE G'SELL.
FERDINAND G'SELL.

Neither of the two men whose names have been signed to that letter reside in my district. The important part of this letter to which I wish to call attention to is that it says, "Carbon copy to John Scott, room 505-507, A. F. of L. Building, Washington, D. C."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. DYER. I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that there has been organized, apparently, this propaganda and that its headquarters are in Washington, in the A. F. of L. Building, under the management of some man that I do not know by the name of John Scott. The A. F. of L. Building I take it to be the American Federation of Labor Building.

This letter gives no facts or information to me or any Member of Congress as to why I should vote for a five-year extension of the railroads under Government control nor for permanent ownership. It is a systematic effort, as I view it, and from letters I have received from my city, indicating that from now on until Congress does act you and I will be bombarded with these letters from people at home and elsewhere. This letter says, "By my vote and the vote of my fellow workmen you are enabled to fill the position you now hold." In other words, telling me and others in effect that we have elected you to Congress and we expect you to do what we want you to do on the railroad question.

I have in my city, St. Louis, a great railroad center, and there thousands of men who are employed in railroad work, in the operation of trains, in the offices of railroads, and so forth.

St. Louis is the general headquarters for several of the railroads of the great Middle West. We have thousands and thousands of men who are engaged in this work. I have found these employees fair, honorable, and good citizens. I have found the same as regards the owners, operators, and managers of these railroads. I know they want and expect their Representatives in Congress to consider all the facts with reference to these questions, and to do whatever is for the best interest of all concerned.

I want to protest and call attention of the Members of Congress to what I believe is a most unjust method of trying to influence them in the discharge of their public duty. I wish to say that these people themselves are not trying to use undue influence on Members of Congress so far as my city is concerned. It is those persons who have political axes to grind or other selfish interests. I do not receive letters from men whom I know personally are engaged in the operation of trains of this threatening kind, and yet many of them are railroad men and citizens of my district. Such letters as I have here are sent out from Washington propaganda headquarters, all prepared to obtain signatures of men, many of whom probably do not work on the railroads at all.

These men whose signatures are to this letter I do not know. I know they do not live within my district and I doubt if they are in effect working for the railroads. But it is a sinister method of influencing legislation. We want, Mr. Chairman, when the time comes to vote upon this question, to vote as the best interests of the country demand, from the best information we can get. I want to so vote and speak upon this question as my judgment directs after mature and serious investigation of all the facts. I also want to follow the judgment of men who are giving time and attention to this great problem—Government officials, railroad operators, and employees. I would give heed to the judgment of men like the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], the able and distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations; men like the great legislator, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], the former able Speaker of the House, a member of the Appropriations Committee; men who have given great study to these questions, who have considered them from the standpoint of doing justice to the whole country. I could mention others who will in Congress aid in the solution of what is best to do with the railroads. There is the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], who will be chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee in the next House. This committee will consider this question primarily. Then there is another Member, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER], a trained railroad man. I value his judgment on this serious proposition. We will do what is right at the proper time. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, on the taking over by the Government of the railroad systems of this country we appropriated $500,000,000 to be used to buy equipment, make improvements, and pay operating expenses. We are now called upon to appropriate $750,000,000 more for those purposes—a billion and one-quarter of the people's money raised by taxation to keep the railway systems of the country going.

During the period of Government operation the rates have been increased over 25 per cent, so that the people of the country have paid between five and six hundred million dollars more in freight and passenger charges in six months than they would have paid for the same service under the rates which prevailed when the railroads were in private control. Notwithstanding this increased charge on the people, of more than a billion dollars a year in freight and passenger rates, the revenues of the roads fell short in 1918 of paying operating expenses and meeting the standard return due the companies under their contracts with the Government by nearly $200,000,000.

I think there is no one who will claim that the service on the railroads of the country has been improved under public control. I think it is the judgment of a great majority of those who utilize the railroads that the service has been much less satisfactory than under private control.

This is the situation, then: A billion and a quarter dollars out of the public pocket to equip, improve, and operate the roads; another billion and a quarter dollars of levy on the people of the country in the way of increased passenger and freight rates and a less satisfactory service, and yet there are folks who want Government ownership and operation of railroads. It may be argued, it has been argued, and it will be argued that the operation of the railways by the Government in time of war does not afford a fair condition on which to judge what the results of Government operation might be in time of peace. That is very true, but at least some of the benefits that it was claimed would follow before we took the railways should have been apparent even under the trying conditions of war. This war has cost a great deal of money and many precious lives, and it will lay a very heavy burden on the people of the country for many years to come. Possibly we may secure some good out of all these losses if we take to heart the experience we have had relative to the inefficiency or ineffectiveness of Government in the operation of great private enterprises. I am not prepared to say that it would have been better to have allowed the business of the country to continue during the war under proper and reasonable regulations, but without Government management, operation, regulation, price fixing, and licensing—amounting to the control of business. I am not prepared to say that, but I am of the opinion that he who attempts to prove that we secured substantial temporary or lasting benefits or that we aided greatly in winning the war by the efforts that we made in many lines of management, operation, regulation, control, and price fixing has a very hard task on his hands. Coal would have gone higher at one period than it did if we had not regulated the price, but it would have got down to normal more quickly.

The farmers did not ask for a guaranteed price on wheat, but in order to justify the artificial and arbitrary fixing of a price during the war below the price the law of supply and demand would have fixed, a minimum guaranty was agreed upon, and the Lord only knows what the final reckoning will be or how much it will ultimately cost. We know what it has cost us to run the railroads, and we know we have not gotten good service. The fact is that war has again emphasized what has been known to all reasonable and reasoning men since civilization dawned—that you must have individual initiative and enthusiasm, intelligent self-interest, the spur of ambition, to carry on the great enterprises of civilization; and that while public regulation is necessary and essential to check greed and compel respect for the rights of the people, taking over and operation of great enterprises and industries by the Government is certain to be costly and unsatisfactory. I have tried to keep an open mind on this railroad business and on various Government activities in the field of private enterprises during the war, because they were deemed necessary, but as I have observed the effect and counted the cost I am more and more convinced these enterprises and activities were of questionable value in war and indefensible in peace.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for 16 minutes.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has been kind enough to yield the balance of his time to me in closing this argument on this bill.

Of course, I would preface my remarks by saying that ability to close this matter with the clearness, the exactness, and the emphasis that would be obtained from the learned discussion of the gentleman from Kentucky can not in any wise be given by myself. I have during the time of this debate carefully noted what was said, and it seems to me that we have sometimes gone far afield from the exact matter which we are about to decide. Laws are passed either to prevent crime or to punish those who have committed crime or they are passed as remedial legislation to better conditions under existing law. This is certainly not a law which is intended to punish crime, and yet during the discussion this afternoon I have heard charges made against the administration of railroad affairs, charges against the Government, and charges of lack of interest and lack of capacity, and perhaps charges even worse than that, but the pith of this matter is this: What is the law intended for and what does it mean? The law means an appropriation of $750,000,000, and it is to be expended to remedy an existing condition. That condition is a deficit, and that deficit must be met, and while it may be very pleasant and perhaps instructive and entertaining at some other time to talk about railroad administration, Government ownership, and the results of the last administration of the railroads by the Railroad Administration officials and the consequent effects of Government ownership or private ownership, to my mind they have absolutely nothing to do with the matter we now have in hand.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield in that connection?

Mr. DEWALT. I will.

Mr. DENISON. The gentleman has stated very properly this law is to remedy existing conditions.

Mr. DEWALT. Yes, sir.

Mr. DENISON. Does not the gentleman think in the discussion of that question that it is pertinent to discuss the causes of this condition?

Mr. DEWALT. Hardly so. You are not facing a theory; you are facing a condition, and that existing condition is a deficit. It does not make very much difference if you do not have any money in your pocket what the reason is you do not have it; the fact still remains you have not got it; and the best thing you can do under the circumstances is to find how you can get the money into your pocket.

Mr. DENISON. If you have not got the money and you are discussing the reason for getting it, does not the gentleman think you might discuss how you happened not to have any in your pocket? It seems to me——

Mr. DEWALT. I believe a little discussion might help it, but the extraneous discussion in reference to the causes that brought about this deficit, in my judgment, went too far afield. Now, what is this deficit? Let us get down to that. The revolving fund was $500,000,000. That absolutely and actually was exhausted by the control of the railroads and by the Government. They are now asking for $750,000,000 in addition to what they have already had. Now, that is a plain proposition. Now, the actual deficit that was incurred during the administration is not the enormous sum that these gentlemen have been propounding to you. It was not $1,000,000,000. It is actually $196,000,000. Caused by what? Well, it does not make very much difference what it was that caused it unless it was theft. It may have been extravagance; it may have been mismanagement; it may have been, in some instances, a mistake, and very frequently, no doubt, was; but that is not the question. The question is, How are you going to meet the deficit, and what are the reasons for raising the money? That is the clear, succinct proposition, and nothing else. Now, is the deficit $196,000,000? Now, let us look at that for a moment. You see, gentlemen, in my humble opinion the trouble in this House is just here, that a great many gentlemen, while well meaning in their intentions and no doubt fairer and more honest than a great many other people are or propose to be, have gone into this subject without examining the figures.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. DEWALT. I will.

Mr. BLACK. Does the gentleman understand me to have said there was a billion dollar deficit?

Mr. DEWALT. I was not referring to the gentleman at all.

Mr. BLACK. He misunderstood me, then, because I made no such statement.

Mr. DEWALT. I was not referring to the gentleman at all; I was referring to some one else. The trouble is that a great many have approached this subject without really knowing what the deficit means and how much it is and how it is made up. Now, if gentlemen of the committee will take the report and turn to page 188 they will see that under the requirements for 1918 there was a standard return which must be paid to the railroads under the provisions of the railroad act. That sum was $928,314,000 in round numbers. There was also an expenditure for additions and betterments of $573,334,000. Now, that is not a deficit or a loss, because under the original provisions of the act itself taking over the railroads the railroads, when they are returned to their private control, must pay for these betterments and improvements. That is the law. How must they pay for them? They must not pay for them at the actual cost thereof, but the act provides that they shall pay for them at the appraisal value; and the act further provides that during the time that these betterments are acquired and taken into the railroads themselves they shall, if possible, pay for them out of their earnings, so that this matter is not considered, or should not be considered, a portion of the deficit. In addition to that, you have advances to inland waterways of $4,361,480; and yet in the calculation of this deficit, amounting up to a billion dollars, according to the figures of these gentlemen, they say that is a deficit. Why, it is not a deficit at all. The inland waterways of the country were taken over provisionally, just exactly as the railroads were taken over, and they were taken over under the same terms.

And these betterments and improvements which are put into those inland waterways are under the provisions of that act and they must be paid and returned to the Government ultimately.

Now, take your next item, $51,475,000. That is rather an astounding item. But what is that? It is the money loaned to the New York, New Haven & Hartford road. The reasons for such a loan were quite apparent at the time, and I will merely refer to them to say that every man on this committee thought there was absolutely nothing else to do under the circumstances. They had $43,500,000 already outstanding, notes which were due just about the time this railroad legislation was being enforced. At that time also there was the third liberty loan pending. It became actually and absolutely necessary that there must be a financing of this road's finances at that time, and the Government advanced $43,500,000, taking ample security for the same, and at the same time gave $8,000,000 in addition thereto for the necessities of the railroad at that time. Suppose they had not done that. It is easy to say that the New York, New Haven & Hartford would go into bankruptcy. It is easy to say, "Let a receiver be appointed." But there would have been a financial panic at that time, and the bankers that were carrying these large loans were obliged in some way to find a remedy, and the only remedy that could be found at that time was the loan from the Government. And yet I hear gentlemen on this floor to-day calculating that as a part of the figure that must make up this deficit. It is amply secured and will be returned to the Government in due time.

Well, now, take that figure, and you find you have $1,557,484,000, in round numbers. From those you can exclude the items I have already given you, and then if you take the net requirements as found on page 188 you will find that the additions and betterments for the year 1919 are $290,918,283, which is the balance between the amount as specified, of $573,334,119, and the amount appropriated by the railroads themselves for the payment of betterments, and you have the item of $290,918,000.

Mr. BUTLER. Will my good friend answer me a question?

Mr. DEWALT. I will if I can. Quakers ask questions, you know, that other people can not answer.

Mr. BUTLER. This is an easy one.

Mr. DEWALT. All right.

Mr. BUTLER. We have taken from the Treasury $500,000,000 for railroad purposes.

Mr. DEWALT. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. And we are asking now to take $750,000,000.

Mr. DEWALT. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. When we get through, how much is it going to cost the Government?

Mr. DEWALT. I have been trying to show to you that a greater proportion of this is going to come back into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. BUTLER. Does my friend have it figured out? I want those two figures.

Mr. DEWALT. It is going to cost $381,806,904 in order to make up this deficit for 1918.

Mr. BUTLER. I got that from the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]. But when we are through with it all, settle it all up, and wipe it off the slate, how much is it going to cost the Government?

Mr. DEWALT. That is something that nobody, not even a Quaker, can tell.

Mr. BUTLER. Then, I will say to my friend, it is a hard one.

Mr. DEWALT. And for this reason: I say that when you make up the estimates for 1919 they are simply estimates. When you make them up for 1918 you have the actual figures.

Mr. BUTLER. I agree with the gentleman. Excuse me for the interruption.

Mr. DEWALT. It was not an interruption. It was a proper inquiry.

If you take $881,000,000 as tabulated, by taking the additions and betterments, the working capital, the advance to the inland waterways, the loan to the New York, New Haven & Hartford, and then the deficit of $196,000,000, as already said, and you have your revolving fund of $500,000,000, an additional appropriation of $381,000,000 is requested to make up that difference.

Mr. MAYS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. MAYS. The railroads have rendered a great deal of service to the Government in carrying troops and the like. Has that all been computed and proper credit given to the Railroad Administration?

Mr. DEWALT. It is taken in the aggregate receipts of the railroads for the year 1918, and the gentleman will find them on the same page as $732,314,372, and in that item is included the amount received for the transportation of troops.

Mr. MAYS. Is the gentleman informed whether or not those charges correspond to charges made by private owners? For instance, we carry the boys back for 1 cent a mile to any part of the country. How much are the railroads credited for that service?

Mr. DEWALT. I can not say. I have no definite information on that.

Mr. MAYS. The gentleman can not tell how much they are credited for the service in carrying the troops in any instance?

Mr. DEWALT. I can not. Does not the gentleman recognize that that is a collateral issue? After all, let us come down to the finite proposition of how much money do you have, how much do you need, what is the difference between what you have and what you need, and where are you going to get it?

Mr. MAYS. You have been referring a good deal to this deficit of $196,000,000, and I am trying to ascertain the credits that might be due the Railroad Administration, if the gentleman is informed, for services rendered to the Government.

Mr. DEWALT. There is nothing in this report, so far as I can ascertain, which gives any detailed statement as to the charge for carrying troops and the amount of credit.

Mr. MAYS. Does not the gentleman realize that that would be a pertinent inquiry?

Mr. DEWALT. I think it would be.

Mr. TILSON. As a matter of fact, were not the usual charges made to troops as would be the case with other large numbers of people traveling?

Mr. DEWALT. Except that the troops traveled at 1 cent a mile.

Mr. MAYS. Other people paid 3 cents.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Kentucky to yield 10 minutes to my colleague from Illinois [Mr. DENISON].

Mr. SHERLEY. I have used all the time I had.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that my colleague may have 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that his colleague [Mr. DENISON] may proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] spoke a little while ago about certain propaganda that was going over the country to try to influence Members of Congress in reference to the proposed legislation extending the Government control of railroads for a period of five years. In that connection I want to ask the Clerk to read in my time a short press report that I clipped from the Washington Post of January 28.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia objects.

Mr. LARSEN. I have no objection to the gentleman's incorporating it in the RECORD.

Mr. DENISON. I will read it myself, to satisfy my friend.

Mr. LARSEN. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia mean to object to his reading it himself under the rule?

Mr. LARSEN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The objection is sustained. The present occupant of the Chair was of the opinion that the gentleman from Illinois had the right to read it in his own time, but the parliamentary clerk suggested that the rule was the other way, and he is more familiar with it than the Chair.

Mr. MANN. In the old days that was true. But now you might just as well say a man can not read a bill on the floor of the House. That has not been the practice since I have been a Member of the House. That used to be the old, old practice, but it never was a rule.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman any precedent to show that? It is very plain here in the rule as cited by the parliamentary clerk. Rule XXX is very clear on that.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, is there not also a rule that if objection is made the question can be submitted to the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. There is.

Mr. WALSH. I move that the gentleman from Illinois be permitted to read the article as requested.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] shall be permitted to read the article.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois will proceed.

Mr. DENISON. It is a quotation from Mr. McAdoo. I can not understand why there should be an objection to it by the gentleman from Georgia. I read:

ASKS RAIL CONTROL TO AID WATERWAYS—M'ADOO URGES NECESSITY OF COORDINATING TWO TRAFFIC SYSTEMS.

SANTA BARBARA, CAL., January 27.

W. G. McAdoo, former Director General of Railroads and former Secretary of the Treasury, made public to-day a telegram in which he urged five-year Government control of the railroads as a necessity for the development of inland waterways and for the coordination of the railroads and waterways with the new American merchant marine.

The telegram was sent in response to an invitation to attend an inland-waterways meeting to-day at Defiance, Ohio.

The message said, in part:

"It seems to me futile to expend great sums of money on the development of our inland waterways unless our Government adopts an intelligent policy about railroad control. The future of waterways development is absolutely dependent upon a government control which will enforce the operation of the waterways and the railroads as a coordinated and articulated system which will give the people the benefits of an efficient combination of water and rail facilities.

"Upon the return of the railroads to private ownership, which must be made within the 21-months period, as the present law provides, the cut-throat competition of the railroads under private control with the partially developed waterways will effectively destroy water transportation as heretofore and the people's investment in these facilities will continue to be of little if any value.

"I have urged the Congress to extend the period of Federal control of the railroads for five years because that will give us time to develop some of the most important existing water routes, coordinate them with the railroads, and prove their worth as a part of a great American transportation system.

"The powerful and sleepless forces of reaction are solidly arrayed against this plan. They will defeat it unless the American people are aroused to the situation. My suggestion to you and your associates is that you press upon the attention of the Congress the importance of the five-year control."

Now, I have read this telegram of Mr. McAdoo, which the paper states he himself gave to the press, as pertinent to this question of propaganda that is going on over the country to try to influence Members of Congress to vote for this proposed five-year extension of Government control of railroads. Of course we all know——

Mr. MAYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. No; I have not the time to yield. We all know that there are a great many people in this country who are interested in the development of inland waterways all through the Mississippi Valley and the West, and Mr. McAdoo is evidently trying to enlist the support of all those who are interested in inland waterways in using their influence with the Members of Congress to get us to grant this five-year extension of Government control, in order to get what they want done on the waterways.

I mention this and insert it in the RECORD here also for another purpose. When Mr. McAdoo resigned from his dual position with the Government he gave as one of his reasons for doing so that he was war weary and worn out and needed a rest. He wanted to get "far from the madding crowd's ignoble strife" and recuperate; and so he wrapped his mantle about him and silently stole away to sunny southern California, where the flowers bloom perpetually and the turmoil of politics disturbs not one's rest and reflections.

Mr. WELTY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. I supposed, and most of us supposed, that he was going out there to get away from this perplexing railroad question. But we see every day or two Mr. McAdoo sending a telegram or making a statement, which he invariably gives to the press, in which he urges some interest here, or some interest there, or some interest in some other part of the country, to get busy with Members of Congress and urge us to allow his five-year extension of Government control.

All of which shows that while Mr. McAdoo has resigned from the offices he held, he has not resigned from his interest in the continued control of the railroads by the Government. And while he allowed the President to appoint his successor as Secretary of the Treasury—a good appointment, too—he himself selected his successor as Director General of Railroads; and the new Director General of Railroads was careful to make a public statement on the day of his appointment to the effect that he was going to carry out Mr. McAdoo's policies. I think that Mr. McAdoo, while he is resting in southern California, still has his fingers on the wires that lead to the different agencies of the agitation that is going on over the country.

Mr. WELTY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. WELTY. Do you know why that telegram was sent?

Mr. DENISON. I think it is very evident on its face why it was sent.

Mr. WELTY. Does not the gentleman know that it was sent in response to an invitation to attend that meeting?

Mr. DENISON. The paper so states; but they did not invite him to go to the newspaper reporters and give his telegram to the newspapers before it was sent. [Applause.]

Now, as to this bill now under consideration: I will vote for it, because it seems to be necessary under the obligations we assumed when we took over the railroads. I will never vote to repudiate any obligation of the Government, however expensive it may be. But this experiment in Government operation of the railroads is going to prove a terribly expensive one to the taxpayers of the country. What we should do is not to pass any more merely temporary legislation on the railroad question, but to get busy as soon as possible and pass such necessary permanent legislation as will properly protect the interests of the railroad employees and the public and enable the railroads to operate their own properties under wise Government regulation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. All time has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for carrying out the act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1918, there is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $750,000,000, which shall be in addition to the appropriation of $500,000,000 made in section 6 of said act, and shall be subject in all respects to the same authority for, and restriction of, expenditure as the said $500,000,000.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. RAYBURN offers the following amendment: Page 2, line 3, after the figures "$500,000,000," insert: "Provided, That that part of section 14 of the Federal control act, approved March 21, 1918, before the first proviso, shall be amended to read as follows: 'That the period of Federal control of railroad and transportation systems herein and heretofore provided for shall continue until December 31, 1919.'"

Mr. SHERLEY. I make a point of order against that amendment, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MANN. What is the point of order?

Mr. SHERLEY. That it is legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. MANN. It will not take a minute to dispose of that. This is not an appropriation bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. I insist that it is an appropriation bill.

Mr. MANN. It is true that it appropriates money.

Mr. SHERLEY. It is a deficiency appropriation bill, and not a bill that legislates in the slightest degree.

Mr. MANN. In the first place, the gentleman is mistaken about what the bill is, although he ought to know.

Paragraph 2 of Rule XXI says:

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto—

And so forth—

nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment changing existing law be in order.

Now, what is this bill? Is it a general appropriation bill? Why, the gentleman from Kentucky admitted that it was not. He came before the House and asked unanimous consent to call it up. This bill was introduced through the basket. It is not a general appropriation bill, and I do not think the gentleman from Kentucky will contend that it is one of the general appropriation bills. Not only that. The bill itself provides legislation. The bill first makes an appropriation of $750,000,000. Then it says—which shall be in addition to the appropriation of $500,000,000 made in section 6 of said act, and shall be subject in all respects to the same authority for, and restriction of, expenditure as the said $500,000,000.

That is not an appropriation. That part of this bill is legislation. Of course, the whole bill was subject to a point of order. There is no authority of law for this appropriation. No one will contend that there is any authority of law for the appropriation. And being itself subject to a point of order, not being a general appropriation bill, and containing legislation as it does, any amendment which is germane to the subject matter of this bill is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentlemen from Kentucky desire to be heard on the question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I agree with part of what the gentleman from Illinois has said. I do not think this is a general appropriation bill, and in introducing the bill through the basket and in asking unanimous consent for its consideration, I did so not believing it was a general appropriation bill. I was under the impression—perhaps I should have known better—that the rule against legislation was a rule against legislation upon an appropriation bill rather than a general appropriation bill. In these closing weeks of the session I have not had much time to keep in mind particular rules of the House. Looking at the rule I find it relates to general appropriation bills. Inasmuch as this does not seem to be a general appropriation bill, the point of order that the amendment is legislation would seem not to be well taken. With the permission of the Chair, before waiving the point of order, I should like to have the amendment read again.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. RAYBURN: Page 2, line 3, after the figures "$500,000,000" insert "Provided, That that part of section 14 of the Federal control act approved March 21, 1918, before the first proviso, shall be amended to read as follows: 'That the period of Federal control of railroads and transportation systems herein and heretofore provided for shall continue until December 31, 1919.'"

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the bill.

Mr. MANN. Here is an appropriation to appropriate $750,000,000 for the year ending June 30, 1918, practically. It appropriates $750,000,000 in addition to the $500,000,000 already appropriated. Now, to say that as a proposition germane to that we can not provide as to the time when these roads shall be returned, or how long they shall be kept by the Railroad Administration, seems to me preposterous. That is what the money is for. When we appropriate money we have the right to say how long they shall keep the roads.

Mr. SHERLEY. With due deference to what the gentleman from Illinois says, I submit that the bill before the House is not a bill undertaking to deal with the policy of the Government in connection with railroads. It is not a bill that undertakes to legislate on the general subject of railroads. It is a bill making an additional appropriation.

Mr. MANN. Which is not authorized by existing law.

Mr. SHERLEY. That may be, but even if the matter be subject to a point of order, the rule is that an amendment must be germane to the matter that is pending, and the fact that the matter pending might be subject to a point of order does not throw it open to any sort of an amendment without germaneness.

Mr. MANN. I fully agree with the gentleman, but what I mean is that there being no authority of law for this appropriation, no law having provided for it, we then propose to appropriate $750,000,000 for the support of railroads, and an amendment is in order saying how long that money may be used, which is in effect saying how long the railroads shall be controlled by the railroad administration.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not think the situation is as the gentleman states. This is not simply a bill proposing to appropriate without regard to law for railroads. It is a proposition to appropriate $750,000,000 for the same purpose that the $500,000,000 was appropriated. I submit that if the original bill had been pending by which the $500,000,000 was appropriated it would not have been in order to amend that particular paragraph and put in a provision as to the time; that would be properly related to the part of the railroad act which fixed the time. If the entire matter were pending here it would be in order at some place to offer an amendment, but to hold that it is germane to offer an amendment as to the time of control and the return of the railroads would simply mean that this appropriation provision carried here throws open the entire subject matter and that every matter is germane to the provision. For instance, under such construction you might offer a provision that certain rates should be in existence for a given period simply because we are appropriating money; that would be to throw the matter wide open without any limit.

Mr. MANN. It would be in order to add a provision that no part of the money—not as a limitation—should be expended to a certain date; and in the original bill, where the $500,000,000 was appropriated, it was quite in order to offer an amendment providing that the railroads should not be under the control of the Government beyond a certain period. No such amendment was offered, because there was another place in the bill where that provision was carried. But to say that we have not authority to say how long this money shall be available, how long the power that uses it shall be in control, I must say is beyond my comprehension.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman must realize and distinguish between what is desirable and what the rules provide.

Mr. MANN. I mean as a germane proposition.

Mr. SHERLEY. It may be in a general appropriation bill that it is altogether beyond the comprehension that a man would vote for certain moneys without putting legislation with it, and yet we constantly do it. Now, I submit, there is presented to this House the question of appropriation in accord with the appropriation that is made in the original act, and that that does not open up the entire field of legislation in connection with railroad control.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman still has in his mind that this is a part of the regular appropriation. This is legislation.

Mr. SHERLEY. I conceded that it is not a general appropriation bill to which that particular rule applied, but I make the point of germaneness.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, may I make this suggestion in regard to the point of order? It is well settled under the rules of the House that if a bill is before the House amending a certain act of Congress it is not germane to offer an amendment affecting another act of Congress. Likewise, if a bill is before the House amending a particular section of any act of Congress, it is not germane to offer an amendment affecting another section of the same act of Congress.

The bill under consideration in effect amends section 6 of the railroad-control act by increasing the appropriation made available in the section appropriating $500,000,000 by increasing it to $1,250,000,000. Therefore the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas is in effect to repeal another section of the act known as the railroad-control act.

Therefore, supplementing the argument of my colleague from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], who made a point of order upon the subject of germaneness, the amendment is not in order, because in effect it repeals another section of the same act, which is not touched in the bill under consideration, and therefore is not germane under that rule of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. What does the gentleman say on the proposition that this is a limitation on the length of time within which this money can be used?

Mr. BARKLEY. I say that it is not a limitation. The amendment simply seeks to force the railroads back upon the private owners upon the 1st of next January, which is not a limitation upon the appropriation. The entire $750,000,000 might be expended if that amendment were agreed to, and therefore it could not be a limitation, provided it was expended this year and the railroads were turned back the 1st of January next. It is not, strictly speaking, a limitation upon the appropriation. It is substantive legislation changing existing law touching the period of Government control.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, if the Chair will permit, touching the suggestion contained in his inquiry there is no effort made by the language of the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] to put a limitation upon the time of expenditure. It would not follow because the railroads were turned back that the money could not be expended. The expenditure of money bears no direct relationship, either of general law or parliamentary law, to the time when the roads shall be turned back.

Mr. BLACK. Is it not true that if the roads are turned back on December 31, 1919, and any of this money remains unexpended that it would then be turned into the Treasury?

Mr. SHERLEY. It is not true as a legal proposition in any sense. It would probably be true as a practical proposition, but it is not true as a legal proposition. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] made no effort to put it in the form of a limitation upon the expenditure. He put it in the form of a direct amendment of a provision of existing law contained in the railroad-control act.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. If I had the time, I think I could find the Chair repeated precedents where the fact that a particular section of law is before Congress does not make it in order as an amendment to that section to amend other sections of the law.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, both of the gentlemen from Kentucky seem to me to labor under a misapprehension as to what this bill is. This is not a bill amending a particular section of the railroad-administration act. The gentleman says in effect that it does something. Very well. That is not within the rule; it is not a question of effect at all. The effect may be a great many different things from what legislation is. Where you have a bill directed toward the amendment of a particular section of a law it does not open the door to amend the law generally; but this is not directed to the amendment of any section of the law.

Mr. SHERLEY. In that connection, if he will read the bill——

Mr. MANN. Oh, do not say "if he will read the bill," for I have read it a dozen times.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman is unduly sensitive. I did not say that in any offensive sense. I suggest that if the gentleman will read the bill he will find on line 7 and following a direct reference to section 6 of said act. It is an amendment of that act by increasing the appropriation from $500,000,000 to $750,000,000.

Mr. MANN. The only direct reference to section 6 of the act is on the top of page 2, not where the gentleman refers to it at all, and there it is part of legislation stating that this appropriation shall be expended in the same way that the appropriation carried in section 6 was to be expended. That is not an amendment of the act and it does not purport to be. The gentleman has stated this is an appropriation and he has repeated now that this is an appropriation, and in the same minute says it is pure legislation; that it is an amendment to a legislative act.

Mr. SHERLEY. Of course, I do not think I said any of those things the gentleman says I have.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman to say them.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, the reason I referred to line 7 on the first page is that, starting there, the bill states:

> There is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $750,000,000, which shall be in addition to the appropriation of $500,000,000 made in section 6 of said act.

Now, that would be just the same as if you had said that you amended section 6 of such act by increasing the amount therein appropriated from $500,000,000 to $1,250,000,000.

Mr. MANN. Certainly the gentleman might have brought a bill to the House——

Mr. SHERLEY. I think I have.

Mr. MANN. Might have reported a bill to the House to amend section 6 of the original act and no one would pretend that it was an appropriation bill. It would be a legislative bill and clearly open to amendment. Now, the gentleman seeks to claim it is an appropriation bill in one minute and a legislative bill in another minute, and hides behind a technical defense which does not lie, because this is not an amendment to the original act. It is to supplement the original act.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair believes it is agreed by all that this does not come under the head of a general appropriation bill, and therefore the question of new legislation does not apply. The only question, then, is as to the germaneness of this particular amendment to the bill. Let us just see what this bill proposes to do. It says:

> That to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for carrying out the act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1918, there is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $750,000,000, which shall be in addition to the appropriation of $500,000,000 made in section 6 of said act, and shall be subject in all respects to the same authority for, and restriction of, expenditure as the said $500,000,000.

Now, what is this "restriction of expenditure" in the original act to which the "said $500,000,000" is to be "subject in all respects"? By referring to the original act the Chair observes that in section 14 of the act the limitation on the period of control of the railroads is to be one year and nine months after the duration of the war. And if this bill becomes a law in its present form the $750,000,000 appropriated will be subject to that limitation of time.

Now, the gentleman from Texas proposes by his amendment to change this limit and terminate control on December 31, 1919. It seems to the Chair that such an amendment is entirely germane to the bill, and the Chair overrules the point of order. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a substitute to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas desire to be heard on his amendment?

Mr. SHERLEY. I did not know the gentleman wanted to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is on his feet.

Mr. RAYBURN. I am willing for the gentleman's substitute to be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute offered by Mr. ESCH: Add to the bill the following proviso: "Provided, That the President shall not relinquish such control to their owners prior to July 1, 1920, without further legislation by Congress."

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that.

Mr. MANN. Let us dispose of the point of order.

Mr. RAYBURN I would like to have the point of order disposed of before I begin my remarks.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That, of course, is legislation and not a limitation upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. MANN. This is not an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee has not been in the Chamber. This is a legislative bill and comes under the legislative rules. Everybody, even the chairman of the committee, admits it is not a regular appropriation bill, so the rules applying to an appropriation bill don ot apply.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does the Chair overrule the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman desires to make the point of order, the Chair will overrule it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I make it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the gentleman say that it will be in order on the ground it is a limitation of the appropriation, on the ground that he held the amendment of the gentleman of Texas——

The CHAIRMAN. That this is no general appropriation bill. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, as far as I am individually concerned, I would like to see the railroads go back to private control to-morrow.

But I know, as everybody else does who is acquainted with the situation, that that is entirely impracticable. I believe that 12 more months will give us sufficient time to enact whatever needed legislation, that we may turn the railroads back to private control. I have heard a good deal said here about an extra session of Congress. I say to you that it would be very convenient indeed to me, and it would be a source of great gratification to spend nine months away from Washington, and if I consulted my personal wishes in the matter that is what I would want to do. But with as much reconstruction legislation before us as there is, entirely untouched by this Congress, I believe it would approach a crime for the Congress to remain away from Washington until December 1, 1919.

There should, indeed, be legislation passed before the railroads are turned back to private control. I believe the Congress will be called in extraordinary session some time between now and the 1st of July of this year. I think, therefore, gentlemen, that with Congress meeting there should be a milepost to which it should work. It would make us definite as to the time at which we must pass any legislation, if any is to be passed; it would give the railroads themselves and everybody connected with them to understand when they were to get their property back, and they could get their house in order in that way. Therefore I think that at the end of this calendar year should be the time and not the middle of a calendar year, as suggested in the substitute of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH]. It appears to me that as we are dealing with the railroad question, and as we have been treating with the railroad question based upon the calendar year, it would be much more fortunate if we would turn the railroads back to private control at the end or at the beginning of a calendar year.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; I will.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I want to see if I get clearly in mind the situation that is now before the committee. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas is that the appropriation that is made herein shall not be made available beyond December 31 of this year?

Mr. RAYBURN. No. My amendment is that the Government control of railroads shall terminate December 31, 1919.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Oh, well; then perhaps I have misunderstood. I thought the amendment was that the appropriation should not be available beyond that time.

Mr. RAYBURN. It has that effect also, but I was quoting the language of the amendment.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this lesson in Government operation of railroads has, indeed, been a costly and a bitter one. It is going to cost us millions upon millions of dollars to ever get out of this thing. I believe that we will at least be partially compensated, if not more than compensated, for all the money we have put into this thing and all the money that we will lose, by an actual demonstration to the American people of the heresy of the whole idea of Government ownership of railroads. [Applause.] If growing out of this war can come two things that I believe will come, we will, to some extent, be compensated; not for the blood, of course, that has been shed, but for the treasure that we have put into it.

I believe, as I have just said, that it is the death knell, at least for a generation, of the Government ownership of railroads. And I believe along with that will also be sounded the death knell of another thing that I believe would destroy this Republic in the end, and that is another heresy, another companion of autocracy—universal military service. I believe that if this great and costly lesson, this experience, that we have had, can kill these two things, then we will indeed be to a great extent compensated for this bitter lesson. I hope, therefore, this amendment may be adopted.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, section 14 of the Federal control act gives the President the power to relinquish the railroads or systems of transportation prior to the 1st day of July, 1918, or gives him the power in agreement with the owners to relinquish them, or he can relinquish them on his own motion. The purpose of the pending amendment offered by myself is that the President shall not relinquish such control to the owners prior to July 1, 1920, without the Congress having first legislated with reference to them. I am persuaded to offer this amendment because of this paragraph in the President's annual message delivered at the opening of this Congress. He was talking about the railroad situation:

Let me say at once that I have no answer ready in the solution of the problem.

He said he had no confident judgment of his own.

The only thing that is perfectly clear to me is that it is not fair either to the public or to the owners of the railroads to leave the question unanswered, and that it will presently become my duty to relinquish control of the roads, even before the expiration of the statutory period, unless there should appear some clear prospect in the meantime of a legislative solution.

I believe that with the amendment I have offered Congress will be given the opportunity of determining upon a legislative solution. The amendment offered by my colleague [Mr. RAYBURN] asks for a relinquishment of the roads by the 1st of January next, irrespective of whether or not Congress shall have enacted the necessary legislation so that they can go back into private ownership without destruction, without the fear of bankruptcy, and without the disturbance of business.

I do not know whether there will be an extra session or not. Nobody here seems to know. If there is no extra session, then there will be only one month, the month of December, in which Congress could pass legislation to turn the roads over by the 1st of January. That is a contingency which we ought to avoid. Under the amendment I have suggested we will have the extra session, if an extra session is called, to consider this legislation, and we will have the long session beginning next December to consider the problem, and I am confident that Congress will find a solution of it before the 1st day of July, 1920. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, whenever you mention Government ownership you make some people very happy and you make some other people almost froth at the mouth with anger.

Let me say to you, gentlemen, if you will look into history, you will find that Government ownership of railroads has rarely ever come about by reason of anybody's favoring it as an academic question, nor has it been prevented by opposing it in the same way. It comes by reason of circumstances and conditions in spite of the opinions of men. It is but a little while since Mr. Ackworth, of England, one of the most celebrated private-ownership advocates in the world, came before our joint subcommittee in opposition to Government ownership of railroads in this country, and while he was here denouncing it England determined to go to Government ownership, not as a matter of argument or choice, but as a matter of compulsion growing out of the war conditions.

Mr. ESCH. The nationalization of the railroads in England has not been done yet by any act of Parliament. It is only a declaration of Mr. Winston Churchill the other day——

Mr. SIMS. No bill has passed, but the English Government have come to the conclusion that it will have to be done, Mr. Ackworth to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. ESCH. That is quite different.

Mr. SIMS. I am not unalterably opposed to Government ownership, as is the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]. I am not unalterably opposed to private ownership. I am not unalterably in favor of either the one or the other, but I am unalterably in favor of doing whatever is necessary for the good of the whole country, regardless of the prejudice and ignorance of some individuals. Those countries that have government ownership do not have exclusive government ownership. They have government ownership in part and private ownership in part, and both systems are operated in the same countries, and neither has destroyed the other. When we had the bill up for consideration for operation of the railroads for war purposes some gentlemen came to me and said, "I am for this bill because it means Government ownership." I said, "You do not know what will be the result. If it is a great success, it may be used as an argument in favor of continuing it permanently. But if it is not a success in the opinion of the people it will be used as the greatest argument against Government ownership that has ever been presented." The railroads were not taken over to bring about Government ownership nor to prevent it. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] stated succinctly and clearly and with sufficient elaborateness why it was necessary to take over the operation of the railroads in order to win the war. It furnishes no conclusive argument either in favor of or against permanent Government ownership as a policy of the country in time of peace.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. How long does the gentleman think the Government ought to keep the railroads?

Mr. SIMS. I am opposed to both the proposed amendments. I gave this question the most deliberate consideration when the law was passed which required the roads to be returned in not more than 21 months after the proclamation of peace. Nineteen hundred and twenty will be no time for legislation on the whole railroad problem, and we all know it, for each one of you will advocate the theory most popular in your district, and no one can tell what will happen during the period of reconstruction, when we will have to legislate on what will be absolutely necessary on account of return of peace conditions and railroad legislation will figure only indirectly in the reconstruction program.

I have read and studied carefully the position of Mr. Walker D. Hines regarding this question. He has been a railroad man all his life and is one of the ablest railroad lawyers in the United States. He makes what I regard as an unanswerable argument in favor of the proposition that it will be best for the railroads and best for the country that Government control should be continued beyond the election in 1920, so as not to make it a Democratic or Republican issue or any other kind of political issue. I placed in the RECORD to-day, with the consent of the House, an address by Judge Prouty, director general of railway valuation, who was on the Interstate Commerce Commission for many years, and nobody has a doubt as to his honesty, ability, and sincerity, and he says that Government control ought to continue for at least three years, and gives reasons ample, able, and practical why the Government should continue its control. I am opposed to both amendments and ask that both be voted down. [Applause.]

As an extension of my remarks, for which I have consent, I beg to say that the practical solution of rail and waterway transportation problems can not be reached in a day, nor in a month, nor in a year, nor in two years, if the solution is to be a wise and a practicable one. The present system, or rather lack of system, is the haphazard growth of three-quarters of a century in the experiment of attempting to perform Government functions and the discharging of Government duties to the whole people through private profit-seeking corporate agencies. It has not been a complete failure nor has it proved to be a complete success. But no country can develop to its capacity without the highest and most successful development of its transportation facilities.

In the very nature of things the public interest requires the greatest amount of service for the least possible expenditure. On the other hand, private interest and private investment seek to secure the largest possible profits in its investments in proportion to service rendered. There always has been and there always will be irrepressible conflicts between public and private interests in all attempts on the part of governments to discharge their proper and legitimate functions through private agencies, which agencies are to receive their reward by permitted exploitation of the people served by them. Such relations are unnatural and never have been and never will be satisfactory to the public so exploited.

The people have a right to demand, and are demanding, that transportation be furnished at its actual cost; and if this can not be done without Government ownership they are ready to pay the price. The people are getting tired of having their burdens increased simply to further increase the incomes of idle capitalists on their idle capital. We hear much of what ought to be done to attract the idle capital of the idle capitalists, but the sum and substance of what should be done, from the railroad viewpoint and all those who agree with them, is simply to increase rates; and if in this way you do not at first succeed, then "try, try again." Every increase of rates means that the carrier gets more money than he has been getting for doing exactly the same thing. The increase thus given the carrier, without increased or additional service rendered, is in its very nature an unearned increment, except to the extent of increased costs of operation, if any. But interest on bonds and dividends on stocks are in no sense costs of operation justifying increased rates to meet same, and should never be considered in rate making further than to avoid a confiscatory rate. If I loan money on a farm and take a mortgage to secure it, I have no right to have any voice in the rent a tenant should pay the owner of the farm, nor has the owner any right, legal or moral, to increase the rental rate on the farm simply because he has for his own benefit placed a mortgage on the farm. So far as the tenants of a mortgaged farm are concerned, the interest on the mortgage is in no sense a fixed charge as against the tenant that in law or morals can justify an increased rental charge. The tenant is the patron or user of the farm just as the freight payer or passenger is the patron and user of the railroad; and the fact that the road is or is not mortgaged cuts no figure as to the amount the road is to receive for its services.

The mortgage debt and accumulated interest constitute a fixed charge on the farm only as to the owner who made the mortgage. But if the farm owner can not pay the interest, taxes, and other charges on the farm he has no right to increase his rent charge simply in order to enable him to do so. The loaner of the money has his remedy by foreclosure and sale of the farm, and the only remedy the owner of the farm has is to sell the farm and in this way end his unwise investment. If the produce grown on the farm should so advance in price as to materially reduce the quantity of such produce necessary to pay the rental charge, it would be but justice to the owner of the farm to increase his rent proportionately, regardless of whether or not the farm was mortgaged.

In so far as applicable the same relation exists as between the bondholder and the patrons of the railroad. The rates, fares, and charges have no relation to the bonds or interest on bonds. The rates and charges have relation only to the service rendered and received. But on account of stocks being issued with a par money value expressed in the face of the stock certificate, the public mind has come to regard it as a certificate of financial investment instead of a certificate of title or ownership in the particular corporation issuing it. It is in effect similar to a deed to an undivided interest in a tract of land, but instead of saying "one-twentieth undivided interest," it says in effect "one hundred dollars" in the total value of the whole corporate property of the issuing corporation. When these shares of stock are dealt in on the stock markets they are quoted at so many dollars per share, but the share being measured in terms of money instead of in terms of corporate ownership, the stock is in this way regarded by the public as indicating whether or not the issuing road is in good or bad financial condition. Nearly all stock shares are issued in the par value of $100 per share, and the unsophisticated public read it and understand it to mean that the issuing corporation has received $100 in money for the one share of its capital stock, and that this $100 is in the treasury of the corporation or has been invested in permanent tangible property devoted to corporate uses.

From this conception of stock issues, when a share of stock in a railroad company is quoted at less than $100 the public mind automatically jumps to the conclusion that the particular railroad company is a losing proposition and the stock in it is a bad investment. If, on the other hand, the $100 share of stock is quoted in the stock market at above par, the public jumps to the conclusion that that particular railroad is prosperous and that its stock is a good investment. This condition of the public mind has been used in stock manipulation in such a way as to boom or depress a particular stock on the stock exchange, with no regard whatever to the real financial condition of the issuing corporation. These stock manipulations have so adversely affected the market value of railroad stocks as to greatly impair the credit of railroads, in so far as the daily stock sales quotations are concerned.

If anyone will take the trouble to look at the daily quotations of railroad stocks on the New York Stock Exchange, he will see that a very small per cent of the stocks of railroads are quoted at or above par. This situation leads to the belief on the part of the public that railroad property is actually declining in value, when, in fact, such is not the case. In nine cases out of ten the railroad corporate property is not worth in excess of its bonded indebtedness and the unmanipulated market value of its stocks.

The organized security holders, or those claiming to represent $17,000,000,000 of bonds and stocks in railroads, have the hardihood and the boldness to ask Congress to pass a law requiring the Interstate Commerce Commission to allow the railroads to put in schedules of rates and fares that will, in effect, guarantee such a return on railroad property as will, in the minds of investors, make their securities more desirable than any other competing forms of security investments in the money markets of the world. Such a proposition, in practical effect, means to take from those who have but little and give those who have much in order that they may have more abundantly.

All increases in rates must be borne by either the producer or the consumer, or by both. If the rates on wheat from the Mississippi River section to the Atlantic seaboard section are increased by 10 cents per bushel, the farmer producing the wheat must sell it at 10 cents lower per bushel if the price of flour on the Atlantic seaboard is not to be increased. But if the wheat grower does not sell his wheat any lower, then the consumer of flour on the Atlantic seaboard has got to pay 10 cents higher for the flour from a bushel of wheat than he did before the freight rate was increased. But what will more probably happen will be that the farmer will sell wheat 5 cents lower and the consumer will pay 5 cents higher for his flour.

If we look into the history of railroad construction in its pioneer stages in this country, it will be found that as a general rule the initial stock issues were equal to or exceeded the investment values of the railroads. In other words, the corporate property values were not more than, but more often were much less than, the stock issues of the companies. On this account new or additional issues of stocks did not find ready sale. When such was the case resort was had to issues of bonds secured by mortgage on the corporate property, and quite often a bonus issue of stock was made and the purchaser of a bond received a certain amount of this stock as a bonus. The corporation thus increased its indebtedness and also increased its stock issue without increasing its corporate property by the sum of its stock and bond issue. Such a course of financing could not result otherwise than to reduce the market value of all the outstanding stock, unless in the meantime the unearned increment in the value of the corporate property had increased equal to the bonus stock issue. This was rarely the case. Often the bonds so issued were sold to a construction company for below par, or else a contract was made with the construction company so much above what the construction was really worth and paid for in the bonds of the railroad company at par. Often, after the pioneer stages of stock and bond issues had passed, the credit of the particular company had been so impaired that a receivership followed and refunding operations were resorted to, by which the outstanding bond issues were reduced in order to reduce fixed charges, but often the stock issues were really increased to such an extent that even after receivership and refunding operations were resorted to there remained an outstanding stock and bond issue far in excess of the then actual value of the corporate property.

The history of private corporation ownership, construction, and operation of railroads in the United States shows that the failures, the receiverships, the refunding operations, the foreclosure proceedings, watered-stock issues, and other high-finance schemes that have been resorted to exceed those of all the rest of the world combined, exclusive of England, where private ownership has heretofore universally prevailed, but where private ownership is soon to end and forever.

As late as 1916, in a hearing held by the Joint Subcommittee of the Senate and House, commonly referred to as the Newlands committee, it was authoritatively stated that more than 40,000 miles of railroads in the United States were then in the hands of receivers. A mileage exceeding the total mileage of all roads in England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland combined, exceeding the total mileage of all of the Republic of France, exceeding by two or three times the total mileage of Italy, and equal to or nearly equal to the total mileage of all railroads in the German Empire. I defy any man to point out a single case where a receiver was appointed that the condition of the railroad for which the receivership was sought was alleged and proven to be due to and caused by any act or order of the Interstate Commerce Commission, or any act or order of any State commission, or to any law passed by Congress or by any State legislature.

There were many receiverships prior to the passage of the act by Congress creating the Interstate Commerce Commission and prior to the creation of any State commission.

Mr. Chairman, there has existed for many years a general belief that the railroads in this country are vastly overcapitalized. The existence of this belief started the movement that finally resulted in the enactment of the law by Congress for the physical valuation of the railroads. That work has been carried on now for several years and is now approaching completion. If this physical valuation when finished convinces the public that the railroads are not overcapitalized, and thus removes from the minds of the people their firm conviction to the contrary, the result will justify the vast expense incurred in connection with the valuation work. It will do more to bring about that state of good feeling and cooperation that ought to exist between the railroad corporations and the public than anything else that I can imagine. But, on the contrary, if it does show what the public generally believes, that the railroads are vastly overcapitalized and that the people for all these many years have been paying rates on a vast volume of watered stocks and bonds, nothing can prevent or stay the public demand for the immediate condemnation and taking over of the railroads in this country by the Government.

In that way the water can all be squeezed out, and even if the Government should immediately sell or lease the roads to private corporations for operation it could do it on such terms and conditions as would thereafter forever prevent any future capitalization of any unearned increment or any rate making based on increased value of rights of way and tangible terminal property, and as proprietor could and would require such terms and conditions of operation and service as would tend to develop the country as a whole, and would regard all the railroads in the United States as a single national instrument of transportation in cooperation with all inland river and lake waterway transportation facilities, and require the railroads to also cooperate with all coastwise ocean transportation companies, and also all American chartered and owned overseas ship transportation companies in such a way as to make for the building up and maintaining of the greatest possible domestic and foreign commerce of the United States.

As the Government-controlled railroads are now receiving the largest net return upon an average that they have ever received, I can not see how it can be against their interest or that of their owners to continue the status quo for several years longer. If not for five years, then for three years after the proclamation of peace. By that time the valuation work will be completed, reconstruction and readjustment will have been completed, and we will all know better what ought to be done in the way of comprehensive legislation than we can possibly know in the short time limit provided for in the present Government-control act, approved March 21, 1918. Therefore, I think it will be to the best interest of the public and also to the best interest of the great body of the security holders of the railroads to continue Federal control of the railroads for five years, but if not for so long a time as that, it certainly ought to continue until January 1, 1922.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, may I get some agreement in regard to debate on these two amendments. I do not desire, considering the immense importance of the subject, to unduly curtail debate, but I do want to make progress.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I realize that the hour is late, and I am as anxious to get away as others, but I would like five minutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on these two amendments and amendments thereto close in 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that all debate on the two amendments and amendments thereto close in 30 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. SUMNERS. Reserving the right to object, may I ask the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Kentucky, if I can have five minutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. I shall not undertake to parcel out the time.

Mr. SUMNERS. I want to suggest to the chairman of the committee that this is one of the most important matters that the Congress has been called upon to consider, and now it comes up here under the five-minute rule——

Mr. SHERLEY. That is a good reason for defeating both amendments.

Mr. SUMNERS. Will the gentleman yield for a further suggestion? The Members of the House want full information. I have not had any information here which convinces me that I ought now to vote on this question.

Mr. SHERLEY. The plea that the gentleman makes in regard to debate relates to the wisdom of offering amendments to this bill. Mr. Chairman, I renew my request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that all debate on these two amendments and amendments thereto close in 30 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I feel that I ought not to take five minutes of your time at this hour of the day, but this is one of the most important matters that has come before Congress in many weeks and many months.

These amendments provide that the railroads of the country shall not be turned back to their owners until further legislation by Congress, with a limit of time. The President has power to call Congress together at any time if he wants legislation on that subject. If he wants to turn back the railroads to the owners within the next 90 days or 6 months, he has the power to call Congress together for that purpose and get that legislation. Neither the President nor Members of Congress can run a bluff on one or the other. He has certain rights, and he can not say that Congress has not given him the power that he asked for, because he can get it if he asks for it. Let me tell you, my good friends, what the retention of the railroads by the Government means to the taxpayer, and it is pretty near time that the Congress of the United States should be giving some consideration to the taxpayer, who has had none for the past two years in this body. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. There is not anything in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] that would prevent the Congress from enacting legislation for 30 days, if it was able to do it.

Mr. FORDNEY. I am not really speaking against the gentleman's amendment, but I am calling the attention of the House to the fact that the President has the right to get the power he needs, if he will ask for it at any time. He has been doing this in the past, and has been asking for more power than he was really entitled to, and getting it at that. The folly of the United States Government taking over the railroads during this war is costing the taxpayers of this country how much? Two million dollars a day right now.

Mr. JUUL. Three.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman says three, but $750,000,000 for 365 days is not very far from $2,000,000 a day. That is what it has cost for 1918.

Mr. JUUL. But there is $500,000,000 in addition to that.

Mr. FORDNEY. In addition to the $750,000,000 loss which I speak of, we are called upon to collect from the taxpayers the 50 per cent passenger fare increase, and the 25 per cent increase on freight rates for six months, which amounts to $500,000,000. The money collected by the railroads of this country for 1916 in passenger fares, in round numbers, amounted to $800,000,000. Fifty per cent of that is $400,000,000 and for one-half of the year it is $200,000,000. The money collected in freight by the railroads for the year 1916, in round figures, was $2,400,000,000. Twenty-five per cent of that is $600,000,000 and six months would be $300,000,000. The $300,000,000 in freight and the $200,000,000 in passenger fares for six months amounts to $500,000,000 in 1918 that the Government has had with which to meet their expenses in their tomfoolery in handling the railroads of the country, in addition to the $750,000,000 loss, and that is the debt that the taxpayers of this country are called upon to make good for the mistake of the Federal Government in taking over the railroads during the year of 1918.

The Government is handling not only the railroads but the telegraph lines. I received a letter to-day from a business man in my home town, who states that he sent a telegram to a business firm in Chicago that had been in business there many years, whose address was in the city directory and in the telephone directory, and word came back 24 hours after he had sent the telegram that the firm could not be found in the city of Chicago. Three days later the telegram reached the firm by mail. That is Government ownership of telegraph and telephone lines for you.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I hope both of these amendments will be defeated. I am frank to say that I am more against the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] than I am against the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH]. With all of the reconstruction legislation that is referred to in a nebulous sort of way by the newspapers and by the Members of Congress I believe there is no question which approaches in importance the railroad question, which must be solved by the next incoming Congress. Is there a Member of the House or of the Senate who is able to rise in his place to-day on the floor of either body and offer the solution that must finally be adopted by Congress in dealing with the railroad question? With all due respect to the intelligence of Members of both Houses, I believe I am well within the truth when I say that no Member yet has in his mind the entire and complete solution of the railroad question; but we are all agreed on this proposition, that we can not afford to turn the railroads back to private ownership in the same situation, under the same economic conditions, and with the same laws in force as existed prior to the time when they were taken over. This amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] is hurled at us within 10 days of the time when this Congress must adjourn. There is not the slightest possibility of enacting any legislation at this session of Congress to deal with the railroad question. Are we able to predict when the President may call Congress into extra session?

I agree with the gentleman from Texas that our personal convenience or inconvenience ought not to be consulted in determining whether there shall be an extra session either in the spring, the summer, or the coming autumn, but we know if the Senate adopts the policy that the House has agreed to and passes these appropriation bills that it is safe to predict that the extra session will not be called until well on in the summer, and possibly in the autumn. Even if there is an extra session of Congress called in the summer or autumn months, with the reorganization of the House under the incoming Republican majority, with the appointments of the committees, with the necessary delays incident to the hearings in the various committees of the House and Senate on the railroad question, delay will be inevitable. It will take considerable hearings before the House committee will be able to report a comprehensive bill, for we have in the last two months been having hearings on the packing industry with no bill reported yet. We held hearings for a month in framing the railroad-control act and the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce has been engaged for two months holding hearings and to-day announce that they can not even report a bill at this session of Congress dealing with the railroad question. In view of this situation, it seems to me we ought not to consult our prejudices either for or against any bill in reference to Government ownership, but we ought to deal with this question in a business, hard-headed, sensible manner, and it is sensible to conclude that we can not legislate in all reasonable probability by the 1st of next December or the 1st of next January to take care of the railroad situation.

Mr. DOWELL rose.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin because no man now knows whether it is possible to turn the railroads back to their owners prior to July 1, 1920, and if his amendment is adopted we can not turn them back unless Congress directs the President to do so. If in the meantime Congress is able to enact legislation or if the economic situation develops so it might be wise to turn back the control by July 1, 1920, certainly the President ought not to be restricted in his authority to do so, and I think we can assume that the President will not do so if the economic situation is such as to make it unwise, and for that reason I hope both amendments will be defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I crave the attention of the committee for five minutes. I believe this bill ought to pass without amendment just as it is reported from the committee. [Applause.] I believe it will pass the Senate—I hope it will—and I believe it would be signed by the President. Now, then, the 1st of January next you are on the eve of the presidential election.

Mr. MADDEN. No.

Mr. CANNON. What is this?

Mr. MADDEN. Nineteen hundred and nineteen.

Mr. CANNON. When do we elect the President?

Mr. RAMSEYER. The gentleman is right.

Mr. CANNON. On the eve of a presidential election. You will be looking about to hold your convention on the 1st of July and nominations will have to be made. We have got a Republican House; we have not two-thirds and we could not pass it over the President's veto, and you could not pass anything over his veto in the Senate. God knows whether it is Republican or Democratic. [Laughter.] There you are. Now, then, when you begin to undertake to enact legislation to regulate railroads, when they are to be turned back, it is impractical to do it, in my judgment, between this and the next presidential election, because up to that time Woodrow Wilson will remain President. Now, let us cut off these two little bombs that are thrown in here—one for the 1st of January arbitrarily to quit, as we can not enact legislation between this and that time, and the other for the 1st of July, that we shall not turn back before the 1st of July. We have got to have this money if we float these bonds, and God knows we owe the money and without it we are on the eve of a panic, and if we refuse the railroads this money and drive the strong roads to compete with the Government at 7 and 8 per cent interest, there will be nothing doing with the liberty drive.

I say let us do what it is practicable to do. And then when it becomes proper to legislate, and the time is right, we can legislate. We have got the votes. [Applause.]

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, on March 21, 1918, while we were under the stress and emergency of war, Congress passed an act taking over the railroads and authorizing the Government to keep them until the war was concluded and for a year and nine months thereafter, providing that the President might turn them over in the meantime if he elected so to do.

The one controlling reason with me is that the question is too large to vote on without having any chance to consider it. It does not involve a man's views as to whether he is in favor of Government ownership or against it. Each Member can with perfect propriety be for or against Government ownership and stand side by side and vote these two undigested amendments down. No committee has considered them. They are too wide in scope to adopt them without either committee or other consideration. The debate is already limited to 30 minutes. I submit it is preposterous to try to settle the whole railroad situation in 30 minutes. We should not do a foolish thing by voting for either one of these undigested amendments. I do not want to be disrespectful at all in that, but we have not had the time to study them. If I were forced to cast a vote right now on either one of these amendments, it would be a vote under compulsion and without information enough to cast an intelligent vote. I submit we should not be forced to vote on a proposition so important without any information. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] may have sufficient information to cast an intelligent vote on it. I have no doubt he has, or he would not have offered the amendment. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] may have sufficient information to vote on his amendment. I do not controvert the fact that he has it. But what I do say is that while the power reposes in the President to turn them back or hold them, and while the law says they may be held for one year and nine months after the declaration of peace, I can not see any grave necessity for coming in here and forcing the House to vote on a proposition until we have had some information on it. [Applause.]

I do not profess to have all the information on this. The only way I know how to do and the only course I know how to follow is, that when I do not know what to do, do nothing. Now I am not going to do anything on either of these two amendments except to vote squarely against them, until such time as these matters can be brought in here in an orderly way. This is not too much for the membership to ask. This is not too much to expect. We can at least preserve our self-respect by voting them down. Men may say it is proper to turn the railroads over to-morrow, and these large appropriations tug strongly at all of us to do that. Others may want to have Government ownership forever. The railroad employees think they want that. But I repeat that there is no emergency here to do either one of these things. The President under the law can hold them or can turn them over to-morrow, if he wants to do so.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. FERRIS. I yield.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Is there a probability that the President will do that?

Mr. FERRIS. I have not the slightest idea. The gentleman's opinion on it is better than mine, if he has any opinion.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. In the testimony of the Director General before the Appropriations Committee he stated that there was hardly any probability, in his opinion, that they would be turned over before next fall, if then. He ought to be in position to know something about it.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I am through, other than to say that I hope the House will do the sensible thing and vote down both of these amendments, and not do the revolutionary thing of adopting some plan here that no one knows whether it is the right or wrong plan.

Mr. SUMNERS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to attaching to the bill under consideration either of the amendments offered. Let us see how these amendments present themselves to the average Member of the House now called upon to act with regard to them under the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN]. If there is no extra session, the railroads go back under private control without any further legislation, which no one seems to favor. If there is an extra session of Congress it can deal deliberately and understandingly with the conditions under which the railroads may go back under private control, and at the same time with at least some knowledge of what it is doing, can fix the time when private control shall begin.

In so far as the position of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] is concerned, if I understood its provisions, he would now commit the House to the proposition that, notwithstanding the fact that we may later determine that the railroads should go back under private control prior to July 1, 1920, what is done to-day by adopting his amendment would have to be undone in order that that thing could happen. I have no doubt that my distinguished colleague from Texas, a member of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, and who has given a great deal of thought to the various phases of the railroad question, is now prepared to act upon a judgment made up from facts known to himself; but the Members of the House not members of that committee this minute do not even have the advantage of following a committee that has investigated the question and reported upon its investigation. Ordinarily, when a committee—one of the great committees, like the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce—that has had these particular matters under consideration comes in and makes its recommendation to the House in the form of proposed legislation, those of us who have not had the same opportunities for exhaustive investigation that the members of these committees have had yield largely to the judgment of the committee. That is done every day.

But we have here no proposition presented with the indorsement of a committee. On the contrary, we have before us two distinct amendments offered by two members of the same committee, and with regard to both of which the only other member of the committee whom I have heard speak is in opposition. And this is no ordinary amendment either which is submitted to us under five-minute discussions. Without explanation as to the benefit of what the proponents of these amendments may know, without any advance knowledge that the amendments would be offered, with no two members of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee in expressed agreement, we are asked this minute to say when the railroads shall go back under private control. I submit that there are not a dozen Members sitting here to-day who could face their constituencies and say that when they cast their votes on that question, if they voted for either amendment, they had an independent judgment upon the subject voted upon.

I regret very much to oppose these amendments, but I can not see any common sense in fixing the date now. As I said before——

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS. In a minute. If we do not have an extra session everybody knows that the railroads under the amendment of my colleague from Texas go back under private control without any legislation, and nobody wants that, and if we have an extra session, the extra session, dealing with the question of the conditions under which the railroads go back under private control, can deal with the questions now submitted to us, and we can do it with deliberation and more understandingly than is now possible. This is too important a matter and the responsibility is too great to be dealt with in this sort of a way. Think of a Congress disposing of this far-reaching, stupendous question within less than an hour's deliberation, divided into five-minute discussions, and that, too, when the date fixed for the going into effect of what it is proposed to have us do is almost a year in the future.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS. In a moment. Now, in regard to the amendment offered by the other distinguished member of the committee, Mr. ESCH, we know that if in the judgment of the Members of Congress later on, based upon facts, we conclude that these railroads ought to go back under private control in July, 1920, we can say so between now and that time by proper legislation, based upon a knowledge of the facts. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I appeal to the sober judgment of the House and not to its predilections. I insist that on a matter that is fraught with such consequences to the people of America as this matter is we owe it to ourselves in our responsible positions to vote judgment and not predilections, and there is not a man here who is prepared to say that we have that information as a body, as a whole body, that would warrant us in now voting for either of the proposals that have been offered by the gentleman from Texas or the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Now, there is one thing that this House is practically agreed upon, judging by the speeches made here to-day. They are practically agreed upon the necessity of appropriating additional money for the purposes indicated. They are not agreed as to when we shall give the roads back, if we give them back, or as to the terms under which we give them back, if we give them back, or how long we will make the experiment to see if we shall ever give them back or not.

It seems to me to stamp all of us as men who trifle with matters of great moment to ask us, without any report of a committee, without consideration of the merits, to vote upon these two propositions. I have my own opinion as to what ought to be done in connection with the railroads, but it is an opinion that I hope is subject to change upon greater information. I assume that my position is pretty nearly that of every man here. You may have a predilection one way or the other, but you do not accomplish anything voting it now. About the only effect I can see of adopting either amendment here is to make impossible this legislation that all of us agree ought to be passed in regard to the appropriation. [Applause.] If you want to deny any relief in the way of an appropriation, and do not want to be bold enough to oppose the appropriation as such, a good way to do it is to put on matters in these closing hours of the session that are sure to prevent the final action of Congress upon the bill that is presented. I have been fair and frank with the House. I brought the bill here without undertaking by special rules to tie it up, believing that the judgment of the House would be sufficient to hold it to a consideration of a matter that was pressing and not to have it go off on other matters. I beg of the House that they may realize the seriousness of the amendments that are proposed, and that we do not let our predilections rather than our mature judgments determine us. There are conditions that are always stronger than the views of men. Those conditions control sensible, thinking men. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] proposes a negative, back-handed arrangement that the railroads shall not be turned back before July of next year unless there is remedial legislation in the meantime. I am not prepared to say that conditions may not arise under which they ought not to be turned back whether there is legislation or not.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. In view of the President's frank statement to the House about the uncertainty and the desire for legislation, does the gentleman think it would do any harm to postpone the return of the railroads, within the 21 months, until Congress has an opportunity to legislate?

Mr. SHERLEY. By that you simply invite the postponement of such legislation to a very much later period than possibly would otherwise happen. Now, I think it is perfectly manifest—I have no right to speak on behalf of the administration or the President, but I have a right to look facts in the face—that it is absolutely necessary for many reasons that Congress shall be in session long before next December. There are many conditions that will require it. Why we should attempt now to put legislation upon a bill that will have no other effect than to kill it passes my understanding. I can only repeat in conclusion that I appeal to the judgment of men and not to their predilections and their prejudices. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ESCH) there were—ayes 73, noes 91.

Accordingly the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the original amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RAYBURN) there were—ayes 51, noes 103.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BLACK. I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK: Page 1, line 9, at the beginning of line 9 strike out the figures "$750,000,000" and insert the figures "$381,000,000."

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I want to state briefly the reasons why I think the amendment which I have offered should be adopted. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] said we ought not to vote in matters of this kind because of our predilections. I want to assure the gentleman from Kentucky that, speaking for myself, I approach these matters not from the standpoint of a predilection merely but from a definite conviction. In a study of the hearings we find that $381,000,000 added to the revolving fund of $500,000,000 provided in the act of March 21, 1918, will take care of all the Government contracts and obligations for the year 1918, and will leave a working capital of $247,000,000 in the hands of the United States Railroad Administration for use in 1919. The several items from which we arrive at the above result are $247,000,000 as a working capital; $290,900,000 that has been advanced in the way of loans for additions and betterments, including equipment; $51,400,000 loaned to the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad; $92,000,000 net current assets; $196,000,000 deficit for operation in 1918; and $4,361,000 expended in connection with inland waterways. These items make a total of $881,000,000, and therefore, after deducting all of the present revolving fund of $500,000,000, we will have to appropriate $381,000,000 if we take care of the obligations of 1918 and leave a working capital of $247,000,000 in the hands of the United States Railroad Administration for use during the current year. Mr. Walker D. Hines, Director General of the Railroads, stated in the hearings—and in this connection I invite you to read page 11 of them—that the working capital of 1918 was $247,000,000, and that he desired to continue that much for 1919. It is after a careful reading of Mr. Hines's testimony before the committee that I have offered my amendment to reduce the amount of the appropriation carried in the pending bill from $750,000,000 to $381,000,000. That amount, as I have shown, will be sufficient to take care of everything except contemplated loans to railroad companies for 1919.

That leads me to say that $369,000,000 of the $750,000,000 is for loans to be made in 1919 to the railroad companies. Now, if the House had adopted either the Esch amendment or the Rayburn amendment, upon which we have just voted, and had made the time of the termination of Government control definite and certain, so that we could know what demands are to be made, I would feel very much more disposed to vote for the full amount carried in this bill, but I am not going to record myself in favor of a policy of continuing to expend these enormous sums of money in taking care of deficits and in the way of making loans to these railroad companies, and especially so unless a definite time is fixed. There must be an end to it some time, and so far as I am concerned I will begin now. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman by his own statement puts himself out of court. The gentleman ignores the fact that, out of the money intended for 1919, $268,000,000 represents what the Government owes on equipment, that the Government has already ordered, and stands to-day obligated to pay for, and must pay for or repudiate its obligations. This answers that statement. There is the further fact that there is $20,000,000 involved in a loan to the Boston & Maine, that is already and practically a closed incident. I repeat that the gentleman by his own statement puts himself out of court. Practically all the moneys that are intended for 1919 are moneys that the Government stands committed for and must be provided for if we are to keep the obligations we have made.

Mr. BLACK. Is it not true that in the hearings Mr. Hines stated that the total estimates of expenditures of this item was $809,000,000, but the Government thought that they could get the railroads to take care of this $809,000,000 in the way of financing their own and that $369,000,000 would be sufficient for the Government?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not so understand the testimony. I think the gentleman is mistaken. I repeat that there are standing obligations for equipment ordered in 1918, to be delivered in 1919, to the extent of $286,000,000; and, aside from that, unless we are to hamper the roads unduly, we must give the necessary aid that I have mentioned. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky moves that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto be now closed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 16020, and had directed him to report the same back with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to its final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn. That will carry the roll call over until morning.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SHERLEY) there were—ayes 102, noes 61.

So the motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 46 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, February 21, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 21, 1919.

Chaplain Daniel Couve, Fifty-ninth Division Infantry, French Army, offered the following prayer:

O God, our heavenly Father, we thank Thee for all the mercies Thou hast bestowed upon us. We thank Thee for the victory Thou hast given to our allied armies, and we pray Thee that Thou makest us worthy of Thy mercies. O God, our Father, do guide all of us on the way of justice, and give us to be as faithful and obedient in the works of peace as our soldiers have been brave in the days of war. Do guide all those who have charge of the establishment of a permanent peace. Do inspire the President of the United States; do protect the premier of France; and do help all of us to play faithfully our part in the coming of Thy kingdom of righteousness. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. PITTMAN and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

SENATOR FROM OREGON.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I present the credentials of my colleague [Mr. MCNARY] and ask that they be read:

The credentials were read and ordered to be filed, as follows:

Certificate of election.

STATE OF OREGON,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.

To all to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

Know ye, that it appearing from the official canvass of the vote cast at the general election held within and for the State of Oregon on Tuesday, the 5th day of November, A. D. 1918, that CHARLES L. PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate resolutions adopted by the District of Columbia Commandery of the Military Order of the Loyal Legion of the United States, which will be inserted in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The resolutions are as follows:

MILITARY ORDER OF THE LOYAL LEGION OF THE UNITED STATES, COMMANDERY OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

At the annual banquet of February 12, 1919, the following preamble and resolutions were presented by Col. Archibald Hopkins, United States Volunteers, unanimously adopted and approved by Senator GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN, of Oregon, and Senator HARRY S. NEW, of Indiana, in their speeches delivered by them on that occasion:

"Whereas the red flag is everywhere recognized as the emblem of anarchy and is an incitement to riot and bloodshed wherever displayed, and is loathsome and abhorrent to every patriotic American: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the District of Columbia Commandery of the Military Order of the Loyal Legion of the United States, assembled to do honor to the memory of Abraham Lincoln, That we earnestly request Congress as an effective antidote to the epidemic of Bolshevistic and I. W. W. propaganda, sweeping over the country, to pass immediately the bill now pending to declare unlawful and to punish the display of the red flag within the jurisdiction of the United States.

"THOMAS H. MCKEE, Recorder."

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, yesterday I presented a statement signed by several farmers in one of our South Dakota counties relative to the guaranteed price of wheat for the year 1919. I have now several other papers of the same nature and in the same language. The statement yesterday was printed in the RECORD. I simply send these to the desk and move that they be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry without being printed in the RECORD.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a joint resolution from the General Assembly of the State of Illinois in relation to the reconstruction program. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The memorial is as follows:

Certificate No. 3462.

STATE OF ILLINOIS,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

To all to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

I, Louis L. Emmerson, secretary of state of the State of Illinois, do hereby certify that the following and hereto attached is a true copy of senate joint resolution 14 of the Fifty-first General Assembly of the State of Illinois, the original of which is now on file and a matter of record in this office.

In testimony whereof I hereto set my hand and cause to be affixed the great seal of the State of Illinois. Done at the city of Springfield this 18th day of February, A. D. 1919.

[SEAL.]

LOUIS L. EMMERSON,
Secretary of State.

Senate joint resolution 14.

Whereas many public improvements for which there is an imperative need have been postponed on account of the existence of a state of war between the United States of America and the Imperial German Government; and

Whereas the necessity for the resumption of the construction of public works is fully recognized and is being urged upon all people in authority representing the various political units and subdivisions of the United States; and

Whereas one of the greatest problems confronting the State and the Nation at the present time is the furnishing of immediate employment to a large amount of idle labor released from other activities by the victorious termination of the war; and

Whereas the embarking upon the construction of the much-needed public improvements will furnish immediate and profitable employment to idle labor; and

Whereas the increase in freight rates on the heavy materials, entering largely into the construction of public works, which went into effect on June 25, 1918, was approximately 100 per cent greater than the increase on other commodities; and

Whereas, in the judgment of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois, freight rates on materials designed for use in the construction of public works are excessive and tend unmistakably to discourage the resumption of the construction of such enterprises, thus defeating the effort to give employment to idle labor: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Illinois (the House of Representatives concurring therein), That the President of the United States, the Congress of the United States, and the United States Railroad Administration be, and they hereby are, memorialized and respectfully but most urgently requested to take such action as will bring about a reduction in the freight tariffs governing the shipment of the materials entering largely into the construction of public works, said reduction to be not less than the advance which went into effect June 25, 1918, and to be effective at an early date; and

That upon the passage of this resolution certified copies thereof be forthwith forwarded by the secretary of state of Illinois to the President of the United States, the presiding officers of both Houses of Congress and Members from Illinois of both branches of the Congress of the United States, and the Director General of Railroads.

Adopted by the senate February 12, 1919.

ADAM C. CLIFFE,
President pro tempore of the Senate.

J. H. PADDOCK,
Secretary of the Senate.

Concurred in by the house of representatives February 13, 1919.

DAVID E. SHANAHAN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

B. H. MCCANN,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Filed February 18, 1919.

LOUIS L. EMMERSON,
Secretary of State.

Mr. POMERENE. I have a communication here in the nature of a petition signed by Mr. Fred Brocker, recording secretary of Lodge No. 584, International Association of Machinists, of Cleveland, Ohio. It contains a large number of signatures. It prays for national ownership and Government operation of all the railroads within the territory of the United States and its possessions necessary for furnishing transportation to the people of the United States, including all lands, terminals, and equipment required or desirable for successful operation. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to introduce and have read a communication from the Selective Service Local Board for the County of Saginaw, Mich., and to have it referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The communication was read and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, as follows:

SELECTIVE SERVICE LOCAL BOARD FOR COUNTY OF SAGINAW.
Saginaw, Mich., February 13, 1919.

Hon. CHARLES E. TOWNSEND,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: It is the feeling of this board that a law be enacted deporting such registrants who claimed exemption from serving in the United States Army on the ground that they were not citizens of the United States, who answered "yes" to question No. 6 of series No. 7 of the questionnaire, which made them enemy aliens in Class 5–E.

We would respectfully ask this, since we have known registrants to laugh and say they would not have to go, but would get good jobs in places where boys had left for service, offering their lives to their country.

Respectfully,

C. C. SPEER, Chairman.
W. H. MCEWEN, Physician.
H. L. BAUER, Secretary.

Mr. LODGE presented a petition of the congregation of the Central Congregational Church, of Chelsea, Mass., and a petition of the Woman's Club of Lawrence, Mass., praying for the establishment of a league of nations, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HARDING. I present a communication from the delegates of the Hocking Valley Railroad System of Ohio, relative to the operation of the railroads of the country, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The communication is as follows:

RAILWAY EMPLOYEES' DEPARTMENT OF THE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR,
HOCKING VALLEY RAILROAD FEDERATED
TRADES ASSOCIATION, SYSTEM NO. 51,
Columbus, Ohio, February 17, 1919.

Hon. WARREN G. HARDING,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We, the undersigned delegates assembled, representing machinists, boilermakers, blacksmiths, sheet-metal workers, electrical workers, carmen, apprentices, and helpers of the Hocking Valley Railroad System, respectfully urge upon you, and through you to the Congress of the United States, to have enacted into law a bill identical with Mr. McAdoo's theory, providing for five years of Uncle Sam's operation of all railroads within the territory of the United States and its possessions, necessary for the furnishing of transportation to the people of the United States, including all lands, terminals, and equipment required or desirable for successful operation; and that you will cause this petition to be noted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and referred to an appropriate committee.

Respectfully submitted.

[SEAL.]

G. A. STEPHENSON
(And others).

Mr. HARDING presented a memorial of the City Council of Canton, Ohio, remonstrating against the reenactment of the daylight-saving law, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of Local Union No. 98, International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, of Cincinnati, Ohio, remonstrating against the proposed restriction on immigration, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. MOSES presented a petition of the Board of Trade of East Jaffrey, N. H., praying for the establishment of a league of nations, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the New Hampshire State Federation of Labor, favoring the continuance of the United States Employment Service, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. MYERS presented a petition of sundry citizens of Sioux Pass, Mont., praying for the enactment of legislation guaranteeing the minimum price of $2.20 for the 1919 wheat crop, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. CURTIS presented a petition of sundry citizens of Russell, Kans., praying for the deportation of those aliens who, in order to escape military service, dropped their first citizenship papers, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of sundry citizens of Fairfield, Me., praying for Government ownership of railroads, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Auburn, Me., praying for the establishment of a department of education, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. KNOX presented petitions of the Boards of Trade of Williamsport, Waynesboro, New Kensington, Perkasie, and Langhorne; of the Rotary Clubs of Philadelphia, Greensburg, and Washington; of the Business Men's Associations of Millheim, Johnsonburg, Germantown, Royersford, and Pottstown; of the Chambers of Commerce of Wellsboro and Huntingdon; of the Association of Retail Druggists of Philadelphia; of the Merchants' Association of Williamsport; of the Commercial Club of Grove City; and of the Elk County Manufacturers' Association of Ridgway, all in the State of Pennsylvania, praying that the return to private ownership of telephone and telegraph lines be deferred until Congress shall have studied the question and determined upon a proper and safe procedure to be thereafter followed, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the return to private ownership of the railroads of the country, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of Keystone Lodge, No. 590, Brotherhood of Railway Clerks, of Pittsburgh, Pa., praying for the proposed extension of Federal control of railroads, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented petitions of Mountain City Lodge, No. 545, International Brotherhood of Boiler Makers; Iron Ship Builders and Helpers of America, of Renovo; and of sundry citizens of Philadelphia, Tamaqua, and Easton, all in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for Government ownership of railroads, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of Washington Camp, No. 797, Patriotic Order Sons of America, of Oxford, Pa., praying for the proposed restriction of immigration, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Congregation of the Reform Congregation Anshe Chesed, of Erie, Pa., favoring the establishment of a league of nations, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. LEWIS presented a resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Illinois, favoring a reduction in freight rates on shipments of material entering largely into the construction of public works, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

EDUCATION OF ILLITERATES.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, there is pending a bill, Senate 5464, known as the Americanization bill. I have received several letters from and resolutions passed by organizations in different parts of the country that I wanted to present during the morning hour, but I was unable to be present, and I ask leave to have them printed in the RECORD. They will take the place of a speech on the subject. Of course, I could read them. They are brief arguments in favor of the measure. I expect to call up the measure in a day or two for consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. What is the measure?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Americanization bill, the bill prepared in connection with the Interior Department for the purpose of teaching English to all who can not speak English.

Mr. SMOOT. The illiteracy bill?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The illiteracy bill. It is called the Americanization bill now by its friends. I ask leave to have these resolutions and letters printed in the RECORD instead of reading them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

BOSTON, February 17, 1919.

Hon. HOKE SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: On behalf of the Massachusetts Bureau of Immigration, I desire to ask your favorable consideration of Senate bill 5464, the Smith-Bankhead Americanization bill.

The necessity for Federal cooperation in removing the menace of illiteracy on the one hand and, on the other, lack of knowledge of our common language by foreign-born non-English-speaking persons was never greater than at present. The line of cleavage between the literate English speaking and the illiterate and non-English speaking in our great industrial centers was never so clearly defined as now.

It is by no means a mere question of industrial security or of industrial prosperity; it is one of political and social security, which is seriously menaced by the existing conditions. The sum called for in this bill is of little consequence as compared with the results which will follow an organized nation-wide attack upon this problem. The removal of the menace of illiteracy will pay what it costs an almost infinite number of times.

Should there be any hearings in connection with this bill the bureau would be very glad, if desired, to appear before the Committee on Education and Labor in advocacy of it.

Trusting that you will do everything possible to further the progress of this bill, I remain,

Very truly, yours,

BERNARD J. ROTHWELL,
Chairman Massachusetts Bureau of Immigration.

NEW YORK CITY, February 13, 1919.

Hon. HOKE SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I desire to express to you my conviction that passage of Senate bill 5464, the Smith Americanization bill, would be a constructive action of the first importance.

My deep interest in our great non-English-speaking groups, both as members of the community and as members of the Army, has led me to the certainty that the absence of such educational provision as that contemplated in the bill has led to results deplorable, from the point of view of human well-being, of social stability, and of citizenship, and that the initiation of the Smith-Bankhead plan would do much to avert threatening dangers and to build a more worthy and more loyal body of American citizens.

Very sincerely, yours,

ERNEST H. WILKINS,
Vice President of the Modern Language Association of America.

LOCKPORT, N. Y., February 17, 1919.

Mr. HOKE SMITH,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR SMITH: The directors of the Lockport Board of Commerce indorse the Smith-Bankhead Americanization bill. We believe that now is the time to push vigorously the Americanization movement.

Very truly, yours,

DIRECTORS OF LOCKPORT BOARD OF COMMERCE,
By RAYMOND B. GIBBS, Secretary.

SECTION ON ALIENS,
COUNCIL OF ORGANIZATIONS FOR WAR SERVICE,
New York City, February 15, 1919.

Senator HOKE SMITH,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SMITH: Inclosed is a copy of a resolution concerning the Smith-Bankhead bill (S. 5464; H. R. 15402) unanimously passed at a meeting of the Section on Aliens, which represents several hundred men's and women's organizations in New York City actively interested in Americanization.

Very truly, yours, ESTHER E. LAPE.

"Whereas the lack of a definite national policy for educating the adult foreign born in the English language and in understanding American institutions and ideals, and the lack of funds for this purpose in the various States and communities have been among the greatest obstacles to Americanization; and

"Whereas the Smith-Bankhead bill now before Congress (S. 5464; H. R. 15402) recognizes the need of a national policy for Americanization and definitely establishes that policy, first, by fixing responsibility in the Department of the Interior; and, secondly, by providing Federal aid to the States for the education of the foreign born: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That this meeting, constituted of the representatives of organizations named below, comprising the Section on Aliens, Council of Organizations of New York City, hereby indorses the Smith-Bankhead bill and urges its immediate passage; and

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to each member of the Education Committee of both Houses of Congress."

PENNSYLVANIA COUNCIL OF NATIONAL DEFENSE, AND COMMITTEE OF PUBLIC SAFETY,
Pittsburgh, Pa., February 13, 1919.

Hon. HOKE SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington.

MY DEAR SIR: I respectfully request your influence and support for Senate bill 5464, which provides for the education of native illiterates. From what I know of the situation of Pennsylvania, and especially of Allegheny County, the people are in accord with the provisions of this bill.

In Allegheny County alone we have over 50,000 persons who can not speak the English language. The Council of National Defense for Allegheny County organized an Americanization committee, had started classes in English in many of the mills, factories, and mines, as well as among the fraternity societies of the foreigners.

A class for teachers for these illiterates was organized at the University of Pittsburgh, and as result of the stimulus of the war, a great deal of progress was made along the lines of Americanization in this county. Since the war closed, however, and the Council of National Defense of Pennsylvania has been practically disbanded, no further progress has been made along this line of work in this county.

I believe I can speak for the Council of National Defense for Allegheny County, which was one of the most representative and active councils in the State, comprising a membership of over 15,000 men and women connected with the various community councils, and voice their opinion that Senate bill 5464 provides the solution to this great problem, and I trust the bill will speedily pass both branches of Congress.

We are vitally interested in this question in this great industrial center, where we have 26 nationalities and all the complex problems connected with the employment and education of our foreign-born citizens. We can not urge too forcibly the passage of this bill.

Very truly, yours,

WM. H. STEVENSON,
Chairman Allegheny County Division.

ELIZABETH, N. J., February 17, 1919.

Whereas the board of trustees of the chamber of commerce believe that extraordinary efforts should be made at this time for the education of illiterates and the Americanization of our foreign-born residents; and

Whereas it is believed that the Smith-Bankhead bills recently introduced in Congress will enable the States to start this important work, assisted by the Federal Government: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the board of trustees of the chamber of commerce communicate with its representatives in the Senate and House and with the members of the Senate and House Educational Committees, urging an early consideration and passage of this bill.

MINNESOTA COMMISSION OF PUBLIC SAFETY,
Slayton, Minn., February 15, 1919.

Hon. HOKE SMITH,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Permit me to write you concerning Senate file No. 5464, I believe this to be an excellent bill, and should become a law. I have talked with several concerning this bill, and all have agreed that it is a most meritorious one, and I trust you will feel that the country is backing you up, and that you will use every effort to see that it becomes a law.

Sincerely, yours,

BURT I. WELD,
Murray County Director.

HARLAN, KY., February 15, 1919.

Hon. HOKE SMITH,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have just read S. 5464, which you introduced in the Senate. I most heartily approve the bill and am writing to express the hope that it may become a law.

I have worked in the mountains of Kentucky for many years and have come to the conclusion that the only satisfactory and sure way to cope with the problem of adult illiteracy is by definite appropriation of funds for that specific purpose. The problem will never be solved by voluntary, unremunerated service. There must be definite, purposeful organization, backed by an adequate financial support.

Yours, truly,

F. D. PERKINS.

AMERICAN MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION,
San Francisco, Cal., February 15, 1919.

Hon. HOKE SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Smith-Bankhead Americanization bill (S. 5464; H. R. 15402) appears to provide a long-needed help and stimulus to States which have been unable or unwilling to provide adequate educational opportunities for native illiterate residents and foreigners living within the bounds of the States, alien both in speech and spirit.

The serious situation created by such alien and illiterate groups is becoming increasingly apparent to all. A homogenous American civilization is impossible as long as such segregated groups exists, and without a homogenous civilization, "100 per cent American," we shall be unable to meet our great responsibilities in the New World now before us since the war.

I feel that the bill should be urgently pressed to speedy passage, and that action under section 10 should be undertaken promptly to awaken interest and secure in the various State legislatures the necessary action by which the appropriation may be made available in each State. States where this help from the Federal Government is most needed may fail to qualify for a share in the fund unless their legislators are stirred to action by a vigorous publicity campaign under the Bureau of Education.

You will, I believe, greatly aid the cause of Americanism, now being tested before the world, in giving this bill your earnest and enthusiastic support.

Faithfully, yours,

GEO. W. HINMAN.

NASHVILLE, TENN., February 15, 1919.

Senator HOKE SMITH,
Committee on Education and Labor, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have read the article on the illiterates and non-English-speaking people of the United States, and I know how much such a bill is needed.

I taught English to Italians last year and have become well acquainted with Mexicans, Porto Ricans, and New Mexican Indians since October, as I interpreted Spanish at the Du Pont plant here.

I am so much interested in the work that I have talked to other people about it, and I feel sure that the Nashville people and every other good American will be for that bill when they realize what it means.

I want to do my share to get the bill through, so if I can be of service in any way, please let me know.

Sincerely,

TRILLIS E. WESSELER.

NEWTON, MASS., February 19, 1919.

Senator HOKE SMITH,
Chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I am profoundly interested in the bill now before your committee providing for teaching illiterates and persons unable to speak, read, or write the English language—Senate bill No. 5464 and House bill No. 15402.

The fact that you yourself introduced this bill into the Senate is proof that you are convinced of its great importance. I doubt if anything of more vital import has been, or will be, considered by your honorable body. We have had occasion within the past few years to realize the importance of becoming a unified Nation, and nothing will so hasten that end as a common language, both spoken and read by the masses of our citizens.

The bill seems to me to be especially wise in its provisions for cooperation with the educational forces of the several States, and also in its division of financial help from the fund appropriated among the States in proportion to the number of their illiterates. I represent the department of Americanization in the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union and can pledge to you the hearty support and cooperation of the entire society should any occasion arise in which we can be of help.

I am writing to you as chairman of the committee, but my appeal is to the entire committee through you that it will honor itself and help to safeguard our Nation through the recommendation of this beneficent measure.

Thanking you for your interest in this matter, I am, with profound respect,

Very sincerely, yours,

KATHERINE LENT STEVENSON,
Superintendent of Americanization in National Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

[Bulletin No. 31, National Woman's Christian Temperance Union.]

SUGGESTED OUTLINE PLAN FOR AMERICANIZATION WORK.

(Katherine Lent Stevenson, advisory member of the committee on patriotic service and superintendent of the department of Americanization.)

The purpose and scope of Americanization work for 1919 are set forth in Bulletin No. 25, issued by the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union committee on patriotic service, and all plans of National, State, or local superintendents should be in harmony with and subsidiary to the general plans of this joint committee.

It is with the thought of enlarging and elucidating plans already given that this suggested outline is presented.

I. EDUCATE.

Who? The foreigner? Yes; as a later step in the development of the work, but first of all we need to educate ourselves as to the imperative need of national unification.

Do we know (a) that 32,000,000, or 35 per cent of our entire population are of foreign-born parentage; (b) that 13,000,000 of these are foreign born and that of this number 3,000,000 adults do not speak the English language or understand it in even its most rudimentary form?

Do we know the menace this alien illiterate population affords to its own safety and well being, to the welfare and development of its children, and to the efficiency and perpetuity of American institutions? It was from the illiterate foreigners, or from those who could not speak the English language, that Germany in the main selected its tools for the wrecking of munition plants and other acts of violence during the war. It is the future vote of these men and women, not trained to our ideals and ignorant of the real purpose of our laws, which will endanger prohibition and other moral measures which, at infinite toil and sacrifice have been won by the American people.

Do you know how much of real grievance many of these people have who come to us from other shores? Have we studied the housing conditions surrounding many of our great factories? Have we pictured ourselves in a strange land, surrounded by strange faces and strange customs, expecting to find fabulous wealth and find oftentimes instead direst poverty?

On the other hand, ignorance of the English language no more presupposes necessary ignorance on their part than ignorance of Italian or Russian would on our part if we found ourselves set down in Italy or in Russia. Do we know that many of these people represent a culture older than our own and do we know anything of the many contributions which they have brought and are capable now, if wisely directed, of bringing to our American life? Unquestionably the first step in the solving of the Americanization problem is to EDUCATE OURSELVES.

How are we to do this? In the only possible way education can be secured on any subject—by study and by experience: Experience at first hand with the foreign man or woman; study of the writings of those who have had this experience. Any one of the following books suggested by the joint committee on foreign-born women, women in industry, and by the Council of National Defense will prove a great help: "The Immigrant and the Community," Grace Abbott; "Our Slavic Neighbors, Emily Balch; "From Alien to Citizen," "On the Trail of the Immigrant," "The Immigrant Tide," Edward Steiner; "The Promised Land," Mary Antin; "Democracy and Social Ethics," "Twenty Years at Hull House," Jane Addams; "The Making of an American," Jacob Riis; "The House on Henry Street," Lillian Wald; the Czecho-Slovak publications of the Bohemian National Alliance of America, 3639 West Twenty-sixth Street, Chicago; and the publications of the department of foreign-born women, National Young Woman's Christian Association, 600 Lexington Avenue, New York. It is hoped that later extracts from these and other publications may be formed into a brief study course in this service.

II. COOPERATE.

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union is only one of many agencies undertaking this work to-day. A realization of its importance came to us earlier than to most others, since our work among foreign-speaking people was one of our first departments, but other societies, with more money and with larger opportunities for service have seen its imperative necessity and are now in the field. These are chiefly the great Government committees organized since America entered the war, the State boards of education, the Young Men's and Young Women's Christian Associations, the general and State federations of women's clubs, the suffrage associations, and others too numerous to mention. The chief thought of all these centers upon a united America and work to secure the naturalization and education in the English language of these alien citizens is being done by all.

The local Woman's Christian Temperance Unions should find what is being done by any of these or other agencies in their own communities and then to the utmost possible degree endeavor to cooperate. It would be a sheer waste of time and effort, for example, to start a night school for the teaching of English if one had already been started. In that case we should offer our services and take hold to teach or to bring pupils to the school. The same rule applies to any form of work among foreign-speaking people. It is the united effort of all, rather than the scattered efforts of many, which must bring results.

III. COORDINATE.

We cooperate with agencies outside our own organization. We coordinate when we bring to bear upon a common end the several agencies already within our grasp. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union has many methods and departments which may be brought to bear upon the work of Americanization.

First, there is our work among children in (a) the L. T. L.; (b) the Sunday school; (c) the public school, though our work here must necessarily be limited and done with great tact and care. To the white-ribbon woman who is a teacher the opportunities are without limit.

Second, the mothers' meeting is capable of being used to immense advantage in the Americanization problem. If each local union would hold one mothers' meeting in the home of some foreign-born woman, asking her to invite in her neighbors and making sure that there be a competent interpreter when English is not spoken, we would make a great stride in advance in the work of bringing into sympathetic unity with ourselves these women of other lands. The simplest subjects should be discussed, as (a) food and care of the child; (b) our favorite recipes; (c) fresh air; (d) schools in America and other lands; (e) why we do not give our children wine or beer; (f) why we believe the cigarette is bad for children. Countless subjects will open up, and the laws concerning prohibition will easily come in for their share of discussion. Then invite these same women to one of the American homes. Social meetings and red-letters days could be made use of in much the same way, while flower mission and relief, soldiers and sailors, child welfare, women in industry, moral education, and medical temperance all have immense possibilities for coordinate work in this department. At a later stage the medal contest could be used to great advantage.

IV. INITIATE.

It is not enough to help work already established. If the Woman's Christian Temperance Union has not a distinct contribution of its own for this great work, then its past has been in vain. What is its distinct contribution? To make those who come to our shores not only Americans, but Americans with highest ideals, Americans who shall understand that righteousness alone can exalt a nation and that "sin is a reproach to any people." We shall have failed in our distinctive work if we do not create a strong sentiment for total abstinence and for prohibition in the minds and hearts of those with whom we work. This can not be done by preaching to them; preaching to them will too often prevent that end. The "Be a neighbor" campaign must underlie all other work.

Suggestive plan for local unions:

(a) Canvass your town or district to learn how many foreign homes and foreign women are at your doors.

(b) Establish friendly relations by personal calls and little acts of neighborly kindness.

(c) Teach them English and any other thing concerning our common life which they will consent to be taught.

(d) Ask them to teach you something of their language and of the customs of their country. If possible, learn from them some cooking recipe or other household benefit. Show yourself appreciative of what they bring to us, even as we expect them to be appreciative of what we give to them.

(e) If they are themselves educated, learn something from them of the art, literature, and life of their several lands. Music should be an open sesame to Italian hearts. Just watch for once the men and women apparently of the poorer classes who at opera or symphony concert follow the most intricate score of classical music, if you would know how much they may teach us here.

(f) Having thus shown ourselves in sympathy with their past, we may go on to teach them of America's past and present and of the future, which they with us are to make. Here we may teach them of total abstinence, prohibition, the ballot for women, personal and civic purity. Individual neighborliness will become the basis for lessons in civic neighborliness and helpfulness, till they shall come to understand that our laws are not imposed upon them for the purpose of curtailing freedom, but that they are really means to the great end of larger, truer freedom for all.

(g) We must realize in our own hearts the great truth that "God did indeed make of one flesh all nations that dwell upon the earth; that each has its own individual contribution to the truest welfare of all; that in this 'melting pot of the world,' which God Himself called into being, all are needed by each and each by all; that 'the glory of the Lord,' which is always and only the highest good of man, can never be fully 'revealed' until 'all flesh shall see it together.'"

"Together" is our Americanization watchword, and its supreme aim is nothing less than to "establish * * * in every city of these States, inland and seaboard, and in the field and woods, the institution of the dear love of comrades, the attraction of friend to friend, of city for city, and land for land."

Hon. HOKE SMITH,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Upon the unanimous vote of the board of directors, I am writing to urge you to use your influence in the passage of the Smith-Bankhead Americanization bill. We have gone into the matter thoroughly and are in hearty accord with the purposes of the proposed legislation.

Very truly, yours, M. L. TOULME, Secretary.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., February 17, 1919.

Hon. HOKE SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am pleased to inclose herewith a letter I have received from the superintendent of public instruction of the State of Oklahoma, which relates to a bill you have introduced.

I am very glad that the public instructors throughout the country are indorsing the legislation prepared by you, and if I can be of any service to you in this connection it will be a pleasure to be called on.

With great respect, I am,
Sincerely, yours,
JIM MCCLINTIC.

STATE OF OKLAHOMA,
DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC INSTRUCTION,
Oklahoma City, February 12, 1919.

Hon. JIM MCCLINTIC, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR AND FRIEND: I have just read a copy of Senate bill No. 5464, by SMITH of Georgia. I most heartily indorse this bill.

In Oklahoma we have more than 65,000 illiterates; 28,000 adult illiterate voters.

It is very hard to interest the children of parents who are not educated, but it is harder to interest the uneducated parents in sending their children to school.

I believe that we can take the money appropriated under this bill and wipe out the illiteracy of this State within the next 10 years.

I hope that you can and will see your way clear to give this measure your hearty support; and I ask that you see that this work is directed through the State department of education in order to avoid duplication, confusion, and, most of all, in order to use the organization now in effect.

Yours, sincerely, R. H. WILSON.

LINDEN, N. J., February 15, 1919.

Hon. Senator HOKE SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: The mayor and council of the Borough of Linden, N. J., at its regular meeting held Friday evening, February 14, 1919, passed unanimously the following resolution:

"Resolved, That we heartily approve and urge the immediate passage of the Smith-Bankhead Americanization bill—Senate bill 5464, House bill 15402—to promote the education of native illiterates, of persons unable to understand and use the English language, and of other resident persons of foreign birth, etc.; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be mailed, under the seal of the borough council, signed by the mayor and attested by the borough clerk, to each member of the Committee on Education and Labor of the United States Senate and each member of the Committee on Education of the House of Representatives at Washington, D. C."

H. B. HARDENBURG,
Mayor.
[SEAL.]
J. M. CAPRAUN,
Borough Clerk.

NEWBURGH, N. Y., February 15, 1919.

Hon. HOKE SMITH,
Senate Building, Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: The Smith-Bankhead Americanization bill, Senate bill 5464, House bill 15402, has been very carefully considered by our board of directors, and it was the consensus of opinion that the passing of such a bill would result in exceptional benefit to our country.

We are therefore respectfully requesting that in your consideration of this bill you also consider that the thinking business men throughout the country believe it will be to the country's advantage that the passage of this bill be assured.

Now is the time for making constructive rulings which will insure the future of our country from social unrest. May we not therefore urge upon you that you use your influence and assistance in securing the passage of this bill?

Respectfully, yours,
NEWBURGH CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
FRANK H. YOUNG, Managing Secretary.

ALLEN COUNTY COUNCIL OF DEFENSE,
Fort Wayne, Ind., February 14, 1919.

Hon. HOKE SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Allen County Council of Defense adopted a resolution February 13 indorsing Senate bill 5464, Mr. SMITH of Georgia, providing Government aid to States in the work of Americanizing Americans.

The council instructed the undersigned to advise you as a member of the Senate Committee on Education of that fact.

We are most sincerely in favor of giving Uncle Sam all the treatment needed for national dyspepsia, so that all who will may be assimilated and all who will not may be evacuated.

Very respectfully,
C. R. LANE, Secretary.

PITTSBORO, MISS., February 13, 1919.

Senator HOKE SMITH,
Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: To you as chairman of the Senate Committee on Education and Labor.

I wish to indorse Senate bill 5464, to promote the education of illiterates and people in the country not able to speak English, provided it is passed as introduced: Money to be used on salaries or training teachers, and no money to be used in the support of religious or private schools.

Respectfully, THOS. L. HAMAN.

NIAGARA FALLS CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Niagara Falls, N. Y., February 12, 1919.

Mr. HOKE SMITH,
Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SMITH: The Smith-Bankhead Americanization bill (S. 5464; H. R. 15902), which has come to our attention, represents to us the progressive interest which Congress is taking on one of the most vital problems of the Nation.

That this is a question for national action seems obvious. In the first place, it is the National Government which admits aliens to America. It is beyond the practical power of a city to exclude these aliens once they have been admitted to the country. Surely this national control of immigration implies a national responsibility for the conditions of life of the immigrant and for his relation to the communities to which he comes.

In other words, it is not enough that the Federal Government should control the character of immigration; the Nation should also assist in the assimilation of the immigrant in American life.

The bill to which we refer will evidently do more to fulfill the obligation than any other step we can suggest.

Very truly, yours,

FRED MASON, President.

OWENSBORO, KY., February 13, 1919.

Hon. HOKE SMITH, Senator,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Owensboro-Daviess County Industrial Club, by its board of directors, has gone on record as indorsing the Smith-Bankhead Americanization bill, S. 5464, and urgently requests the support of the Committee on Education and Labor to this highly important measure.

Very truly, yours,

OWENSBORO-DAVIESS COUNTY INDUSTRIAL CLUB,
C. J. KELLEM, Secretary.

THE CITY CLUB OF NEW YORK,
February 13, 1919.

Hon. HOKE SMITH,
Chairman Committee on Education and Labor,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: The City Club is interested in Senate bill 5464 (Smith), and we shall greatly appreciate your kindness if you will send us two copies.

Thanking you in advance,

Yours, very truly, WM. F. HOWES,
Executive Secretary.

NORTH CAROLINA GEOLOGICAL AND ECONOMIC SURVEY,
Chapel Hill, N. C., February 12, 1919.

Senator HOKE SMITH,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I understand that there is now up for consideration by the Congress a bill (S. 5464) to promote the education of illiterates, etc. I believe the necessity to prepare illiterates and foreign-born citizens for more successful living and a more intelligent American citizenship is a very vital one. In fact, the carrying out of some such process of education may avert a crisis in this country which we should strive in every way possible to forestall.

I sincerely hope that you will do whatever is necessary to have this bill given favorable consideration by this Congress.

With best wishes.

Yours, sincerely,

JOSEPH HYDE PRATT,
State Geologist.

WASHINGTON CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Washington, D. C., February 12, 1919.

Hon. HOKE SMITH,
Chairman Committee on Education and Labor,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: The Washington Chamber of Commerce, in its regular monthly meeting February 11, having under consideration Senate bill 5464 and House bill 15402, known as the Smith-Bankhead Americanization bill, unanimously indorsed the measure, and I am directed to forward this information to you.

Respectfully,

T. GRANT, Secretary.

LEBANON CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Lebanon, Pa., February 11, 1919.

Hon. HOKE SMITH,
Senator from Georgia, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Referring to Senate bill 5464, introduced in the Senate by yourself, under date of January 28, 1919, which bill is for the promotion of the education of native illiterates and other persons unable to understand and use the English language; also to provide for the cooperation of States in the education of such persons in the English language, the fundamental principles of government, the elements of knowledge for self-support and home making, and as well other such work, and making an appropriation for the carrying on of the same, would state that this organization desires to go on record as heartily indorsing such a movement on the part of Congress, believing that it is the only safe way in which we can build up a solid foundation for the future government of our Nation, and, as well, stabilize labor conditions.

The class of people to which this bill refers are at the present time more or less of a menace, in that they are unable to understand our governmental policies and as well the laws of supply and demand.

We believe that the passage of a bill of this kind by Congress will very materially stimulate the efforts of those who are at the present time concerned in the problems of Americanization, and we, therefore, urge the early passage of this bill.

Very truly, yours,

LEBANON CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
By E. J. FELLOW, Manager.

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Adrian, Mich., February 10, 1919.

Senator HOKE SMITH,
Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: This organization desires to be placed on record as indorsing the Smith-Bankhead Americanization bill, Senate bill 5464, and ask that you give it careful consideration.

Very truly, yours,

CARYL SPILLER, Secretary.

MASSACHUSETTS BOARD OF EDUCATION,
Boston, February 8, 1919.

Senator HOKE SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR SMITH: I have read with care Senate bill No. 5464, and wish to record my hearty indorsement of the measure.

I am writing Senators LODGE and WEEKS, asking their support.

Very truly, yours,

PAYSON SMITH,
Commissioner of Education.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Columbus, S. C., February 8, 1919.

Senator HOKE SMITH,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I request that you have mailed me a half dozen copies of your bill (S. 5464) relating to aid to States for education of illiterates, introduced the 28th ultimo. I desire to use them in an endeavor to get our State at its present meeting of the general assembly to put itself in a position to take advantage of the terms of the act proposed.

I would be glad to have a personal letter, if you please, stating your opinion as to the probability (and at what time) of the passage of your bill referred to and as to the expediency of an expression in its favor from this legislative body.

Yours, truly, R. A. MEARES.

[Resolutions adopted by Woman's Club of Redondo Beach, petitioning Congress to pass Senate bill 4987.]

Whereas it has been brought to the attention of the Woman's Club of Redondo Beach that Senate bill 4987 is now being considered by Congress, concerning the creation of a department of education, the appropriation of money for the conduct of said department, and for Federal cooperation with the States in the encouragement and support of education; and

Whereas said bill purposes Federal aid along certain most necessary lines, including immigrant education, the education of illiterates, the improvement of public, and particularly of rural, schools, and also for public-health education, the supplying and recompense of competent teachers, it seems important that this club should lend its support to secure the passage of this measure: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the Woman's Club of Redondo Beach, do hereby express approval of said bill and that we urge upon the Representatives and Senators of California to support this measure; and be it

Resolved further, That copies of this action of the club be forwarded to Senator HOKE SMITH, who introduced this measure in the Senate, and to each of the Senators and Representatives from California.

(Signed) Mrs. GEO. H. ANDERSON,
President.

Mrs. MARGARET J. FRICK,
Legislation Secretary.

COURT AT AMARILLO, TEX.

Mr. CULBERSON. From the Committee on the Judiciary I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 5627) to fix the time of holding court in the Amarillo division of the northern district of Texas, and I ask for its present consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. Let it be read.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter the terms of the district court of the United States in the Amarillo division of the northern district of Texas shall be held at Amarillo, Tex., on the third Monday in April and the second Monday in September of each year.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to ask the Senator from Texas if it is a unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. CULBERSON. It is.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT STEUBENVILLE, OHIO.

Mr. BECKHAM. From the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 3217) providing for an increase of authorization for the Federal building at Steubenville, in the State of Ohio. I call the attention of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] to the bill.

Mr. POMERENE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase or otherwise, such additional lands or rights contiguous to the building site now owned by the United States in Steubenville, in the State of Ohio, as may be necessary for the erection and completion on the lands thus owned and acquired of a suitable building, with fireproof vaults therein, for the use and accommodation of the United States court and post office, at an additional cost not to exceed $150,000, in addition to amounts heretofore authorized.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GIG HARBOR MILITARY RESERVATION, WASH.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The bill (H. R. 11219) providing for the appraisal and sale of the Gig Harbor abandoned military reservation in the State of Washington, and for other purposes, was inadvertently referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I ask that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That action will be taken.

BILL INTRODUCED.

By Mr. NELSON:

A bill (S. 5647) authorizing the county of Beltrami, Minn., to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

LANDING OF THE PILGRIMS.

Mr. LODGE. I introduce a joint resolution and ask that it be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 227) creating a commission to consider and arrange for the celebration of the three hundredth anniversary of the landing of the pilgrims at Plymouth, Mass., in conjunction with the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, any political division thereof, or other organizations or individuals, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That a joint commission, consisting of two Senators, Members of the Sixty-sixth Congress, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and four Members elect to the House of Representatives of the Sixty-sixth Congress, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Sixty-fifth Congress, is hereby created, whose duty it shall be to confer with officials of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, or any political subdivision thereof, and with officers of any organizations or societies, and with individuals, relative to any contemplated observance of the three hundredth anniversary of the landing of the pilgrims at Plymouth, Mass. Said commission shall report within 60 days after the Sixty-sixth Congress convenes, with its recommendation as to appropriate legislation for participation by the Government of the United States in the celebration of this historic event.

The expenses of said commission shall be paid one-half from the contingent fund of the Senate and one-half from the contingent fund of the House of Representatives.

AMENDMENTS TO THE ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FLETCHER submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation to be used for the payment of transportation, meals, etc., of teams authorized by the Secretary of War to participate in the national matches, etc., from $10,000 to $110,000, intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for the rifle ranges for civilian instruction from $100,000 to $300,000, intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I submit a resolution and ask that it be read and go over under the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution submitted by the Senator from Illinois will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 460), as follows:

Whereas under the Constitution of the United States the President has power to make treaties only by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur, and by virtue hereof the President may negotiate, confer, discuss, and by the usual diplomatic communication with the sovereign powers concerned may prepare and submit to the Senate a tentative draft of a proposed treaty or treaties embodying the views of such powers and of the President proper to be considered by this Senate. Such tentative treaty, however, possesses no binding force until it shall have been ratified by the Senate of the United States, which is an indispensable treaty-making power of equal rank and dignity with the President, and is entitled to all necessary and proper information attending and leading up to the preparation and submission of such proposed treaty, in order that it may with understanding and usefulness advise with the President and give its consent in joining with him in perfecting and maturing such treaty, or taking such other action as may to the Senate seem proper; what seems to be authentic press reports announce that the President intends to discuss the proposed treaty known as the league of nations at Boston immediately upon his return to the United States and before communicating with the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate or the Senate itself: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate hereby expresses its belief that the public discussion by the President of such proposed tentative draft of the league of nations as a proposed treaty before consultation with said Foreign Relations Committee, the members thereof, or the Senate, and before communicating to them or any of them all such material matters which may be of use in arriving at a joint understanding of the Senate and the President as the constitutional treaty-making powers of the Government in ratifying, modifying, or rejecting the same, is unwise, undiplomatic, and calculated to promote discord and misunderstanding between such two treaty-making powers whose joint act is indispensable in making such treaty; be it therefore

Resolved further, That it is the sense of this Senate, and it hereby respectfully requests, that the President do not discuss such treaty until he shall have communicated, either to the Foreign Relations Committee or the Senate, or both, such information as may properly bear upon such proposed treaty, and that he preserve an unbiased and impartial mind until he shall have advised with the coordinate power, the United States Senate, under the mandates of the Constitution, so that each of said joint treaty-making authorities may have the benefit of each other's advice and information as contemplated in the established and orderly preparation and ratification of treaties.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution goes over under the rule and will be printed.

MORALE OF THE AMERICAN SOLDIER.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to read a letter I received this morning. It is not very long. It expresses a view that I think the Senate ought to have. It expresses a truly patriotic and an American view of a question that is of prime interest to all our people:

MEMPHIS, TENN., February 18, 1919.

Hon. K. MCKELLAR,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: An old Confederate soldier would like to interest you a few minutes in regard to what is being said in the Senate and elsewhere in regard to the welfare of our boys who were and are in France.

Gov. Allen complains that some of our men were killed by our own batteries in a movement through the Argonne Forest. I went through the same experience in sixty-one and sixty-five, and such a thing is liable to happen when troops are moving forward in advance of the artillery. When this thing happened to us we made no complaint.

Senator OWEN also has a complaint to make in regard to our troops having to stand in the mud. It looks as though all the beautiful sentiment and all that encouraged us to sacrifice for the war is being dissipated for political profit.

I have met none of the returning soldiers who were engaged in the battles in France who have any complaint to make, having known in advance that what Gen. Sherman said of war was true. Our boys were the best taken care of of any troops who ever entered a war.

The Confederate soldiers went year after year without proper clothing or food, and ofttimes without shoes, and yet registered no complaint regarding their suffering.

The Battle of the Argonne was but a repetition of the Battle of the Wilderness between the forces led by Lee and Grant. Minus the machine guns the conditions were identical. We struggled day after day through the tangled underwood in Spotsylvania under the same conditions as the Argonne and made no complaint, and I do not believe that our returning soldiers will.

We are all aware that we entered this great war without adequate preparations, but there was not time to look up the Marquis of Queensbury rules, and, of course, we made mistakes financially—some of them costly.

I have no respect for anyone who raises these questions now; we had to fight and fight quick, merely using such weapons as were at hand.

I hope you will spare no effort in keeping down these miserable complaints which can have but one effect—that of leaving our people dissatisfied with the results of the war, when, on the contrary, we should congratulate each other as to our wonderful success and what the result means to the people of the world.

Thanking you in advance, I am,

Respectfully, yours,

J. P. JORDAN.

Mr. President, I desire to say that in my judgment this is a perfectly splendid letter, containing the best of advice for all of us. I am informed that, so far as newspaper reports regarding Senator OWEN'S statement are concerned, the newspaper reports are incorrect. Or at any rate they exaggerate largely what Senator OWEN said. However that may be, I wish to commend the sentiment expressed in this letter to the Senate and to the country from one of the best Confederate soldiers and one of the best American citizens who ever lived, Mr. J. P. Jordan, of Memphis, Tenn.

When we send our soldiers to war we do not expect them to go to a pink-tea party. Nor do these soldiers expect to find war a picnic. They expect hardships and privations, and the true soldier is always willing to stand them. They have gone to France and, by their courage, energy, and valor, they have won the greatest war in all history. They were not trained to arms as a profession. They were not armed and equipped as they should have been. Their training had been meager. They knew nothing of the land or of the language of a great number of their allies with whom they fought. They knew nothing of the land or the language of their foes. They were more than 3,000 miles from home. They had had a tempestuous and dangerous trip across the great Atlantic. They may not have had enough artillery or of aircraft; their camps may not have been as well arranged for their comfort as they should have been; the embarkation camps may be muddier than they should be, and they have no doubt suffered many discomforts and privations; but they have made, in spite of all drawbacks, the greatest soldiers in history, and have saved the civilization of the world by their enduring courage. Let us help them to forget their discomforts and sufferings and be of service to them in aiding them in becoming as good and as prosperous citizens as they have shown themselves valiant and successful soldiers. Mr. Jordan is right. Let us not rake up dissatisfaction. Let us think only of our and their wonderful success.

OIL AND GAS LANDS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. PITTMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on Senate bill 2812.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2812) to encourage and promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I am not in a physical condition to occupy the time of the Senate in opposing this measure. I simply wish to state briefly that I am very much opposed to the adoption of the conference report, and I shall also have read in my time a letter from Mr. Gifford Pinchot.

Mr. President, ever since I came to Congress I have had bills pending before various committees with reference to the disposition of the minerals of our country. I am not one of those who want to lock up the minerals of the country and make it impossible for the people either to get coal or phosphate or oil or any of the necessary minerals; but I do believe that when we enact legislation which will forever dispose of these valuable minerals we ought to do it with more care than has been done or is being done in this particular bill.

Mr. President, we are now near the end of this session. We have before us more appropriation bills than we probably can hope to pass at this session. Why should we be compelled to consider legislation which is of so much importance to the entire country at a time when we can not possibly attend the session, because most of us are devoting nearly all of our time in committees?

Mr. President, I believe it is a mistake to pass this legislation at this time. I know it will be said, and truthfully so, that these bills have been pending before Congress for a long time. But, Mr. President, I can remember that some 14 years ago, when I first came to Congress, the same objections were made to bills that were pending at that time which can be made now against this bill. The gentlemen on the other side, who were at that time criticizing the administration then in power, are now trying to force the very same kind of legislation upon the country which at that time they condemned.

Mr. President, I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate to discuss the conference report. As I said, I am not able to do so, but I want to warn you that the people of the country are not asleep. There are millions of people in the country who know to-day what this proposed legislation is, and they are condemning it.

I simply rose, Mr. President, to state as briefly as I could that I am opposed to this bill, and I sincerely hope that the Senate will not at this late hour adopt the conference report.

I ask for the reading of the letter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

PHILADELPHIA, PA., February 16, 1919.

Hon. A. J. GRONNA,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I would like to direct your attention to certain specific defects in the so-called mineral leasing bill lately reported from conference, which are so serious as to demand its radical amendment or defeat.

As to coal, this bill pretends to put the selling and the leasing system to the test of practical experience by giving the developer his choice. In coal mining on private land the developer really has such an option and seldom fails to choose leasing, because he would rather pay a royalty when his coal is marketed than pay the supposed fair value of the deposits before he begins to sink his mine.

Before 1906 public coal lands were sold at nominal prices—substantially given away. President Roosevelt withdrew them from sale and submitted to Congress a bill to authorize the leasing of them. Congress refused to pass the bill. Thereupon Roosevelt caused the lands to be classified by the Geological Survey and offered for sale at their fair value, which was generally very much higher than $10 or $20 per acre, the old selling price.

The bill under discussion abolishes this system of classification by value and returns to sale at the old nominal prices, with competitive bidding above the minimum, a device easily workable by bidders to depress the price to the minimum. Nominally it gives the developer the option to lease or buy. But by requiring the Government to fix the royalty before putting any area up for bidding, it forces the bid into the form of a bonus.

Now a bonus, so far as it goes, is as objectionable to a small operator as is the system of purchase, and for the same reason—that it requires a large initial investment, involving heavy tribute to the money lender and a large initial risk. If the operator must make a large payment in either case, he will, of course, choose to purchase rather than to lease. The bill deprives him of the advantages of a leasing system and gives him the opportunity to deprive the public of those advantages. It is in fact, therefore, as to coal a patenting and not a leasing bill.

As to oil and gas discovered in the future, it compels the Government to give absolute patents to the discoverer, leaving a small area adjacent to the lands so patented to be leased to others. The existence of these numerous alienated tracts in an oil field will go very far toward destroying that unified public control which is the main purpose of the leasing system as applied to oil, and which is essential for the prevention of waste and for proper compensation to the public.

Most of the discoveries of oil and gas deposits on public lands not yet patented to the discoverers were made by trespassers in violation of Taft's withdrawal order of September 27, 1909, issued to give Congress opportunity to pass a real leasing bill, and many of them are now within the naval oil reserves. The known oil deposits in the United States will not last more than 23 years at the present rate of consumption. The only way to make sure of an adequate supply of oil for our future naval defense is to keep it in these naval reserves and in the ground.

Trespassers have attempted to seize these naval oil reserves. They are being prosecuted in the courts by the Department of Justice and are there facing defeat. The Navy Department has asked authority to buy out all honest private claims at their fair value. This bill denies the Navy's request. It relieves the trespassers on the naval reserves by granting to each of them who has a flowing well a right, in effect, to lease the 31 acres surrounding it, upon which he may be authorized to drill additional wells. The Government may lease the rest of his illegal claim, but the trespasser is given preference right to such lease. The Government is forbidden to inquire into the fraudulent character of any claim unless it can be shown that the corporation which has bought it and applied for a lease had actual notice of the fraud.

These provisions apply also to fraudulent claims on withdrawn oil lands outside the naval reserves, which means all unpatented public oil lands of proved value within the United States and Alaska. As to these the bill expressly allows any single claimant to monopolize one-half the oil and gas producing area of any field greater than 640 acres, and the whole of such area of any field smaller than that acreage. The Attorney General says that this means the Standard Oil Co. and other great corporations. Not content with this, the bill also gives blanket authority to the President, which means the Secretary of the Interior, to compromise any of these trespasses on the naval reserves or other withdrawn lands, by division of land or division of proceeds at his discretion.

Under the recent special act giving authority to make arrangements for continuing the operation of the wells of the trespassers during the suits against them the Interior Department abused its discretion by giving to every trespasser seven-eighths of the oil wrongfully taken by him. It should not be trusted again.

Still another section of the bill gives these trespassers another method of getting what belongs to the public. This section is obscure, but seems to be for the benefit of some claimant who for some occult reason is not satisfied with the prodigality of the general relief provisions.

As to oil shale (rock from which, after crushing, oil can be distilled by an expensive process) the bill gives the Secretary of the Interior authority to establish a genuine leasing system, perhaps because no plunderer of the public at present thinks it worth his while to grab any lands of this character.

As to phosphate and sodium, the bill gives the Secretary of the Interior authority to make a fair trial of the leasing and selling system on equal terms. With a vigorous administration earnestly and courageously bent upon securing the value of these deposits to the public, it is probable that a leasing system would result. With a weak administration it is likely that the lands would be patented to exploiters without fair compensation to the public or safeguards against monopoly.

As to national forests, the Secretary of Agriculture should have authority to impose conditions on mining operators and on pipe-line rights of way to safeguard forest interests, and especially to exact payment for all timber taken, damaged, or destroyed. The granting and administration of leases in national forests (there should be no patents for these purposes) should be wholly in his hands, and not in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior, where this bill places it.

I have taken the liberty of setting these matters before you, because I believe that incalculable injury will be done to the public by the passage of this bill.

Sincerely, yours, GIFFORD PINCHOT.

Postscript.—The statement of the House conference report that "Presidents Taft and Wilson and the Secretaries of the Interior under them have felt the necessity of passing this legislation" is certainly not true as to Taft and Secretary of the Interior Walter L. Fisher, with respect to the matters above criticized. And if the committee has any evidence that it is true with respect to President Wilson they should produce it. The statement that "the bill in substance, as agreed upon, has passed the House during three Congresses" is not true with respect to several matters referred to in the foregoing letter.

The statement that the committee "have had the benefit of the assistance and counsel of the Departments of the Navy, Justice, * * * and * * * has had written reports * * * from the several department heads," together with a statement that the House managers feel that every interest of the Departments of the Navy and Justice have been carefully conserved and protected is grossly misleading. The relief this bill gives to trespassers in the naval reserves has been scathingly denounced by the written reports of the Navy Department and the Department of Justice. The latter department has included the relief provisions as to trespassers on other lands in its denunciation.

The final statement that "the House has unanimously passed this bill three times and its provisions have not been criticized by the public" is astounding. It has not been passed three times by the House as to the matters herein criticized. The public has criticized it severely, I myself have criticized its relief provisions as to trespassers on the naval oil reserves by statements given to the press, and by pamphlets distributed to every Member of the House and Senate, wherein I reproduced some essential parts of the severe criticism by the Attorney General and the Secretary of the Navy of this inexcusable permission for public plunder.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 16020. An act to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for carrying out the act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1918, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Michigan] and to state that he is paired with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], and the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] are detained on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the people of the United States have the undoubted right to change their form of government and to renounce established customs or long-standing policies whenever in their wisdom they see fit to do so. As a believer in democratic government, I readily acknowledge the right of the people to make in an orderly fashion such changes as may be approved by their judgment at any time. I contend, moreover, that when radical and important departures from established national policies are proposed, the people ought to be consulted.

We are now proposing what to my mind is the most radical departure from our policies hitherto obtaining that has ever been proposed at any time since our Government was established. I think the advocates of the league will agree with me that it is a pronounced departure from all the policies which we have heretofore obtained.

It may be wise, as they contend; nevertheless, it involves a different course of conduct upon the part of the Government and of our people for the future, and the people are entitled to pass judgment upon the advisability of such a course.

It seems clear, also, that this proposed program, if it is to be made effective and operative under the proposed constitution of the league, involves a change in our Constitution. Certainly, questions of that kind ought to be submitted to a plebiscite or to a vote of the people, and the Constitution amended in the manner provided for amending that instrument. We are merely agents of the people; and it will not be contended that we have received any authority from the principal, the people, to proceed along this line. It is a greater responsibility than an agent ought to assume without express authority or approval from his principal to say nothing of the want of authority. Preliminary to a discussion of this question, therefore, I want to declare my belief that we should arrange the machinery for taking a vote of the people of the United States upon this stupendous program. I am aware that the processes by which that may be accomplished involve some difficulties; but they are not insurmountable, and they are by no means to be compared in their difficulty with the importance of being right and in harmony with the judgment of the people before we proceed to a final approval. We should have the specific indorsement of those whose agents we are, and we should have the changes in our Constitution that we may have sanction under the Constitution for the fearful responsibility we propose to assume. If we can effectuate this change now proposed without direct authority from the people I can not think of a question of sufficient moment to call for their indorsement.

It must be conceded that this program can never be a success unless there is behind it the intelligent and sustained public opinion of the United States. If the voters do not have their voice before the program is initiated, they will certainly have an opportunity to give expression to their views in the future. They are still the source of power, and through their votes they effectuate the policies under which we must live. From the standpoint, therefore, of expediency and from the standpoint of fairness to those who are most concerned, to wit, the people, those who must carry the burdens, if there be burdens, and suffer the consequences, if there should be ill consequences to suffer, as well as from the standpoint of insuring success, if possible, the mass of the people ought to be consulted and their approval had before we proceed. I, therefore, in the very beginning of this procedure, declare in favor of that program.

Mr. President, I think I should have deferred any remarks I had to make upon this subject until a later day had it not been for an interview which was put out by Mr. Taft some two or three days ago upon this question. I felt, in view of that statement, that those who were opposed to the program were justified in proceeding at once to the debate, because it is a statement which in my judgment is not founded upon fact. In saying that I do not charge a conscious purpose upon the part of Mr. Taft to mislead, but I am sure it can not be sustained by the historic facts at the command of anyone who desires to examine the subject; and as it can not be sustained, it is to the utmost degree misleading.

Mr. Taft informs the American people, from the pedestal of an ex-President, that this program does not destroy the policy announced by Washington in his Farewell Address and does not renounce the doctrine known as the Monroe doctrine—two fundamental principles underlying our foreign policy for more than 100 years in one instance and nearly 100 years in the other; two policies to which the American people have long been committed, and which, in my judgment, they still believe to be indispensable to their happiness and future tranquillity. If, indeed, this program does dispose of these policies, it presents an entirely different question to the American people than if the reverse were true. This is one of the first things to be settled in this controversy. It meets us at the very threshold of all discussion and all consideration. It is of such moment as to call for clear statement and candid presentation. What is the effect of this proposed program upon these ancient and most vital policies?

Mr. Taft says:

> Article 10 covers the Monroe doctrine and extends it to the world. * * * The league is to be regarded as in conflict with the advice of Washington only with a narrow and reactionary viewpoint.

"Reactionary" is not a familiar term in the ex-President's vocabulary. I think he has unintentionally misused it.

Mr. President, prior to the administration of Washington, America had been involved in every European war since colonization began. When a difficulty arose in Europe, whatever might be the subject of the difficulty, whether dynastic quarrels or territorial aggrandizement, it spread at once to the American Continent. Although we might be wholly unconcerned in the controversy upon its merits, nevertheless the evil effects of the conflict in Europe enveloped the people of this country in its consequences. As you recall, Macaulay, in his graphic way in the essay upon Frederick the Great, said:

> In order that he might rob a neighbor whom he had promised to defend, black men fought on the coast of Coromandel and red men scalped each other by the Great Lakes of North America.

When Washington assumed the responsibilities as administrator of this Government, he immediately set about to change that condition of affairs; to wit, to separate the European system from the American system, to withdraw our people from her broils, to individualize the American Nation, and to divorce us from the quarrels and turmoils of European life. This was peculiarly and distinctly a policy originating with the Father of our Country. If there is any one thing in his entire career, marvelous as it was, which can be said to be distinctly his, it is the foreign policy which characterized his administration. His idea almost alone in the first instance was that we never could become a nation with a national mind, a national purpose, and national ideals until we divorce ourselves from the European system. He entertained this view before he became President. I venture to recall to your minds a letter which he wrote, prior to the Presidency, to Sir Edward Newenham, in which he says:

> I hope the United States of America will be able to keep disengaged from the labyrinth of European politics and wars. * * * It should be the policy of the United States to administer to their wants without being engaged in their quarrels.

In 1791 he addressed a letter to Mr. Morris, in which he said:

> I trust we shall never so far lose sight of our own interest and happiness as to become unnecessarily a party to these political disputes. Our local situation enables us to maintain that state with respect to them which otherwise could not, perhaps, be preserved by human wisdom.

The author from whom I quote, Senator LODGE, commenting upon this, says:

> The world was told that a new power had come into being, which meant to hold aloof from Europe, and which took no interest in the balance of power or the fate of dynasties, but looked only to the welfare of its own people and to the conquest and mastery of a continent as its allotted tasks. The policy declared by the proclamation was purely American in its conception, and severed the colonial tradition at a stroke.

I digress to say I wish every boy and girl over the age of 15 years could be induced to read the brilliant story of Washington as it is found in those two volumes. If they were not better Americans, with higher ideals, after they had read it, nothing could make them so.

Again, Mr. President, in a letter to Patrick Henry, dated later, he says:

I can most religiously aver that I have no wish that is incompatible with the dignity, happiness, and true interest of the people of this country. My ardent desire is, and my aim has been, so far as dependent on the executive department, to comply strictly with all our engagements, foreign and domestic, but to keep the United States free from any political connections with every other country, to see it independent of all, and under the influence of none. In a word, I want an American character, that the powers of Europe may be convinced that we act for ourselves.

Pursuing this thought and this great principle throughout his administration until he had fairly established it as a part of our foreign policy—the initiatory step of the same—he referred particularly to it in his Farewell Address. I shall detain the Senate by reading a single paragraph only. This was the conclusion of Washington after years of observation, after the most pointed experience, after eight years of administration of public affairs, and with as wide a vision and with as far-seeing a vision as ever accompanied a human mind upon this mundane sphere:

Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?

Are there people in this day who believe that Europe now and in the future shall be free of selfishness, of rivalship, of humor, of ambition, of caprice? If not, are we not undertaking the task against which the Father of our Country warned when he bade farewell to public service? "Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground?" And yet in this proposed league of nations, in the very beginning, we are advised of an executive council which shall dominate and control its action, three members of which are Europeans, one member Asiatic, and one American.

If a controversy ever arises in which there is a conflict between the European system and the American system, or if a conflict ever arises in which their interests, their humor, their caprice, and their selfishness shall attempt to dominate the situation, shall we not have indeed quit our own to stand upon foreign ground?

Why should we interweave our destiny with the European destiny? Are we not interweaving our future and our destiny with European powers when we join a league of nations the constitution of which gives a majority vote in every single instance in which the league can ever be called into action to European powers?

Does the ex-President mean to say to an intelligent and thinking people that this league which thus grants this power to European governments is not interweaving our destiny with European destiny? Does he assume to say that that is not a departure from the plain terms of Washington's Farewell Address?

I repeat what I said upon the floor of the Senate a few weeks ago. It may be that the people of America want to do this; it may be that they think their future happiness and tranquillity necessitate their doing it, but I inveigh against the misleading statement that we do not propose to do it by this league of nations. Let us be candid with those upon whom must rest the future burdens and obligations and not undertake to advise them that that is not going to happen which must necessarily and inevitably happen.

Mr. President, Washington succeeded in establishing the policy that we should not interfere in European affairs. It would have served no good purpose and would not have been beneficial to the American people in the least had we simply remained aloof from European affairs but had permitted Europe to transfer her system to the American Continent. Therefore, the Monroe doctrine. It was designed to support the policy of Washington. He had warned against the danger of entering Europe—the Monroe doctrine declared that Europe should not enter America. Permit me to say that one of these can not stand, in my judgment, without the support of the other. It is an inevitable result of Washington's teaching that the Monroe doctrine should exist. Indeed, such men as Mr. Coudert, the great lawyer, say that Washington's policy incorporated and included the Monroe doctrine; that Monroe's statement was simply an exemplification and application of the principle.

So, sir, in order that we might become a nation free from European broils and cease forever to have to do with European affairs, the Washington policy and the Monroe doctrine were announced and have ever since been maintained. The great question now is, Are they policies which we should still maintain; are they in all essential particulars still indispensable to our well-being as a people and to our strength and permanency as a nation? The present war has drawn us to Europe, but only temporarily. The question is, Shall we enter European affairs permanently, and shall we invite Europe, with her systems of government, some more pernicious than in the days of Washington, to America? We had a temporary alliance with France when Washington became President, but he fought against the making of these alliances permanent. That is the question here.

What is the Monroe doctrine? I apologize to the Senate for going into that question. I do so more for others than my colleagues, but I will be brief. Before the exigencies arising out of the conditions connected with a defense of this league it would not have been necessary to discuss it. All understood it alike. The Monroe doctrine is simply the principle of self-defense applied to a people, and the principle of self-defense can not be the subject of arbitration or of enforcement by any one other than that one who is to claim and enforce the principle of self-defense.

The ex-President said the Monroe doctrine is covered and extended to the world. That was the condition before Monroe announced it. The world was one. Monroe determined to separate it and divide it, and that was the very object of it. It was a distinct announcement that the European system could not be transferred to America. The rest was simply detail. It was the division of two systems; it was the political partition of two continents. Monroe or Jefferson never would have contemplated for a moment sharing the enforcement of the Monroe doctrine with any nation of Europe. We would not even join with England in announcing it.

May I read here in connection with my remarks a statement by ex-Senator Root upon this particular feature? Before I do that, however, I desire to call attention to the language of Thomas Jefferson. It precedes the remark which I was about to make. This letter of Jefferson states as clearly as can be stated the prime object of the announcement of this doctrine:

The question presented by the letters you have sent me is the most momentous which has ever been offered to my contemplation since that of independence.

Why does the Sage of Monticello rank the Monroe doctrine next to the Declaration of Independence? Because he believed as that genius of constructive government, Hamilton, believed, and Washington believed, that we could not maintain our independence without the Monroe doctrine. He believed that it was an indispensable pillar to our national independence, and second only to it in the catalogue of responsibilities and duties and obligations which rested upon us:

That made us a nation.

This sets our compass and points the course which we are to steer through the ocean of time opening on us. And never could we embark upon it under circumstances more auspicious. Our first and fundamental maxim should be never to entangle ourselves in the broils of Europe;

The Washington policy—

our second, never to suffer Europe to intermeddle with cis-Atlantic affairs.

Yet the ex-President says notwithstanding this we carry out this discrimination and distinction between European affairs and American affairs when we permit the two systems to be united, to be organized and administered by a common authority. He declares that although we do entangle ourselves in the broils of Europe, although we do suffer Europe to intermeddle with cis-Atlantic affairs, it is not in conflict with the Monroe doctrine.

I now call your attention to the statement of Senator Root upon the proposition advanced by the ex-President—of sharing with other nations responsibility in enforcing this doctrine. Mr. Root says:

Since the Monroe doctrine is a declaration based upon this Nation's right of self-protection, it can not be transmuted into a joint or common declaration by American States or any number of them.

We could not even share the responsibility and the execution of the Monroe doctrine with our Commonwealths here upon the Western Continent. It is personal; it is individual; it is the law of self-defense. It belongs to us, and we alone must determine when it shall be enforced or when it shall not apply. It is the same rule and principle which Australia invokes, and correctly invokes, with reference to the German islands near Australia. It is the same principle which Japan sought to have established in the Orient. It is the principle of self-defense and not of common defense, or defense by common authority invoked and sustained by the joint act of many nations.

Yet we are solemnly advised that although we should share it with all the Governments of Europe and Asia and all the tribes of the different races which may in the future be organized into some form of government, it is still the doctrine of self-defense which Jefferson and Monroe announced and which Mr. Root so clearly explained.

I read another paragraph from Mr. Root's speech, which leaves nothing further to be said both as to the meaning and the worth of this policy:

The familiar paragraphs of Washington's Farewell Address upon this subject were not rhetoric. They were intensely practical rules of conduct for the future guidance of the country:

"Europe has a set of primary interests which to us have none, or a very remote, relation. Hence, she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves, by artificial ties, in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics, or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities. Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course."

It was the same instinct which led Jefferson, in the letter to Monroe already quoted, to say:

"Our first and fundamental maxim should be, never to entangle ourselves in the broils of Europe; our second, never to suffer Europe to intermeddle with cis-Atlantic affairs."

The concurrence of Washington and Hamilton and Jefferson in the declaration of this principle of action entitles it to great respect. * * * Separation of influences as absolute and complete as possible was the remedy which the wisest of Americans agreed upon. It was one of the primary purposes of Monroe's declaration to insist upon this separation, and to accomplish it he drew the line at the water's edge. The problem of national protection in the distant future is one not to be solved by the first impressions of the casual observer, but only by profound study of the forces which, in the long life of nations, work out results. In this case the results of such a study by the best men of the formative period of the United States are supported by the instincts of the American democracy holding steadily in one direction for almost a century. The problem has not changed essentially. If the declaration of Monroe was right when the message was sent, it is right now.

We come now to the constitution of the proposed league of nations, which has been submitted to us. I shall not undertake to go into details; indeed, time would not permit to take up the many different phases which this constitution presents for consideraion. I want only to call attention to some features of it bearing upon this particular subject matter—that is, the effect it has upon these two great policies.

The mere reading of the constitution of the league will convince any reasonable mind, any unprejudiced mind, that if put into effect the policy of Washington and the policy of Monroe must depart. The propositions are irreconcilable and can not exist together. In the first place, the league provides for an organization composed principally of five great nations, three of them European, one Asiatic, and one American. Every policy determined upon by the league and every movement made by it could be, and might be, controlled solely by European powers, whether the matter dealt with had reference to America or Europe. The league nowhere distinguishes or discriminates between European and American affairs. It functions in one continent the same as another. It compounds all three continents into a single unit, so far as the operations of the league are concerned. The league interferes in European affairs and in American affairs upon the same grounds and for the same reasons. If the territorial integrity of any member of the league is threatened or involved, whether that territory be in America or Europe, the league deals with the subject. If it becomes necessary for the league to act through economic pressure, or finally through military power, although the procedure may be voted by European powers alone, it may exert that pressure in America the same as in Europe. The very object and purpose of the league is to eliminate all differences between Europe and America and place all in a common liability to be governed and controlled by a common authority. If the United States, for instance, should disregard its covenants, as provided in the league, it would be deemed to have committed an act of war against all other members of the league; and under our solemn obligation and agreement we would have authorized the European powers to wage war against us and upon the American Continent. And yet men deliberately and blandly state to the American people that this league constitution preserves the Monroe doctrine and the doctrine given us by Washington.

I read from article 10 as an illustration:

The high contracting parties shall undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial existence and existing political independence of all States members of the league.

Take for illustration one of our own associates and allies. England has possessions in three continents. As has been said, the sun never sets upon her possessions. They dot every sea and are found in every land. She to-day holds possession of one-fifth of the habitable globe, and we in article 10 guarantee the integrity of her possessions in the three continents of the earth.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator state what he is reading from?

Mr. BORAH. I am reading from article 10 of the constitution of the league.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is not the language of article 10 as printed in the Senate document at the request of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. There is nothing said about possessions there at all.

Mr. BORAH. Did I read possessions?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understood the Senator to say possessions.

Mr. BORAH. No; I think the Senator is mistaken. I will read it again:

The high contracting parties shall undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all States members of the league.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is correct.

Mr. BORAH. I presume that her territorial integrity necessarily involves her territorial possessions.

So, Mr. President, the first obligation which we assume is to protect the territorial integrity of the British Empire. That takes us into every part of the civilized world. That is the most radical departure from the Washington policy. I will come to the Monroe policy in a minute. Now, how are we to determine that?

In case of any such aggression or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression the executive council shall advise upon the means by which the obligation shall be fulfilled.

Does that mean what it says, and is it to be executed in accordance with its plain terms? If the territorial integrity of any part of the British Empire shall be threatened, not the Congress of the United States, not the people of the United States, not the Government of the United States determines what shall be done, but the executive council, of which the American people have one member. We, if we mean what we say in this constitution, are pledging ourselves, our honor, our sacred lives, to the preservation of the territorial possessions the world over and not leaving it to the judgment and sense of the American people but to the diplomats of Europe.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator again uses the words "territorial possessions." That is what I am objecting to.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I will leave it to an intelligent audience to determine whether or not "territorial integrity" does not include "territorial possessions."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator will refer to article 7, the indications are there that the dominions of the British Empire are to be regarded as separate and independent self-governing countries.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am coming to that in a few moments. I admire the careful use of language by the Senator from Nebraska when he says there are "indications." This constitution is prolific indeed of "indications."

That is the duty devolving upon us by virtue of the league, to enter European affairs. What would be the duty and the obligation of England, of France, of Italy, and of Japan to the other member should a disturbance arise upon the Western Continent? Suppose some threat of danger to the Republic should come from Mexico or from Mexico and its allies. We are not even consulted as to whether we shall call in help, but the duty devolves upon the council, in its initiative capacity, to at once assume jurisdiction of it and to proceed to the American continent to determine what its duties shall be with reference to American affairs. This league operates upon the Western Continent with the same jurisdiction and power and the same utter disregard of which continent it is upon as it does in the European Continent. Does anybody deny that proposition?

Let us take a homely illustration; perhaps it may better illustrate the argument. A great many years ago a man by the name of Europe opened a farm. He begins the tillage of his great farm, but turmoil, strife, and dissension arise among his tenants. Finally a dissatisfied European by the name of, we will call him, America, determines to leave these turmoils on the European farm to go into the forest, open a clearing, and establish a new farm. He says, "I shall go where I can worship God according to the dictates of my own conscience. I shall go where I can set up a new system of farming." He goes into the wilderness and sacrifices and finally establishes a farm of his own. After he has established it he declares, after reflection, "I am afraid those Europeans will come here and cause me the same disturbance and trouble and establish the same kind of a system which we had in Europe; so I will establish a partition fence." He does establish a partition fence. When he has finished the fence he says, "I will neither go to your farm nor shall you come to mine; I have had some experience with you, and I do not want to try it again." So he builds an insurmountable wall or fence between his neighbor Europe and himself. It stands for a hundred years. People sit about and discuss it, and pass many eulogies, declaring over and over again that it was one of the wisest things that a farmer ever did. But suddenly a new inspiration dawns, and it is thought that it would be a good idea to tear down the wall or fence and to commingle and intermingle the systems; to join one farm to another and have one superintendent. It is said to the farmer America, "Let us tear down this fence." He replies in surprise and consternation, "I built it for a purpose." "Well," it is contended by the idealist, "we think it is better to tear it down." At this time there rises up a man by the name of William Howard. He says to farmer America, "Let us tear down that wall fence of yours. It must be done right away. Anyone who opposes can not be trusted overnight." The farmer says, "I do not think it would be well." "But," William Howard replies, "it is just the same after it is torn down as it is when it is standing up. We are going to put a fence around both farms, and that will be the same as a fence between the farms." William Howard further says, "Let us go into partnership with your neighbor Europe." America says, "I do not want any partnership. I came here to get away from that very thing." William Howard urges, with a spirit of unselfishness and good naturedly, "It is just the same without a partnership as it is with it. Let us transmute or combine these two systems and make them one." "But," farmer America says, "I came to this country to get away from that system. I do not want one system; I want two systems. I do not like their system of farming." William Howard replies, "One system is just the same as two systems." He declares, furthermore, "I know something about this; I ran this farm for four years myself [laughter]; I know how to run it; and I declare to you that the best thing for you to do is to tear down your wall fence, to unite your two systems, and make one farm out of it and one common overseer." He further, by way of a profound argument, casually remarks, "I had such remarkable success while I was running this farm and received such universal commendation upon my work after it was over, having received the approval of 2 tenants out of 48, that I am sure that I can run both farms; at least, I am anxious to try." [Laughter.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The galleries must preserve order.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, some of us declare that this proposition tears down the farmer's fence. We say furthermore that we do not want two farms made into one. If you want to do so, all right, go ahead; but let us make no mistake about what we are doing. Let us not try to fool ourselves or anyone else.

What do other countries think about it, Mr. President? I should like to call in outside witnesses, notwithstanding the very profound respect that I have for the ex-President. The English press, we are informed in so far as it has commented upon this subject at all, has regarded it as an abrogation of the Monroe doctrine. Mr. Lloyd George said in the very beginning of these conferences that Great Britain could concede much to the United States if, as the result, they were to draw the United States out of her isolation and away from her traditional foreign policies. Japan has practically announced semiofficially that it is the abolishment of the Monroe doctrine. The Brazilian Minister at The Hague has announced that it is the end of the Monroe doctrine. Why leave it in doubt? Do you Senators, or those who are in favor of the league of nations, want to destroy the Monroe doctrine? If you do not, why leave it in doubt? Why leave it to the construction of European diplomats sitting behind closed doors? By the insertion of three lines in this constitution you can place it beyond peradventure, beyond contention or cavil. The question which I submit now is, if you are unwilling to do this, is it not proof conclusive that you intend to destroy the policy and wipe out this long-standing doctrine?

Let us go to another feature of this league. I am not here to-day to criticize in any way, either directly or by inference, the great English nation or the great English people. They are among, not excepting our own, the most powerful and admirable people upon the globe. Every man must pay his profound respect to their genius and to their capacity for Government and for mastery of great problems. But when we come to deal with England, we must deal with her intelligently and with a due regard for our own interests and our own rights, for one of the distinguishing characteristics of that proud nation is that England always looks after England's interests. I admire her for doing so.

Her national spirit never fails her. The talents and genius of her statesmen never betray her. She has signed many treaties which have been worthless in the hour of peril. She has entered into many leagues and combinations which have dissolved, but her proud national spirit never forsakes her. Ultimately she relies upon this instead of treaties and leagues. She has passed through many a crisis, she has seen dark hours; but in every crisis, however severe, and in the darkest hour every Englishman is expected to do his duty and does it. I admire her for her national spirit, for her vigilance in guarding the interests of the Empire.

Mr. President, this constitution of the league of nations is the greatest triumph for English diplomacy in three centuries of English diplomatic life. This constitution, in the first place, is lifted almost bodily, as you will see if you will compare the two, from the constitution proposed in January by Gen. Smuts. There is not an organic, a vital principle incorporated in this constitution that is not found in Gen. Smuts's constitution. As is known to all, Gen. Smuts, a South African, is one of the most remarkable men under the English rule to-day. That you may not think I am stating it strongly, let me read a word from the London Times on the second day after this constitution was adopted:

> The project, if not the same as that outlined by Gen. Smuts, is like it as its brother. * * * It is a cause for legitimate pride to recognize in the covenant so much of the work of Englishmen. * * * It is again a source of legitimate pride to Englishmen that article 19 in the covenant might almost be taken as an exposition of the principles animating the relations of Great Britain with India and the dominions.

Listen to this language—

> That the dominions are in this document recognized as nations before the world is also a fact of profound significance in the history of these relations.

The gentleman who wrote that editorial had not acquired the capacity of using language to conceal his thoughts; he labored under the disadvantage of having to use language to convey his thoughts. The fact that the dominions of Great Britain and her colonies are recognized as nations is a matter of "profound significance." Yes; when they finally settle down to business England will have one vote, Canada one vote, New Zealand one vote, Australia one vote, and South Africa one vote, whilst the American Nation, brought into being by our fathers at so much cost of blood and treasure and preserved through the century by the vigilance and sacrifice of our forbears, this Nation with all her wealth and resources will have one vote. In both the executive council and the delegate body the same proportion obtains, and those two bodies direct, dominate, and mark out the policy of this entire program, whatever it is to be, under the league. A matter of "profound significance!"

I ask you who are in favor of this league, Are you willing to give to any nation five votes against our one? Do you presume that the questions of interest, of ambition, of selfishness, of caprice, of humor will not arise in the future? Have they not already, in a proper way, but none the less in an unmistakable way, made their appearance since the armistice was signed? Are we not already advised that we must use the same intelligence, the same foresight, the same prevision, and the same patriotism that our fathers used against the inherent, the inevitable selfishness of all nations? Yet we are seriously proposing that we shall join a league whose constitutional powers shall determine—what? Shall determine policies, politic and economic, upon the two continents and shall give to our greatest commercial rival five votes to our one.

Mr. President, I have called attention to some of the obligations which we assume. Let me repeat a single statement. You have now observed the number of votes in the executive council, but that is not all. There are Italy and Japan associated with England, and more nearly like her in their systems and in their policies than they are like the United States. There are already treaties between those nations and England, which Mr. Balfour frankly says are not to be abrogated; in other words, we are in the very beginning put up not only against this extraordinary vote by one nation but we have the disadvantage of contending against a system, which system covers other nations as well as that of Great Britain.

We all want the friendship and the respect of and future amicable relations between Great Britain and this country. That also was Washington's wish; that was Jefferson's wish; that was also Lincoln's wish; but never for a moment did they surrender any power or any authority or compromise their capacity in any way to take care of the situation in case there should not be an agreement between the two powers.

What has England given up in this league of nations? What has she surrendered? Will some one advise me? Did she surrender the freedom of the seas? That was pushed aside at the first meetings of the conference as not subject to its jurisdiction. Has she surrendered her claim for the largest navy? What has she surrendered?

On the other hand, we have surrendered the traditional foreign policy of this country, which has been established for 100 years; and we have gone behind these powers and placed at their disposal our finances, our man power, and our full capacity to guarantee the integrity of their possessions all over the globe. Is it an even balance? Is it an equitable, is it an honest, arrangement between these great powers and the United States?

I come now to another feature, which to me is even more interesting, more menacing, than those over which we have passed. Conceal it as you may, disguise it as some will attempt to do, this is the first step in internationalism and the first distinct effort to sterilize nationalism. This is a recognized fact, tacitly admitted by all who support it and expressly admitted by many, that the national state has broken down and that we must now depend upon the international state and international power in order to preserve our interests and our civilization. The national state can no longer serve the cause of civilization, and therefore we must resort to the international state. That is disclosed in every line and paragraph of this instrument. It begins with the preamble and ends with the last article—a recognition that internationalism must take the place of nationalism.

May I call attention to a statement from perhaps the most famous international now living? I read from a book entitled "The Bolsheviki and World Peace," by Trotzky. He says:

> The present war is at bottom a revolt of the forces of production against the political form of nation and State. It means the collapse of the national state as an independent economic unit.

In another paragraph:

> The war proclaims the downfall of the national state. * * * We Russian Socialists stand firmly on the ground of internationalism. * * * The German social democracy was to us not only a party of the international—it was the party par excellence.

Again, he declares:

> The present war signalizes the collapse of the national states.

He proceeds to argue that the only thing which can take the place of the national state is internationalism, to internationalize our governments, internationalize our power, internationalize production, internationalize our economic capacity, and become an international state the world over. That is at the bottom of this entire procedure, whether consciously or unconsciously, upon the part of those who are advocating it. It will be the fruit of this effort if it succeeds—the dead-sea fruit for the common people everywhere. It is a distinct announcement that the intense nationalism of Washington, the intense nationalism of Lincoln, can no longer serve the cause of the American people, and that we must internationalize and place the sovereign powers of this Government to make war and control our economic forces in an international tribunal.

A few days ago one of the boldest and most brilliant internationalists of this country—a man, no doubt, who believes in it as firmly as I believe in nationalism—wrote this paragraph:

> The death of Col. Roosevelt was a shock, I think, to everybody who loves life. No man ever lived who had more fun in 61 years; and yet his death, with that last frantic reiteration of Americanism and nothing but Americanism, fresh from his pen, was like a symbol of the progress of life. The boyish magnetism is all gone out of those words. They die in the dawn of revolutionary internationalism.

I sometimes wonder, Can it be true? Are we, indeed, yielding our Americanism before the onrushing tide of revolutionary internationalism? Did the death of this undaunted advocate of American nationalism mark an epoch in the fearful, damnable, downward trend?

Yes, Mr. President, this many-sided man touched life at every point, and sometimes seemed inconsistent; but there was one supreme passion which gave simplicity and singleness of purpose to all he said or did—his abounding Americanism. In this era of national infidelity let us be deeply grateful for this. Though he had erred a thousand times, and grievously erred, we would still pay sincere tribute to his memory for holding aloft at all times, and especially in the world's greatest turmoil, the banner of the true faith. Huntsman, plainsman, author, political leader, governor, Vice President, President, and ex-President, this was always the directing and dominating theme. Even in his full, rich life, replete with noble deeds and brilliant achievements, it runs like a golden thread through all of the bewildering activities of his wide-ranging genius. It gave consistency to every change of view and justified what sometimes seemed his merciless intolerance. When the final estimate is placed upon his career, and all his services to his fellows are weighed and judged, his embodiment of the national spirit, his vigilant defense of our national integrity, his exemplification of our national ideals will distinguish him, as says in effect this internationalist, from all the men of his day and generation.

Mr. President, I am not a pessimist. I find neither solace nor guidance in the doleful doctrine. But who will gainsay that we have reached a supreme hour in the history of the Republic he loved? There is not a Government in existence to-day but feels the strain of those inscrutable forces which are working their willful way through all the established institutions of men. Church and creed, ancient governments and new, despotic and liberal, order and law, at this time stand under challenge. Hunger and disease, business anxiety, and industrial unrest threaten to demobilize the moral forces of organized society. In all of this turmoil and strife, in all this chaos of despair and hope, there is much that is good if it can be brought under direction and subordinated to the sway of reason. At the bottom of it all there is the infinite longing of oppressed humanity seeking in madness to be rid of oppression and to escape from these centuries of injustice. How shall we help to bring order out of chaos? Shall we do so by becoming less or more American? Shall we entangle and embarrass the efforts of a powerful and independent people, or shall we leave them in every emergency and in every crisis to do in that particular hour and in that supreme moment what the conscience and wisdom of an untrammeled and liberty-loving people shall decide is wise and just? Or shall we yoke our deliberations to forces we can not control and leave our people to the mercy of powers which may be wholly at variance with our conception of duty? I may be willing to help my neighbor, though he be improvident or unfortunate, but I do not necessarily want him for a business partner. I may be willing to give liberally of my means, of my council and advice, even of my strength or blood, to protect his family from attack or injustice, but I do not want him placed in a position where he may decide for me when and how I shall act or to what extent I shall make sacrifice. I do not want this Republic, its intelligence and its patriotism, its free people and its institutions, to go into partnership with and to give control of the partnershp to those many of whom have no conception of our civilization and no true insight into our destiny. What we want is what Roosevelt taught and urged—a free, untrammeled Nation, imbued anew and inspired again with the national spirit; not isolation but freedom to do as our own people think wise and just; not isolation but simply the unembarrassed and unentangled freedom of a great Nation to determine for itself and in its own way where duty lies and where wisdom calls. There is not a supreme council possible of creation or conceivable equal in wisdom, in conscience, and humanitarianism to the wisdom and conscience and humanitarianism of the hundred million free and independent liberty-loving souls to whom the living God has intrusted the keeping of this Nation. The moment this Republic comes to any other conclusion it has forfeited its right to live as an independent and self-respecting Republic.

It was not, one likes to believe, a mere incident, but a significant though strangely arranged fact that the last message to the American people from the illustrious dead who, the internationalists tell us, was the last of the great Americans should have been upon this particular subject. I believe it was the night of his death that this message which I shall now read to you was read at a public meeting to which he had been invited but was unable to attend:

> Any man who says he is an American but something else also isn't an American at all. We have room for but one flag, the American flag. * * * We have room for but one language, and that is the English language; for we intend to see that the crucible turns our people out as Americans, of American nationality, and not as dwellers in a polyglot boarding house; and we have room for but one soul loyalty to the American people.

Let us inscribe this upon our banner and hang it upon the outer wall. In all the vicissitudes of our national life, in all the duties which may come to us as a people, in all the future, filled, as it will be, with profound and perplexing problems, let us cling uncompromisingly to this holy creed. In these times, when ancient faiths are disappearing and governments are crumbling, when institutions are yielding to the tread of the mad hosts of disorder, let us take our stand on the side of orderly liberty, on the side of constitutional government. Let us range ourselves along with Washington and Jefferson and Jackson and Lincoln and Roosevelt. Let us be true to ourselves; and, whatever the obligations of the future, we can not then be false to others.

OIL AND GAS LANDS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2812) to encourage and promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, we have just listened to one of the most remarkable speeches that I have ever listened to in this body. I would that it could go in every home in this country, to be considered in connection with the greatest question affecting the future of our country since the adoption of our Constitution.

I have no intention whatever of speaking upon the league of nations at this time, nor to express any views upon it. When I was speaking yesterday upon the pending measure I had reached the point of what happened in the conference committee touching many of the questions between the House and the Senate, and questions that I thought myself the conferees were appointed to settle; but it soon developed that the conferees were not the ones to settle the question as to what should be in this bill. That was to be settled outside of the conferees and outside of Congress itself, and nothing must go into the report unless it had been submitted to outside parties.

Mr. President, yesterday the Senator from Nevada had read into the RECORD a letter signed by the Secretary of the Interior, addressed to Hon. SCOTT FERRIS, of the House of Representatives, relative to the coal provision of the report. That was not the only letter which was written in relation to the subject, and the Secretary of the Interior was not the only Cabinet member who addressed a letter to Hon. SCOTT FERRIS, chairman of the Public Lands Committee, House of Representatives, upon the pending conference report. I hold in my hand a letter from Secretary Lane, dated February 1, 1919, and that was the time when the conferees were meeting upon this oil-leasing bill, which I shall read, and then, if I have time, I will read one from the Secretary of Agriculture. Secretary Lane in the letter states:

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 1, 1919.

MY DEAR MR. FERRIS: On December 10, 1917, you transmitted a copy of resolutions passed by the Cordova (Alaska) Chamber of Commerce, with reference to the pending general leasing bill and particularly with reference to deposits of coal and oil. One of the matters urged was that the pending bill be modified so as to make its provisions relating to the sale of coal lands applicable to Alaska. In my reply of January 4, 1918, I advised you, in effect, that the reason this provision was not included was that there is now a special leasing law applicable to that Territory enacted October 20, 1914 (38 Stat., 741), and that this law had not been in operation long enough for the department to determine whether it will be successful and adapted to the development of Alaska's coal resources.

Since the above letter was written there has been further opportunity to learn whether the Alaska coal-leasing bill is suitable to conditions in the Territory, and I have concluded that it is not entirely so——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). The Senator from Utah will suspend for a moment. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill 13026.

DISCHARGED SICK AND DISABLED SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13026) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to provide hospital and sanatorium facilities for discharged sick and disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. HARDWICK. I ask that the amendment of the committee may be read.

The Secretary read the amendment of the committee, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to provide immediate additional hospital and sanatorium facilities for the care and treatment of discharged sick and disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines, Army and Navy nurses (male and female), patients of the War Risk Insurance Bureau, and for others entitled to treatment by the Public Health Service, by the construction of new hospitals and sanatoria, to include the necessary buildings with their appropriate mechanical and other equipment and approach work, including roads leading thereto, for the accommodation of patients, officers, nurses, attendants, storage, laundries, vehicles, and live stock on sites now owned by the Government, or on new sites to be acquired by purchase or otherwise, at the following places: At Cook County, Ill., by taking over the land and executing the contract for the construction thereon of hospital buildings specified therein of a certain proposed contract executed by the Shank Co., August 31, 1918, and in accordance with such contract and the plans and specifications, identified in connection therewith August 31, 1918, by the signature and initials of Brig. Gen. R. C. Marshall, jr., Construction Division, Quartermaster Department, United States Army, by Lieut. Col. C. C. Wright, and the Shank Co., by George H. Shank, president, at the cost stated therein, namely, $2,500,000, with such changes in said plans and specifications as may be required by the Secretary of the Treasury to adapt said specified buildings to the needs and purposes of the Public Health Service, at a limit of cost not to exceed $3,000,000.

At Dawson Springs, Ky., on land to be acquired by gift, the necessary buildings for a sanatorium having a capacity of not less than 500 beds. The sum of $1,500,000 is hereby authorized for the construction of such sanatorium.

The sum of $900,000 is hereby authorized for the construction, including site, of a hospital plant complete at Norfolk, Va.

The sum of $550,000 is hereby authorized for the construction, on land owned or to be acquired by the Government, of a hospital plant complete in the District of Columbia or vicinity.

The sum of $190,000 is hereby authorized for additional hospital accommodations, including such minor alteration in and remodeling of existing and authorized buildings as may be necessary to economically adapt them to the additional accommodations herein authorized for the Marine Hospital at Stapleton, Staten Island, N. Y., and the sum appropriated for additions to the said hospital by the act approved March 28, 1918, is authorized to be expended in full without the construction of psychiatric units.

There are hereby permanently transferred to the Treasury Department for the use of the Public Health Service for hospital or sanatoria or other uses the following properties, with their present equipment, including sites and leases, or so much thereof as may be required by the Public Health Service, including mechanical equipment in connection therewith, and approaches thereto, with authority to lease or purchase sites not owned by the Government, as follows: Hospitals, with such other buildings as may be required, at Edgewood Arsenal (Md.), Camp Hancock (Ga.), Camp Joseph E. Johnston (Fla.), Camp Beauregard (La.), Camp MacArthur (Tex.), Camp Fremont (Cal.), and nitrate plant, Perryville (Md.), and such hospitals, with other necessary buildings, hereafter vacated by the War Department, as may be required and found suitable for the needs of the Public Health Service for hospital or sanatoria purposes.

For the purpose of such remodeling of or additions to the above-named plants as may be required to adapt them to the needs and uses of the Public Health Service, the sum of $750,000 is hereby authorized.

The National Soldiers' Home at Hot Springs, S. Dak., with its present equipment complete, is hereby made available for the use of the Public Health Service, in whole or as much thereof as is not required for the purposes for which these facilities were provided, for a period of five years from the approval of this act, unless sooner released by the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service.

The Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to transfer without charge to the Secretary of the Treasury for the use of the Public Health Service such hospital furniture and equipment, including hospital and medical supplies, motor trucks, and other motor-driven vehicles, in good condition, not required by the War Department, as may be required by the Public Health Service for its hospitals.

In carrying the foregoing authorization into effect, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to execute the contract with the Shank Co. hereinbefore specified with such verbal changes as are made necessary by a change in the contracting officers, and to assume all obligations in said contract contained, and to purchase materials and labor in the open market, or otherwise, and to employ laborers and mechanics for the construction of such buildings and their equipment as in his judgment shall best meet the public exigencies, within the limits of cost herein authorized.

For the purpose of carrying the foregoing authorizations into effect, there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be immediately available and remain available until expended, the sum of $6,890,000, and for furniture and equipment not otherwise provided for, the sum of $210,000, in all, $7,100,000.

And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to employ, for service within or without the District of Columbia, without regard to civil-service laws, rules, and regulations, and to pay from the sums hereby authorized and appropriated for construction purposes, at customary rates of compensation, such additional technical and clerical services as may be necessary, exclusively to aid in the preparation of the drawings and specifications for the above-named objects and supervision of the execution thereof, for traveling expenses, and printing incident thereto at a total limit of cost for such additional technical and clerical services and traveling expenses, etc., of not exceeding $210,000 of the above-named limit of cost. All of the above-mentioned work shall be under the direction and supervision of the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

There is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for necessary personnel, including regular and reserve commissioned officers of the Public Health Service and clerical help in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, and maintenance, hospital supplies and equipment, leases, fuel, lights, and water, and freight, transportation, and travel and reasonable burial expenses (not exceeding $100 for any patient dying in hospital), $785,333 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919.

As far as feasible the new construction herein authorized shall be of fire-resisting character.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Beckham	Henderson	Nugent	Smoot
Borah	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Spencer
Brandegee	Jones, Wash.	Page	Sterling
Chamberlain	Kellogg	Pittman	Sutherland
Colt	Kenyon	Poindexter	Swanson
Culberson	King	Pollock	Thomas
Curtis	La Follette	Robinson	Thompson
Dillingham	Lenroot	Saulsbury	Townsend
Fletcher	Lewis	Shafroth	Trammell
France	McCumber	Sheppard	Underwood
Frelinghuysen	McKellar	Sherman	Warren
Gay	McLean	Shields	Watson
Hale	McNary	Simmons	Wolcott
Harding	Myers	Smith, Ariz.
Hardwick	New	Smith, S. C.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-eight Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, on the 27th day of January the House passed a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to provide hospital and sanatorium facilities for discharged and disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines. That bill came to the Senate on the following day and was referred to the Committee on Appropriations. It was subsequently referred by the Senate, at the request of that committee, to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

On the 5th day of December last the House passed an act providing for the establishment of sanatoriums for the treatment of persons discharged from the military and naval forces of the United States, and for other purposes. That bill came to the Senate, and on the 11th day of December it was referred to the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine. By request of that committee the bill was subsequently referred by the Senate to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

In the meantime the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, under the resolution introduced by the Senator from Arkansas, who is now presiding over the Senate [Mr. ROBINSON in the chair], had gone into an exhaustive examination and investigation of the hospital facilities, with a view to discovering exactly how these hospital facilities ought to be provided over the country. Upon the conclusion of the investigation by the subcommittee the Public Buildings and Grounds Committee of the Senate unanimously reported the committee amendment that I have just had read as a substitute for House bill 13026, that substitute embracing, however, the subject matter of both bills passed by the House.

Mr. President, it is a matter of vital interest, one, in my opinion, that engages and involves the honor of Congress, that this legislation should be passed at an early date.

On that subject let me quote from a letter written by former Secretary McAdoo to the Speaker of the House of Representatives under date of November 18, 1918. After referring to the two House bills to which I have invited the attention of the Senate, the Secretary said:

> Since these estimates were transmitted to Congress an armistice has been declared and hostilities ceased, but while these are happy conditions it has, as a matter of fact, foreshortened the day and hour when hospital accommodations must be made available and has pressed home to me the tremendous responsibility of supplying accommodations for the sick and disabled discharged soldiers and sailors who will soon return from overseas in overwhelming numbers, and I can not too strongly urge upon you to exercise all your influence to translate the proposed legislation into law as one of utmost importance, in order that the Government may carry out this part of its contract with the soldiers and sailors who have so magnificently carried out their entire contract with the Government, and to this end request that this legislation be made a special rule in the House in order that funds may be made immediately available for the purpose above stated.
> Respectfully,
> W. G. MCADOO, Secretary.

On January 20, 1919, in a communication addressed to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], chairman of the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine, Secretary Glass used this language:

> I particularly desire to enlist your most active cooperation in considering these bills, both of which I understand have been introduced in the Senate, in order that the utmost expeditious consideration be given by both branches of Congress, so that this department may be in position to know what action it can take to supply hospital treatment for the very largely increased beneficiaries of the Public Health Service and the War Risk Insurance Bureau, for the latter of which alone the department has the names and addresses of upward of 50,000 cases who are entitled to receive treatment and for which there are absolutely no hospital accommodations available.
> Respectfully,
> CARTER GLASS, Secretary.

Again, under date of January 22, addressing Hon. JAMES A. REED, chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, Secretary Glass used this language in impressing upon Congress the urgency of action in respect to this matter:

> It is my understanding that similar bills have been introduced in the Senate, and hearings are being held by appropriate committees, and in which I assumed you are especially interested; and I wish particularly to express to the Senate through you my intense interest in this legislation to provide hospital accommodations for a portion of the beneficiaries of the War Risk Insurance Bureau.
> I wish also to invite your attention to the fact that this department has collaborated with the War and Navy Departments in regard to the need of hospitalization, and to state that a conference was held on September 11 with representatives of these departments. While as a result of this conference it was recommended that 13,000 beds be immediately supplied at an estimated cost of $26,000,000, I have, however, recommended that approximately only one-third of this number be authorized at this time, anticipating that with the coming of peace other hospitals of the Government might become available for the use of this department; but from reports showing constant increases in the number of beneficiaries of the war risk insurance, I am more than ever impressed with the need of having this legislation enacted into law at the earliest possible moment, in order to enable this department to at once establish such hospitals as will undoubtedly be required for many years, letting future developments in the way of releasing other hospitals determine whether it will be necessary to ask for additional legislation, or if hospitals already owned by the Government can be turned over for the care and treatment of these patients.
> Respectfully,
> CARTER GLASS, Secretary.

Now, Mr. President, I want to invite the attention of the Senate for just one moment to the difference between the House bills referred to and the committee amendment which is in the nature of a substitute. The House bills, H. R. 12917 and H. R. 13026, passed by the House of Representatives and referred to the Senate committee, carried authorizations for hospital construction and buildings required in connection therewith which provided only 5,500 beds for patients, at a cost of $12,000,000, in round figures.

The committee's substitute, on the other hand, provides beds for more than 9,000 patients—to be accurate, I think the number is 9,341—at a cost for buildings, including furniture and equipment, of only $7,100,000. It does this by making available certain Army hospitals and equipment not now required by the War Department, and provides for increasing the number of patient accommodations by later transfers, under general legislation, which is contained in the bill, from Army hospitals. New construction is necessary and is essential to an economical admission of patients of the War Risk Insurance and Public Health Service to provide accommodations at points where such patients will go for treatment, and thereby decrease the amount otherwise payable under the War Risk Bureau to beneficiaries under that legislation.

The Senate committee included in its amendment in the nature of a substitute a provision for maintenance for these hospitals up to July 1 next, because it is perfectly apparent that they could not get this appropriation in any one of the ordinary ways in which Congress makes appropriations of this character. It is not without precedent that this should be done. When the leprosy hospital was constructed, the same procedure was had for a limited period of time until another fiscal year began. The reason for that is that, unless this is done, some of these hospitals will be provided before the end of this fiscal year without a single dollar with which to operate them, while thousands of patients are demanding admittance into them, and are entitled to it under the law.

The estimates for operation and maintenance of hospitals for four months of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, on the basis of 3,000 beds, are as follows:

Doctors, 100 at $2,500 per annum, for four months, $83,333.

Nurses, 250 at $720 per annum, for four months, $60,000.

Attendants, 600 at $600 per annum, for four months, $120,000.

Maintenance at $1.25 per day per person for four months, $450,000.

Fuel, light, and water, $62 per annum, for four months, $62,000.

Freight, transportation, and travel, $10,000.

These amounts make a total of $785,333, which is the amount carried in the bill for this purpose.

Annual appropriations of this character are usually secured through the Appropriations Committee, but are included in this bill, as cited just now, because of the fact that certain of these hospitals will be almost immediately available, but will be without any funds provided for their operation and to provide only the usual salaries of doctors, nurses, attendants, and for the expense of maintenance regularly carried in annual appropriation estimates for existing hospitals in the public service. Such estimates could not be submitted to the Appropriations Committee for the reason that estimates can not be made until the buildings have been authorized by law; and there will probably not be sufficient time after this authorization is granted—that is, after this bill shall have been passed—to obtain the necessary appropriations for the operation and maintenance of the hospitals herein provided.

Mr. President, let me say to the Senate that there is the utmost need for urgent action of some character with respect to this matter. Three thousand discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines, who, under the provisions of the wark-risk legislation, are entitled to hospital accommodations, are already being treated by these agencies of the Public Health Service, and it must be borne in mind by the Senate that, while the Army, the Navy, and the Marine Corps in like manner look after these people so long as they remain in the service and until they are discharged, the very moment these men are discharged from the military service, whether they are soldiers or sailors or marines, they can no longer enter the Army and Navy hospitals. However, under the provisions of the legislation which we enacted creating the War Risk Insurance Bureau, they are entitled to certain benefits from the Government, including hospital treatment within a limited period of time—I think, 12 months—if their troubles can in any way be traced to anything which was caused by the war or connected in any way with their service in the war.

The officers of this service, the chief medical adviser of the War Risk Insurance Bureau, and the Assistant Surgeon General of the Public Health Service informed me that they already have 3,000 patients of this kind that they are caring for without any extra hospital accommodations being provided; that they are renting space sometimes from other hospitals and sometimes from private concerns; that, in addition to that, they have 15,000 pending applications, and that they are receiving them at the rate of 100 a day or more.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that there can be no question in the Senate or anywhere in the American Congress that we owe a moral obligation in this matter, just as the former Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McAdoo, said; when these men were put in our Army under the drastic conscription laws that we passed we promised them that we would give them hospital treatment and its benefits when we passed the war-risk legislation. Now the time has come to redeem that obligation. I think there ought not to be, and I do not believe there will be, the slightest disposition on the part of Congress not to carry out its contract and measure up to its responsibility in this regard.

It developed during the very voluminous hearings that the Subcommittee on Public Buildings and Grounds held—I hold in my hand the first volume of the printed testimony, comprising 900 pages, and there is still another volume to come—that the Army had a good many thousand hospital beds in excess of its requirements. It also developed, as different Secretaries of the Treasury have pointed out, that the War Risk Insurance Bureau and the Public Health Service, on whose shoulders are loaded the discharge of the obligations to which I have just referred, require immediately at least 13,000 beds. It seemed to your committee investigating this subject that it was a serious proposition to be met with the statement that one branch of the public service had an excess of hospital accommodations above its requirements and that another branch needed hospital facilities, and yet that we could not utilize those we had already bought and paid for.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HARDWICK. I do; yes, sir.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I was told the other evening that the hospital accommodations here in the District of Columbia are more than ample, that there are many beds that are being paid for every day, and that there is no use whatever for them. I want to ask the Senator if there is any truth in that report?

Mr. HARDWICK. I will say to the Senator that I was about to refer to what I think the Senator has in his mind. I presume the Senator has reference to the Walter Reed Hospital?

Mr. SMOOT. No; not to the Walter Reed Hospital. I will say to the Senator very frankly that the young man from whom I gathered this information did not make the statement to me, but he was making it to another person and I overheard it. I will say that he was the brother of one of the doctors in this District.

Mr. HARDWICK. Residing in the District?

Mr. SMOOT. He was in the District. I forget the number of beds he stated that were being paid for and the amount which was paid for each bed. The statement seemed to me to be extravagant. There are only, as I remember, some 28 of those beds that are being utilized here in the District.

Mr. HARDWICK. To what hospital did this young man refer, does the Senator know? If he can name the hospital, perhaps I can give him the information he desires.

Mr. SMOOT. It did not sufficiently impress me at the time to pay very much attention to it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Then I shall have to answer the Senator in a general way.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I want the Senator to refer to the matter, if he will.

Mr. HARDWICK. I can give an answer in a general way.

We insisted during all the weary weeks of this investigation that that was the policy that this Government ought to adopt. I know there is not a Senator in this Chamber on either side of this aisle who will contend otherwise. It was utter folly, looking at the matter from the standpoint of the taxpayer, to say that, if we had reasonably suitable accommodations that belonged to one branch of the Government service and they did not need them, that they could not be utilized by another branch of the public service that did need them.

I admit that I was somewhat driven—not entirely, but partially—from that position by the contention—and it is a strong one—that the Army hospitals were of temporary construction, that they were not in every case, or were not in many cases, reasonably suited for reconstruction hospitals; but the fact remains—and the committee has demonstrated it, and the committee that investigated it was unanimously of that opinion—that there was a part of these Army hospitals that by the expenditure of a little money, might be reasonably adapted to reconstruction hospital work.

So, when the two bills of the House came to us for action we evolved this plan: First, we sent for the Secretary of War and we stated to him, "This is the policy that ought to be adopted in the interest of the taxpayers; no little bureau jealousies between the War Department and any of these bureaus and the War Department or any of its bureaus must be allowed to interfere with the interests of the taxpayers of the country on this question. So far as the Army has hospitals that are suitable for this purpose, where they can possibly be surrendered, they must be surrendered for the use of the people who need them."

The Secretary of War, I will say to his credit, agreed heartily and readily to that proposition, and he proceeded to instruct the officials of his department that they must carry out that policy. As a result of that, we have framed legislation here that provides 9,340 beds for the use of the War Risk Insurance Bureau and the Public Health Service at a cost of $7,000,000, as against 5,500 beds provided for by the House at a cost of $12,000,000. We did that by getting several thousand beds—6,000, at least, I think—from the Army by the cooperation of the Secretary of War and by turning over certain Army hospitals, which were designated by the Secretary of War, and were expressly included in this bill.

Objection is made that we particularize and name the Army camps. Let me submit the question to the good sense of every Senator here. The House bill provided that no dollar of this $12,000,000 that they appropriated should be available until the Secretary of War had turned over to the Secretary of the Treasury all such hospitals as were suitable and that he could spare. Senators know what that meant in administration. They started out in the hearings before us by saying that there were practically none that they could spare. The other people started out by saying that there were practically none that they would have. So, when we got the actual meaning of it, it meant that they were going to say to us, "Give us $12,000,000 and let us build new hospitals to suit ourselves."

The Army was not prepared to give up anything. So we thought that, instead of generalizing, we had better require the Army to submit to the Public Health and the War Risk Insurance people an exact list and specifications of what they could furnish them and see whether the Public Health people and the War Risk Insurance Bureau would not agree that they were suitable or could be made suitable for the uses for which they were desired.

Mr. SMOOT. Is it the intention to maintain the hospitals that are now located at the different cantonments?

Mr. HARDWICK. Temporarily during the demobilization of the Army, as the Army needs them, as demobilization proceeds. That is one reason why we could not get them all at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. What is the plan of utilizing the hospitals at the cantonments after the demobilization shall have been concluded?

Mr. HARDWICK. The plan is that, so far as they can be adapted to the service of the reconstruction hospitals, they are to be used by them, for we have already bought them and paid for them; and it would be foolish to buy others if we can possibly utilize them, even if they are not quite so well suited for the purpose as some experts would like to have them.

Mr. SMOOT. Are not the hospital instruments at the cantonments and the necessary equipment in fair condition, as compared with the hospitals of the United States elsewhere?

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, I must admit that there is some conflict in the testimony which we took on that subject. The Army people contend that they are and the other people say they are not. They say that many of the hospitals at the cantonments are temporary structures; that they are inflammable; that they are not fireproof; and that, not having the same organization as has a military hospital, it would not be safe to put their civilian patients in them, even when they are discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines.

Mr. SMOOT. I was referring to the hospital instruments and equipment.

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, I think they must be all right.

Mr. SMOOT. They are up to date.

Mr. HARDWICK. And we provide on that subject that they shall be transferred from the Army, which does not need them, to the Public Health Service, which does need them, instead of buying them over again.

If we had relied on the general proposition laid down by the House on this subject, that the Army must give what it could and these other people must take what they need, if those offered were suitable, the Senator from Utah and other Senators must understand that it would have amounted to nothing. So we said to them, "Specify; give us a list of what you can give that is suitable to this work and let us submit it to these other people and see if they do not admit that they can be used." In accordance with that plan your committee succeeded in getting quite a number of these hospitals.

There is outlined in the bill—and I leave for a moment the building projects provision and take the hospitals that we are acquiring from the Army—this provision:

There are hereby permanently transferred to the Treasury Department for the use of the Public Health Service for hospital or sanatoria or other uses the following properties, with their present equipment, including sites and leases, or so much thereof as may be required by the Public Health Service, including mechanical equipment in connection therewith, and approaches thereto, with authority to lease or purchase sites not owned by the Government, as follows: Hospitals, with such other buildings as may be required, at Edgewood Arsenal (Md.), Camp Hancock (Ga.), Camp Joseph E. Johnston (Fla.), Camp Beauregard (La.), Camp MacArthur (Tex.), Camp Fremont (Cal.), and nitrate plant, Perryville (Md.), and such hospitals, with other necessary buildings, hereafter vacated by the War Department, as may be required and found suitable for the needs of the Public Health Service for hospital or sanatoria purposes.

Of course, the last clause is general, to cover any hospital that they may hereafter be able to turn over without additional legislation; and we thought it was best to specify the hospitals they said they were willing to turn over and which the other people said were reasonably suited for their uses and put it in the law that they should be turned over.

Now, just a word as to the location of these hospitals. I have heard some quiet suggestion—I will not say criticism—that we ought not to specify locations in this bill. The committee did not select a single project in this bill. We asked the War Department to give to these people a list of what they could furnish. We did not care whether the buildings were located in Maine, in California, in Florida, in Maryland, or anywhere else; it was merely a question of getting what we could that was suited for the use we had for it. There is not a member of the committee who knew or even inquired where any one of these hospitals were located that would be given; and I do not think there is a member of the committee, although it happens that some of the military hospitals that are to be turned over are located in States represented by Senators on this committee, would have cared a rap if he did know. For instance, I will take my own case to illustrate, because it is more or less a personal matter. Camp Hancock, Ga., was put on this list, but I had no more idea than the man in the moon that they were going to do so; I did not request it and did not care one rap whether it was put on or not, so that if anybody says that these were southern camps, or anything like that, it is merely because they were located there, the facilities were there, and, if they are used at all, they will have to be used where they are located.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator has made a very clear and satisfactory statement regarding the action of the committee up to this time. I should like to have some information regarding the other building projects.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am coming to that right now. I put this other matter first because I knew there could be no possible doubt in any Senator's mind that we were right to specify in regard to these things; otherwise it would amount absolutely to nothing.

Now, I come to the building projects, the construction projects that we authorized. I have heard in a perfectly friendly way the suggestion made that we had better have followed the plan laid down by the House, namely, to have left to some commission, to be selected either by the President, as was provided in one bill, or by the Secretary of the Treasury, as was provided in the other bill, the location of the hospitals that were to be constructed for this new reconstruction work. I wish to answer that suggestion, and I think I can answer it to the satisfaction of every disinterested mind. In the first place, let me say that I have never thought that, in appropriating money, Congress ought to shift its responsibility to anybody else. I have never thought that, when we were making these appropriations out of the Public Treasury, we ought so far to abdicate our own functions as to say that we will not specify where anything is to be done or where any money is to be spent, even when we are providing it. I have always realized the potency of the suggestion that the administrative officers of the Government, possessing information on these questions and being, or supposed to be, experts about them, ought to have opinions and that those opinions ought to weigh very strongly with whatever committees of Congress are acting in the premises.

But I say to you that it so happens in this case that no member of the committee named or suggested a single building project that went into this plan. What we did was to coordinate all these officials and get them to come together and say, "What is the very least you can get along with for the present to discharge these obligations that have come upon you and are coming by the thousands, besides what the Army can give you? Tell us what you need and why you need it and where you need it."

And now I want to invite attention, particularly that of the Senator from Colorado, to exactly what that means. The difference between the position of the Senate and that of the House, so far as locating these projects is concerned, is the difference between tweedledum and tweedledee. Why? The House said, "We will let the sites be named by a commission, in one bill providing that the commission shall be named by the President of the United States and in the other by the Secretary of the Treasury. Whether the President of the United States or the Secretary of the Treasury named the commission, under the House bill, as it passed, he would name the very men who acted on this question, in conjunction with your Senate committee. The heads of these great hospital services made the recommendations. We did not ask them to do anything except to tell us where they were obliged to have these hospitals located and which were the most advantageous and suitable places for them. If we had followed the plan laid down by the House, what would we have had to do? We would have had to appropriate millions of dollars in a lump-sum appropriation, letting these people shift the fund around—and it would have been a considerable one—from one project to another and from one location to another, to spend as much here as they wanted and as much there as they wanted.

That was the House plan, and it provided neither itemization nor specification for it. We thought that it was in the interest of real economy and of correct legislation to require these men to say where they were going to spend this money before we appropriated it, and not afterwards; to let them say how much of this money they wanted to spend on each project before we appropriated it, and not afterwards. Under the House bill they could have done the day after the President signed the bill exactly what we asked them to do the day before this committee acted on this matter; that is all.

I thought myself that we ought to give these people, in view of our moral obligations to the soldiers who have fought for us, in view of our obligations to these great services of the Government, and in view of the situation that confronts us, such hospital accommodations as they absolutely required, and I did not want to put my judgment against their judgment as to location and as to these specific projects which they thought were best for the public good. Not only that, but they are pressing for time.

The biggest project in this bill in the way of construction is what is known as the Speedway Hospital in Chicago—a hospital planned for the Army, a hospital with a capacity of 2,500 beds, according to the plans submitted to the Army, and which the Public Health Service say will have at least 2,000 beds under their hospital plan. It was one of the hospitals that was offered to the Government under a contract with a large indemnity, to be furnished at a cost of $1,300 a bed—to be exact, at a cost of $1,304. The hospitals of temporary construction erected at the cantonments during the war cost just about that same figure; and it is a fact which I am glad to call to the attention of the Senate that our investigation shows, according to the unanimous judgment of the committee, that this hospital project was the cheapest permanent fireproof hospital project that had even been offered to the Government of the United States.

The bill passed by the House provided these hospital accommodations at a cost of more than $2,000 a bed. The lowest figure made by the gentlemen who represent this service as to the cost per bed was $1,700, and this proposition was $1,300 per bed. Furthermore, it must be remembered that 15,000 discharged soldiers are already clamoring for these facilities; it must be remembered that the applications are coming in many hundreds every week and many thousands every month, and they will increase as the Army comes home from Europe and is demobilized. This hospital was about two-thirds constructed when the Public Health Service begged us to let them take over the contract, which the War Department had finally turned down just before the armistice was signed, my own opinion being largely because the War Department was already overstocked with hospitals, and we thought it was a good proposition to agree to.

Mr. SMOOT. In the hearing was anything developed to show, as reported in the public press, that there was fraud connected with the Speedway Hospital?

Mr. HARDWICK. I am very glad the Senator has asked that question. The charge was made that an employee of the Government solicited a bribe in connection with securing the approval of this contract. It was made by the projectors of the enterprise and was sworn to. It was stoutly denied, and much evidence for and against it was given the committee that investigated the subject. While the committee has not made its report yet on account of the delay in furnishing the testimony from the Government Printing Office, it is confronted by the fact that the Department of Justice has the matter in hand on reference of the Attorney General, and the case concerning which the Senator has asked is to be tried in the courts of law. Therefore as one member of the committee I hesitate now or later to express any opinion I might have as to the guilt or innocence of this man.

Mr. SMOOT. I think that is a very proper attitude.

Mr. HARDWICK. But let me say this, that so far as the Speedway proposition is concerned, three commissions appointed, two of them by the Assistant Secretary of War and one by the Secretary, commissions that went into the investigation with a hostile atmosphere about them, reported this was a splendid business project, and one of them said, almost, I think, in these words, that it was the best that had ever been offered to the Government, and in no quarter, I will say, with its rejection by the War Department, in the manner I have indicated and for the reasons to which I have referred staring us in the face, has any man raised his voice to deny that it was a clean proposition, and not only a clean proposition but the best business proposition that was ever offered this Government anywhere as a hospital proposition, fireproof, and of a permanent character.

Personally, I am glad to have a chance to say, because when a man gets under the ban of public displeasure it is mighty easy to stay there, that I think Mr. Edward Hines, who was the principal owner of this hospital, acted with generosity to the Government, inspired, I suppose, largely by the fact that he had lost a son in France in this war, and gave to the Government a splendid project. I am corroborated in that opinion by Maj. Stotesbury as to the facts in the case, who has given them in his report, and who states as a matter of absolute knowledge that the cost of this hospital is at least $400 a bed under the very lowest that can ever be put against it for a permanent fireproof hospital.

The Secretary of War, the Surgeon General, the Assistant Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, the chief medical officer of the War Risk Insurance Bureau, the chief of construction in the War Department; in fact, every official who has ever examined this project, including three separate commissions, have reported it the very best hospital project that could be offered. Under those circumstances, with that hospital two-thirds completed and with the demand for hospital facilities—and although there is no legal obligation upon the part of the Government, there is at least a moral obligation, in the opinion of the committee, that the Government should meet, and which it will not meet unless something is done—we thought it was the better economy to adopt their recommendation as to this hospital, because the Public Health Service wanted something they could get quick and use at once. They intend to use it, I will say to the Senator, as their principal distributing hospital. It is a very large hospital, located in Chicago, which is probably somewhere near the center of population considering transportation in the United States, and they think it splendidly situated so that they can send out their supplies from there, and make it their general headquarters. Only this morning these gentlemen urged me, no matter what else happened to this bill, to insist upon the Speedway project in the interest of the public service and of giving them some speedy means of meeting the demands made on them by these soldiers and to retain this project in this bill, no matter what else is done.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield.

Mr. KING. I have not had the pleasure of hearing all of the Senator's statement, and what I am asking now may have been covered by him. If so, I will not ask him to repeat it.

Mr. HARDWICK. I will be very glad to give the Senator the information again, if it has already been given.

Mr. KING. Did the committee reach the conclusion that it was within the province of the War Department to operate hospitals of the character provided for in this bill?

Mr. HARDWICK. No; the committee has not yet made a formal report. I can tell the Senator what my own opinion is. No; I will not do that; I will tell him what the Secretary of War says about it. The Secretary of War said that that was one reason why he doubted whether or not he could take over the Speedway Hospital at all—that the law officers had given him the opinion that the funds given to the War Department for hospital purposes were for temporary hospitals, and not for permanent fireproof hospitals; and while he was not conceding that, he said that that was the contention that had been advanced. I do not remember that he said that his law advisors told him that; but, at any rate, without conceding the correctness of it, he was so doubtful in regard to it that he thought it was better for the Public Health Service to have it. He frankly conceded to me that there might be a moral obligation there, and he said that if so he should favor the appropriation of whatever amount of money was necessary to make the projectors of this enterprise whole again. So, I say, in providing this hospital we will do it $400 a bed cheaper than anything else in this bill in the way of construction and avoid a row over a moral obligation amounting to at least a million dollars that will vex Congress in the future unless we handle it now.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me a moment further——

Mr. HARDWICK. Certainly.

Mr. KING. What I had in mind was the administration of all of these hospitals. It occurred to me—and it is merely a first-blush opinion and is not entitled to very much weight—that the War Department, because it has so many surgeons now at its command and has so many hospitals growing out of the war, those at the cantonments and at other places, could much more cheaply and perhaps more efficiently operate these hospitals that are needed to take care of men who come out of the military service and who may need medical attention.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; I am very glad to give the Senator the War Department's view on that subject, and I must say that I share Mr. Secretary Baker's opinion. The Secretary thinks not. He thinks the hospital accommodations under the War Department ought to be very much and very sharply decreased with the demobilization of the Army and brought to a permanent peace status, whatever that is, and that all this other work ought to be done by the civilian branches of the Government, and for this reason: A military hospital is a very different thing from a civilian hospital; and once men are discharged from the military service, after their experience with military hospitals, they are not anxious to enter military hospitals again, but prefer to go to civilian hospitals, where different measures and different methods are employed.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin with pleasure.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me a moment further, I suppose there might be some modification of the military discipline, or the modus operandi.

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, you will never get that from a military administration, Mr. President.

Mr. KING. One other question and then I shall have concluded.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. With the demobilization of the Army, are there not a large number of hospitals, at the cantonments and elsewhere, under the control of the military authorities now, that would be suitable for the purposes for which these hospitals are desired?

Mr. HARDWICK. Undoubtedly; and we have taken care of that in the general provision carried in the bill already; and as the Army is demobilized, and the more rapidly it is demobilized, still more will that be true. There will undoubtedly be a certain amount of space in fireproof hospitals of a different character from what the Army can furnish.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. I merely wanted to suggest, in response to the first question of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], as to the Army being better equipped to take care of this work than the Public Health Service, that the Public Health Service now is operating something like 22 hospitals, and it has an organization that is quite as well equipped to operate these hospitals as is the Army.

Mr. HARDWICK. And much larger than that of the Army in normal times, I will add.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. I will say, in reference to the proposed hospital at Dawson Springs, Ky., that there is the same sort of a showing. It is not as strong on the financial end of it and not as large as the Chicago project, but there are reasons for it, which the Senator from Kentucky will explain. That is intended as a tuberculosis hospital. The Senator from Kentucky corrects me and says it is only partially. There a gift of 5,000 acres of ground has been proffered to the Government, absolutely without any charge of any sort, by the people who own the ground. The gentlemen at the head of this hospital service insist that a large number of cases that they handle are such as require large grounds, where people can exercise and do light physical work out in the open air and in the grounds, and they say that this hospital is absolutely essential to their service.

We knew that if the proposition passed in the form provided by the House they would as a matter of fact select these places anyhow; but we thought it was better, when we knew that these were the exact selections they were going to make, to itemize and specify and hold them down, instead of giving them a lump-sum appropriation to shift around and shift about.

So with the hospital at Norfolk. They asked for $900,000 for a complete hospital plant at Norfolk, Va. They handle the marines that are discharged there, and they handle the seamen of the merchant marine there. They insist that Norfolk, the second largest port on the Atlantic seaboard, is one of the places where it is absolutely necessary, if we are to maintain an American merchant marine in the future, that they shall be able to supply these accommodations.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question right there?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator says Norfolk is the second largest port on the Atlantic.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is my understanding.

Mr. THOMAS. I am not questioning it. Are there not hospital facilities at Newport News and at Norfolk which have been either constructed in connection with the present war or were there theretofore?

Mr. HARDWICK. I will say, if the Senator pleases, that I made that specific inquiry, and I directed that it be made by these officers of the War Department and the Public Health Service and the War Risk Insurance Bureau, and they say "no." I thought so, too, until I had the matter investigated, and they reported that it was not the case.

The only other building provision that they have put in besides the three I have mentioned was a proposition to provide a small hospital in the District of Columbia for this city for this reconstruction war work. I did not undertake to control or influence their selection of these sites. They insisted that this city was the head of their organization, that the Surgeon General was here and his chief medical advisers, and that they ought to have one hospital here at the seat of the Government; and the committee yielded, as it did in all these cases, to their judgment about these matters.

I will say to the Senator from Colorado that if we were to adopt the plan that is embodied in the House bill the only difference on earth would be that these same men, after the bill was signed, would in all probability select these same sites, because that is the judgment they gave to the committee. I will say to the Senator, too, that they tell me, and tell me only this morning, that if that is done, and if they have to have commissions to settle these things, there will be still more delay, with 15,000 soldiers and sailors begging for this sort of service, and thousands of them coming in every month. I think the figure they gave me—I want to be substantially accurate—was 100 a day, at least, and they stated that that number was liable to grow larger as demobilization proceeded somewhat more speedily than it is proceeding at the present time; and I know we all want to see that done.

Mr. President, I have undertaken to give to the Senate, with all the fullness of detail that I could, and at the cost of using much more time than I liked to take, the reasons for the passage of this bill. The committee that framed it is proud of it. It represents a month of as hard work as I ever did in my life. I want to say that the Senators who served on that committee—the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], and who helped do this work, together with the Senator from Georgia—worked faithfully and hard. We gave to the Senate and to the country the very best service of which we were capable. We endeavored to solve this problem in what we think is a wise and prudent and economical way for the Government of the United States. As against 5,500 beds carried in the two House bills, at a cost of $12,000,000, we have given you 9,340 beds, at a cost of $7,000,000. We have established, we hope, forever a policy of coordination between these hospital branches of our Government that we believe means a great deal for the future.

We insist that this legislation ought to be passed, and it ought to be passed without delay, so that we may go to conference with the House of Representatives, and so that we may carry out the contract that we made with these boys when we sent them to Europe. We insist that delay now, when thousands of them are clamoring to have this accommodation given to them, and to have these hospital facilities furnished, is dangerous and unfair.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, before the Senator from Georgia takes his seat, if he will allow me to ask a question for the benefit of the record as well as for the information of myself touching particularly the project in my own county described in this report on the Speedway, I will ask the Senator if the committee or the subcommittee, in making investigations of costs and the amount of money to be paid, disclosed by the comparison of one with the other any particular profit that would inure to those who constructed the building, or was there any evidence in the whole investigation that would lead the committee to conclude that it was either constructed or is now being turned over to the Government for the purpose of private profit to those who constructed it?

Mr. HARDWICK. I have already answered the question of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] on that point, but I am glad to repeat the statement that I then made.

Mr. LEWIS. I must have been out of the Chamber at that time; I have been called out so frequently.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator from Utah asked that question; but I am glad to repeat my answer to it, because the question was not in the exact form in which the Senator from Illinois now puts it. I am glad to give him the information.

The committee has not yet made its report, because the printing of the evidence by the Public Printer has been delayed; but I think I am violating no confidence and misstating no fact when I tell him that the committee is unanimously of the opinion that this is the best hospital project for the construction of a permanent fireproof hospital that was ever submitted to the Government of the United States, from a business standpoint; and I believe personally, and I believe that all the members of the subcommittee believe, that a substantial donation was involved upon the part of the projectors of this enterprise. Any suggestion that it was not an advantageous contract for the Government and one that gave full value and more than full value has never been made by anybody, although it has been investigated by three separate commissions appointed by the War Department.

Mr. LEWIS. I appreciate the viewpoint of the Senator. I particularly desired his expression of opinion, as the report clearly indicates an ultimate demand on the Government, of course, for a certain amount of compensation; and if that compensation merely represents benefits to the people and to the country and not private profits to constructors, I want the State of Illinois to know it, I want the city of Chicago to know it, and, of course, the Senators themselves desire to know it.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am glad to give the Senator that information, and I am also glad to say that if we follow the recommendations of the War Risk Bureau and the Public Health Service, in which the Secretary of War thoroughly concurs, we will eliminate that question by buying this hospital for the branch of the service that needs it, and thereby save a threatened row over a million dollars which I do not hesitate to say that I believe the Government morally owes them, so far as I am concerned, so far as my personal opinion goes.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, is an amendment in order at this time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is well known, Mr. President, that the mountains of North Carolina have been considered to have the best climate for tuberculosis patients anywhere in the United States east of the Rocky Mountains, and the War Department, recognizing that fact, have established three or four tuberculosis hospitals in western North Carolina—one at Biltmore, one near Asheville, one at Wadesboro, and one at Hot Springs. We have a thousand or more tuberculosis patients at this time. The Government has leased what is known as Kenilworth Inn. It is a fireproof hotel which was just completed about two years ago; and I am going to offer an amendment for the Government to take over that hospital. It was not purchased. It is under lease.

I understand that this bill is for the purpose of taking care of soldiers who have been dismissed or discharged. With 10,000 or more tuberculosis patients, with 1,500 in Asheville, N. C., to-day, unless you take over one of these hospitals, what are you going to do with these poor boys that are now breathing the air up there that really keeps them alive? They are there now.

You have one hospital, you say, at Dawson Springs, Ky., for tuberculosis patients that will accommodate only 500. There is no other hospital provided for tuberculosis patients. What are you going to do with them?

The Government officials have said that the place that we have there now is the best place, or one of the best places, in the United States. They have located that hospital and another hospital there. Why not take one of these hospitals and use it for this purpose, because there is no other place that I can see in this bill where you can take care of these 10,000 or more tuberculosis patients?

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, if the Senator will let me suggest an answer to some of his questions, at least, if the War Department had been willing to surrender this hospital to the Public Health Service it would have been included in this bill. They will maintain and operate it as long as they need it; and under the general legislation, if they should cease to need it, then it could be turned over to the Public Health Service.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I have been through this hospital, and I know that the War Department have equipped it with the best equipment that was ever furnished anywhere in the world. I have seen the great radio plant by means of which they examine the lungs, and so forth, of patients. It is there to-day under lease to the Government. It has not been purchased. What are you going to do with these patients when you turn them loose? You can not send them to Kentucky, because there are only 500 beds provided for there. Where are you going to send them? Are you going to send them to Chicago? That is not the place to send tuberculosis patients. Where are you going to send them? Here they are, the Government say, in the best place in the United States for them. They are there to-day, being treated and being cured. All over the United States that is recognized as a splendid place for tuberculosis patients.

I want to ask the Senator if he will not let this amendment go to conference and have the matter investigated, and see if what I am saying about it here is not absolutely true?

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes, sir; I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. I understood the Senator from Georgia to say that the War Department is operating that hospital, and will continue to operate it?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; that is the answer.

Mr. KELLOGG. And when the War Department ceases to operate it the Bureau of the Public Health Service may take it over?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; I understand that; but we are going to demobilize all of our troops, and what are we going to do with them? They have hospitals now taking care of these patients. What is this bill for? I understand that this bill is to take care of the soldiers when they are discharged.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is it.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator evidently did not understand me.

Mr. OVERMAN. Perhaps not.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator from Georgia said that the War Department is going to operate that particular hospital. If it is operated by the War Department, why turn it over to somebody else?

Mr. OVERMAN. Why, Mr. President, those soldiers will not be under the War Department when they are discharged.

Mr. THOMAS. If they still operate the hospital, what difference does it make?

Mr. HARDWICK. It does not make any difference. They will operate it, and if they want to turn it over they can do it.

Mr. BECKHAM. Mr. President, let me call the Senator's attention to the part of the bill where there is given the list of hospitals to be turned over by the War Department to the Bureau of the Public Health Service. At the close of the paragraph it says that the War Department shall turn over to the Bureau of the Public Health Service—such hospitals, with other necessary buildings, hereafter vacated by the War Department, as may be required and found suitable for the needs of the Public Health Service for hospital or sanatoria purposes.

Our committee had some difficulty in getting together these two branches of the service and to get the War Department to turn over such hospitals as would be suitable for the Public Health Service. We finally got them into cooperation about it, and the War Department has turned over such hospitals now available for this use as that department can spare; and I have no doubt that if the hospital which the Senator speaks of in Asheville—an excellent place for the treatment of tuberculosis—should be abandoned by the War Department for its owns purposes it could turn it over to the Public Health Service.

Mr. OVERMAN. Could the department do that? Where is the appropriation?

Mr. BECKHAM. But you would not take it away from the War Department now if that department still wants the use of it.

Mr. OVERMAN. No; but that is the reason why I want the matter to go to conference, to let the conferees see what the War Department have to say about it. They will tell you that they are willing to turn it over to the Public Health Service, because they have all these men there. They are there to-day, and many of them will soon be discharged. Now, where are you going to send them? Of course, they can continue to operate this place if you will give them the money to operate it; but if you are going to turn over these hospitals for the purpose of putting them under the charge of the Bureau of the Public Health Service, why should you not do this? What is the objection to it? It is recognized as the place for a tuberculosis hospital, because they have three or four hospitals there now, and thousands of men there with tuberculosis; and this is a fireproof building, just completed, and equipped by the War Department as the result of the expenditure of a great amount of money.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do.

Mr. LENROOT. I merely wish to ask the Senator if he is aware that the policy of the War Department is not to discharge soldiers having tuberculosis so rapidly as other soldiers, so long as they believe they can help the soldiers? And so these hospitals will continue to be utilized. They will be the very last to be abandoned by the War Department.

Mr. OVERMAN. I did not know what the policy was. I thank the Senator for informing me of that fact. But while that is true, some of them are going to be discharged; and since this is the place of all places in the United States that they have selected as a place for tuberculosis patients, some of them ought to be kept there; and why not?

All I want is to have this matter go to conference. If the Senators, after examining it, do not say that it is the place of all places to take care of these tuberculosis patients, and if it has not been so recommended by the War Department and by the Navy Department, why, let it go out. That is all I ask.

Mr. BECKHAM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do.

Mr. BECKHAM. If we should require the War Department to turn over that hospital now to the Public Health Service it would not be available for the treatment of those soldiers who have not yet been discharged from the service. The War Department are treating them now.

Mr. OVERMAN. Why, Mr. President, they have so many tuberculosis patients up there that they can not get another one in there, and they ought to take care of those boys. Many of them are being discharged. They want to be discharged, Mr. President. As was said here by the Senator from Wisconsin, I believe, they think they would fare better under the Bureau of the Public Health Service than they would under the Army.

Mr. BECKHAM. The Senator understands that the hospitals provided for in this bill are only for soldiers who have been discharged from the service.

Mr. OVERMAN. Well, that is what this is for.

Mr. BECKHAM. The War Department are giving the Public Health Service such hospitals as they can spare, and we have a right to assume that they can not spare this hospital at the present time.

Mr. OVERMAN. I can tell you, Mr. President, that they will spare it. They are willing to spare it and anxious to have you take it over. All I want you to do is to carry the matter to conference, and if it is not so, I am willing to let it go out.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I can tell him the only difficulty about doing that. The Senator knows the very high regard I have for him.

Mr. OVERMAN. Oh, everybody knows that the Senator from Georgia and I are great friends.

Mr. HARDWICK. But the trouble about the Senator's request is this: We have not put in any proposition here for any Senator.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not ask the Senate to put it in for me. The Senator knows that I would not ask that.

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, no; I mean we have not put in any proposition here upon the floor, or without making a careful investigation and calculating the expense, or without the recommendation, which has been controlling, of all these cooperating bureaus. We would have to treat the Senator's proposition differently from the way in which we have treated everything else in the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. Every case that has merit you ought to consider and put in.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator is accustomed to handling appropriation bills. He knows that we only put in the things that have been very carefully estimated for, the things that are recommended by the administrative officers who are charged with the administration of the bill. To take from the floor a proposition of this sort gives it a sort of flavor that people want to put their hospitals in the bill. I am always afraid of amendments offered from the floor, and so is the Senator.

Mr. OVERMAN. I generally fight them; but I have found many times that we have put in amendments in that way that we ought to put in.

Mr. HARDWICK. Let me say this to the Senator about this Asheville project, because I think it ought to go into the RECORD: I know that the Public Health Service intend to have a tuberculosis sanitarium at Asheville if they can. They want it at this time; but the War Department were not willing to give up the Senator's hospital.

Mr. OVERMAN. If they are not willing to give it up, I say, knock it out.

Mr. BECKHAM. Then, what would you do with the tuberculous soldiers who have not been discharged? You have got to take care of them.

Mr. OVERMAN. You have got to take care of the men who are discharged and you have got to take care of those that are in there now.

Mr. HARDWICK. There are thousands of them in there now, as the Senator knows. They are still in the Army. They have not been discharged.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not know whether they have or not.

Mr. HARDWICK. I can tell the Senator that they are still in the Army. They would not be there if they were not. They have not been discharged from the Army. They have to be provided for somewhere. If the War Department had included this in the list of properties that they could turn over it would be in this bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. But the Senator from Wisconsin said something that impressed me very much. You have 10,000 hospital beds for these poor boys who are there under military discipline. You ought to treat them as you are going to treat the patients you take in there and let civilians treat them. That is the point. They all prefer to have civilians treat them.

Mr. HARDWICK. I know it; but the trouble about it is this: This demobilization, as Senators have found out, and as I have found out, it is a very gradual process, and we can not take over this hospital that is being used by the Army for military purposes until the Army's reduction in sizes makes it possible to do it. It would not be right to do it. I could not support the proposition for that reason.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator has said that they recognize that there must be a hospital at Asheville.

Mr. HARDWICK. I said they ought to have one there.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is admitted—that they ought to have one at Asheville. The Army has three large ones there now.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. And it has been said here by the Senator that these soldiers prefer to be treated by civilians.

Mr. HARDWICK. They do.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let us take one of these hospitals and put the boys in there that are discharged and have some of the boys discharged that are up there now, under military rule, and let them go into this magnificent building, already appraised by the Government, the price already agreed upon and fixed.

I do hope the Senator will let the amendment go in. I think when he examines it he will find that it is all right. If not, I should not ask to have it retained in the bill. This is not a special matter for North Carolina, because we have four or five hospitals up there now. It is the ideal place for this purpose.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. OVERMAN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Is the Senator proposing an amendment to this bill at the present time?

Mr. OVERMAN. It is an amendment to take over one of these hospitals that the Government now has.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Is the amendment before the Senate?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Has it been read?

Mr. OVERMAN. No; it has not been read.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask that it may be stated, and then I should like to ask the Senator a question in regard to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina proposes an amendment, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 12, it is proposed to insert as a separate paragraph the following:

The sum of $1,250,000 is hereby appropriated for the purchase of General Hospital No. 12, and eight adjoining buildings, with 40 additional acres of land adjoining said hospital, known as Kenilworth Inn and Kenilworth Park, at Biltmore, N. C., now leased by the Government.

And on page 8, line 12, it is proposed to strike out "$6,890,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$8,140,000"; and in line 14 of the same page it is proposed to strike out "$7,100,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$8,350,000."

Mr. OVERMAN. That is only the total.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina whether that hotel is now occupied and used by the War Department as a hospital?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; that is just what I said.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. And it is now under lease by the Government?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. And it is utilized by the Government for the soldiers in the Army, is it not?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. And the Senator's proposal now is to sell it to the Government as a permanent tuberculosis hospital for civilians?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Civilians who become charges on the United States Government?

Mr. OVERMAN. Civilians who have been soldiers, just like these others.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Is it not at the present time utilized by the War Department for a proper purpose? Is there any necessity of changing it at the present time?

Mr. OVERMAN. So it is with every hospital provided for in this bill.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. No; as I understand the bill, it simply proposes to utilize those hospitals which at the present time can be transferred to the Public Health Service from the War Department.

Mr. BECKHAM. Not needed by the War Department.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Not needed by the War Department.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have had a note handed to me from the Secretary of War stating that these are for tuberculosis patients. This note was handed to me on the floor. I want to find out the truth about it. If the bill goes to conference and they need more tuberculosis hospitals, when they have only one provided for in the bill, and that is only a 500-bed hospital, and we are going to have, I understand, 25,000 tuberculosis patients, why should we not provide additional hospital facilities for those poor people?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. If the Senator will suffer a further interruption, I want to say that when the Army is demobilized we will have one hundred times more hospital facilities than we can utilize. There are cantonments all over the South, all the way from Texas to the Virginia line, where there are the finest equipped hospitals that have ever been built. They can be utilized when the Army is demobilized, and it is being demobilized very quickly. Those conveniences and facilities can be utilized without going to the expense of buying the Kenilworth Hotel for $1,200,000.

Mr. OVERMAN. Then you are against any hospital?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. No; I am not against any hospital, but I think——

Mr. OVERMAN. That would apply to the whole bill.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and I know the problems the Treasury Department have to deal with. They have come with this proposal in order that they might be afforded facilities for these tuberculosis sanatoriums. Now the Senator from North Carolina comes forward with a proposition to load the Government down with $1,200,000 worth of property which at the present time is under a lease, and the lease is as far as we ought to go.

Mr. OVERMAN. Would the Senator from New Jersey send our tuberculosis patients to cantonments down in Texas and South Carolina and other places to die on account of not having good air to breathe?

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me for a question?

Mr. OVERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. The hospital facilities to which the Senator refers are now required for the use of men who are in the Army. Is not that true?

Mr. OVERMAN. That is true.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then if you divert those facilities for the use of civilians, you will deprive the soldiers of the country of the facilities which they require.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not think we will have soldiers long. We are going to demobilize the Army and get rid of soldiers.

Mr. ROBINSON. Of course, if the Army is demobilized——

Mr. OVERMAN. If the tuberculous soldiers are allowed to remain in the Army, I have no more to say; but they are not going to be allowed to remain in the Army. I want to take care of these sick people, but I do not want to take care of them as soldiers.

Mr. ROBINSON. As far as I know, the Army is not knowingly discharging soldiers who are seriously afflicted without first doing everything possible to cure them, and it is quite probable that the facilities at Asheville will be required for a long period for the urgent demands of soldiers. In my judgment it would not be in the public interest to divert these facilities from the use to which they are now applied to that contemplated by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. They have several hospitals at Asheville. They have one called the Azalea, in which there are 1,000 or more patients. As those people begin to recuperate and build up they ought to be separated from those who are incurable and transferred half a mile away to this hospital where they can absolutely be cured. That is the point I make. I hope the Senate will agree to the amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina is to be seriously considered, I want to offer two or three amendments of a similar character applicable in a part of the country which does not figure very extensively in the recitals of the bill but which has some reputation for its beneficial atmosphere and sanitary conditions with regard to tuberculosis. I think the explanation made of the bill by the Senator from Georgia is one of the most satisfactory and lucid statements of the reasons which actuated the committee in making its report which it has been my pleasure to hear for a long time. I am not disposed to quarrel with it in the slightest degree; I am satisfied that the committee has done the best it could under the circumstances, due regard being had to the complications of the subject and the necessity for immediate action.

I deplore the fact, nevertheless, Mr. President, that there is nothing in the bill which is designed to furnish facilities for former soldiers who have become afflicted either by wounds or by disease to such an extent that it is the duty of the Nation to care for them and exert its great powers in restoring them to health. The bill appropriates a very considerable sum of money——

Mr. BECKHAM. If the Senator will yield to me, it may be true that the bill does not specifically provide for the care of those men, but they are taken care of in the war-risk insurance act. It becomes the duty of that bureau to take care of the disabled men. We are only providing for hospital accommodations under the War Risk Bureau.

Mr. THOMAS. The War Risk Bureau is a branch of the Government and it is the agency of the Government which administers this trust. The bill provides hospitals for the purposes for which they are to be acquired, which with one remote exception, or possibly two, lie east of a line drawn north and south through the city of Chicago. Beyond that line lies the bulk of the continent, and the Rocky Mountain region is a section of country which nature seems to have designed as a cure for the consumptive. While there are regions in the East which are regarded as beneficial or favorable to the treatment of that disease, the general geographical conditions, the climatic conditions, the atmospheric conditions from the boundaries of the British possessions to those of the Republic of Mexico form a common ground for the consumptive to practically reacquire his health if the disease has not assumed a secondary character.

I happen to know that the Bureau of Health has under consideration and has had for some time a number of propositions from different sections of my State having regard to buildings already constructed and ready for immediate occupation, some of which have been examined, others of which are to be inspected or were to be inspected if this bill should pass as it passed the House. I do not believe that money of the Government could be spent for a better purpose than is designed by this bill. I think this is one of the objects regarding which the Government can not be too liberal unless it reaches the point of extravagance and needless expenditure.

I do not know who formed the commission which conferred with the Senate committee regarding the selection of these places, but I do know that if the Government determines, and I have no doubt it has, to treat these unfortunates as they should be treated, it is its duty and the duty of Congress, instead of concentrating these hospitals upon the Atlantic shore, instead of confining these expenditures to Virginia, North Carolina, Kentucky, and Illinois, to pay due heed to the unquestionable fact that the true home of the man or woman who is suffering from tuberculosis is in the Rocky Mountains, and that in the expenditures for hospital purposes men and women suffering from that terrible malady should be located, as far as possible, in that section of the country.

Yet there is $8,000,000 and more to be expended entirely east of the Missouri River, with the single exception of Camp Fremont, in California.

With due regard, Mr. President, to the committee which conferred from these departments with the Senate committee, that tremendous fact seems to have been strangely overlooked, and this expenditure, like 95 per cent of the expenditures made during the war, is to be made either in the Mississippi Valley or on the Atlantic seacoast. Perhaps I am extravagant. I will say 75 per cent.

Mr. President, while not questioning the good work of the committee, I think the bill should make some provision for the location of a tuberculosis hospital, if additional beds are required, somewhere in the Rocky Mountain region.

Of course, I speak for the people of my own State, and at the suggestion of my colleague [Mr. SHAFROTH] I want to offer an amendment, at the end of line 19, page 5, reading as follows:

> At a place in the State of Colorado, to be selected by the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, on land to be acquired by gift, the necessary buildings for a sanatorium having a capacity of not less than 500 beds. The sum of $750,000 is hereby authorized for the construction of such sanatorium.

Mr. President, let me address myself for a moment to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]. If I properly understood the Senator, the War Department now has three hospitals at the city of Asheville. One of them is Kenilworth Hotel, which it has leased, but which it is utilizing. The Senator from North Carolina, not satisfied with the Government's operation of three hospitals in that section of his State, now proposes to appropriate something like one and a quarter million dollars for the purpose of converting a lease into a freehold, and thereby permanently taking away from the War Department a hospital which it needs and which it refused to give up to this committee, and I suppose it is urged because North Carolina, having this excellent and attractive place, feels that the Government in the exercise of its benevolence and its bounty should make this expenditure there. I do not think so.

Perhaps I am just as selfish as the Senator. I am willing to admit it. At the same time I can say that there is only one hospital operated by the Government in my State, and consequently I am a little more modest than the Senator from North Carolina in that I am merely asking for another, if needed, that the constantly increasing number of consumptives from the Army may be cared for in a congenial atmosphere and under the sunny skies of a land which seems to have been created by nature for the treatment of that disease.

That is all I care to say on the subject.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I merely wish to say, in answer to the Senator from Colorado, that I appreciate his kindly reference to the work of the committee and myself. We have not been unmindful of the very argument he has suggested on this floor. To my certain knowledge these officers wanted to get something from the military people out in Colorado, or in that section of the country, but could not do it, because the Army did not have anything there that it could give up.

I am sorry to say that this is only the beginning of what must be done on this question. A great many of these hospitals have got to be built, no matter how much we may use the Army hospitals, because, in the majority of cases at least, they must be fireproof construction and permanent in character. I have no doubt whatever personally that a hospital of the character desired by the Senator will be located in the Rocky Mountain region, probably in Colorado or some adjoining State, but we were not willing to go into the subject now on an ambitious scale, because we want to see exactly when demobilization takes place and is completed how much we have actually got on our shoulders, instead of estimating for it and guessing at it.

Then, besides that, I want to see to what extent we can use the Army hospitals, which we have already paid for, before we go into this work on a very large scale. Therefore we have held this thing down to a mere pittance compared to what we must eventually expend.

Mr. THOMAS. I will say to the Senator that in my judgment it is the beginning of a policy by the Government that in a few years will result in the taking over of every cantonment hospital in the United States.

Mr. HARDWICK. I hope not.

Mr. THOMAS. I hope not, too.

Mr. HARDWICK. I agree with the Senator there is danger of that.

Mr. THOMAS. That is the logical development of the assumption by the Government of a new activity.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Government, of course, owes a duty to the soldier.

Mr. THOMAS. I am not questioning that.

Mr. HARDWICK. And even if the movement does not assume the alarming proportions stated by the Senator from Colorado, the splendid advantages of the State represented by the Senator can not be overlooked. I think if they could have gotten anything in that State from the Army it would have been in this bill, but there is nothing they could get.

Mr. THOMAS. I think that is true.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think there are two or three of these projects that ought to be carried out.

Mr. THOMAS. There are institutions out there owned by private interests that can be leased.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think that that may have to be done before we fully discharge our obligations in respect to this matter. I am afraid that eventually it will cost the country a great deal of money.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I wish to say a word in relation to the amendment offered by my colleague [Mr. THOMAS]. I saw in the papers the other day that there are 25,000 soldiers afflicted with tuberculosis. If that is the case the number of hospitals or sanatoriums that must be constructed by the United States Government will be very large.

I wish to call the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill also to the fact that in the amendment that has been offered by the senior Senator from Colorado it is provided that it is to be at a place to be selected by the Surgeon General in Colorado, on land to be acquired by gift, that the necessary buildings are to be constructed for a sanatorium, having a capacity of not less than 500 beds, and the expenditure of $750,000 is authorized for the construction of such a sanatorium. I call attention to the fact that as to these others the cost is a great deal more. In fact, the item that is just above it, at Dawson Springs, Ky., where a sanatorium with a capacity of 500 beds is to be constructed, the sum of $1,500,000 is authorized.

Mr. President, I wish to call attention to the fact that you can construct buildings in the State of Colorado at a lower rate, in my judgment, than in any other State in the Union. It can be seen why that is the case. I refer to buildings of a permanent nature. It is because we have eternal sunshine and the molding of brick is not spoiled by rain. In places in the United States when brick after being molded are laid out to dry they are spoiled, which makes the cost of brick a great deal more. That is one of the great elements that enters into the construction of permanent buildings there.

Again, we find that there is the Western States timber that is near, and it can be utilized. By reason of that there is another element of cheapness. So also in the use of iron. It was Mr. Carnegie who said that he could compete with his ironworks anywhere in the world except in Colorado. We have a plant called the Bessemer Steel Plant at Pueblo, Colo., that can for a distance of about 400 miles keep even the Pittsburgh steel out of that market. These are matters that go into construction, and, consequently, make the construction of permanent buildings very cheap in Colorado. It is on that account that in the city of Denver you can not find a frame house. All of them are brick or stone. That is illustrative of the fact that it is all comparatively cheap construction. I think that Utah also is similarly situated.

I wish to call attention also to another fact. So far as food supplies are concerned, the State of Colorado furnishes, together with Utah, the cheapest food in the world. Why? Because we have to ship our wheat, corn, and other products to Chicago, and to sell on the Chicago market. We have to pay the freight there, and consequently the products sell for much less in the State of Colorado.

Mr. OVERMAN. What about sugar?

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is a fact that for a while the sugar people did make it cost identically the same. They never did attempt to make it higher, though; but it is reprehensible, it seems to me, that they ever attempted by an arbitrary price to make the people in Colorado pay the same price for sugar, when it was manufactured there, that is paid in Kansas City. But the price is now less, because they have ignored the former policy and have gone back to the policy of allowing the home market a reduction on account of freight.

Mr. President, nearly everything that is grown of an edible nature can be shipped out, and we all raise more than our home needs. That brings down the price of everything in Colorado if we sell on the eastern market. That is an element which ought to be taken into consideration in regard to the place where a sanatorium should be erected.

Mr. President, with relation to the cost of construction, there was a hospital constructed at Denver which cost $1,285 a bed. It was a construction that first started on a scale of 500 beds and was extended.

Here is a proposition to donate the land. The friends of the city are willing to donate it, but it seems to me that it ought to be left to the Surgeon General as to where it ought to go. I understand also that Glenwood Springs offers a site. We are not attempting to determine where the site shall be, but we find that we have actually constructed fireproof sanatoriums at a cost of $1,285 a bed. The amount of $750,000 is a little more than that, but if the committee want to put it down to exactly that amount it would be satisfactory to me, instead of $3,000 a bed, which is appropriated for the very item in the bill preceding the point where the amendment which was offered by my colleague is to come in.

There is no question but that the Rocky Mountain region is regarded as the best region for the care of tuberculosis patients in the world, and when you are locating a tuberculosis hospital or sanatorium to skip that great country from the Mississippi River clear to San Francisco without any hospital seems to me to be wrong.

For these reasons, Mr. President, the proposition that is presented in the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Colorado is, in my judgment, the best proposition that has been presented on this measure.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia with reference to the amendment which my colleague [Mr. OVERMAN] has presented. My understanding is, and I would like to have the Senator from Georgia correct me if I am mistaken, that as long as the soldiers are still in the service of the United States they are taken care of by the War Department in case of sickness?

Mr. HARDWICK. They are, in military hospitals.

Mr. SIMMONS. They are sent to Army hospitals; but after they are discharged the Bureau of War Risk Insurance will have to take charge of and provide for such of them as are entitled to treatment on account of diseases contracted in the war as a result of military service.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; with the exception that it is proposed to have the bureau do the actual administration, or help in the actual administration, of this work through the Public Health Service.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand; they render service through the Public Health Department of the Government.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is the idea.

Mr. SIMMONS. Among the patients who after demobilization will have to be taken care of at the expense of the Government through the Public Health Department are those who are afflicted with tuberculosis.

Mr. HARDWICK. A very large percentage.

Mr. SIMMONS. A very large percentage of them.

Now, I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia: Of the hospitals that are included in the bill how many are equipped for taking care of this class of patients?

Mr. HARDWICK. There is one proposal, according to the department officers, and that is all I know about, at Dawson Springs, Ky., largely for that purpose.

Mr. SIMMONS. What is the bed size of that hospital?

Mr. HARDWICK. Five hundred beds.

Mr. SIMMONS. That will take care of about one-fifth of the estimated number?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; but there are certain hospitals in the South that are supposed to be more or less adapted to that purpose.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let me ask the Senator if the cantonment hospitals he speaks of now are located in a portion of the South where the climate is supposed to be favorable for recuperation and for the treatment of this class of patients?

Mr. HARDWICK. I understand what the Senator alludes to, and I am quite willing to admit that a climate like that at Asheville, N. C., and that in Colorado is generally considered to be more favorable for the treatment of patients of this character.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator think that the Government would be just to this class of afflicted humanity if it should send men to a climate unsuited for tuberculosis?

Mr. HARDWICK. Certainly not; and the Government does not intend to do that.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Government does not intend to do that, and I approve of it. Therefore the cantonment hospitals that are not situated in a climate——

Mr. HARDWICK. Some of them are. You can take the cantonment hospital at Fort Hancock, Ga., although I have no personal predilection for that proposition and did not know it was going to be in the list. I happen to know that on the sand hills about Augusta there are a great many people afflicted with tuberculosis who get relief there. I think without having very accurate information that the same thing is true about California, but I am quite willing to concede and to state just what the Senator has in mind, that eventually there will be one or more hospitals located in that region of North Carolina around Asheville, and in Colorado, or somewhere in that part of the country.

But, if the Senator will permit me, the statement I made to his colleague, the junior Senator, was that this is making a very limited and a very temporary provision to meet the more immediate and pressing demands of the moment, because as the Army demobilizes and releases these hospital accommodations we can survey them more carefully and find out how many of the plants which they have already bought and paid for can be utilized. Some of them are established in North Carolina—one at Asheville.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator will agree with me that there is certainly, in the opinion of the medical profession, no place on the Atlantic seaboard that is more suitable for the purpose than Asheville.

Mr. HARDWICK. I have always heard that, and I agree to that; but let me state to the Senator the trouble about his colleague's amendment. I think, as to the people who were instructed to go out and see the War Department officials and find out the Army hospitals that could be obtained for the pressing needs of the Public Health Service and the War Risk Bureau, if they could get, for instance, a hospital at Asheville, nothing would have pleased them better; but for the present the hospital at Asheville—and I am speaking now only of the present and for the next 12 months, we shall say—is required by the Army for the treatment of soldiers in a tubercular condition, who must be cured to some extent, or as much as they can be cured, before they are discharged; and I am afraid, if the amendment proposed by the junior Senator from North Carolina were adopted, that we would absolutely disfurnish the Army and absolutely take away accommodations needed for soldiers who are not yet discharged.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator will understand that I do not desire to do that.

Mr. HARDWICK. No——

Mr. SIMMONS. But——

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will let me finish, then I will not bother him any more.

When we get to the point of demobilization—when we would not need that hospital any longer—it would still be available and could be employed for discharged soldiers who developed this tendency and who are entitled to this benefit under the War Risk Insurance legislation.

Then the Senator's proposition will be impregnable, in my judgment, but, until then, I do not think it amounts to anything.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then, let me ask the Senator if the Kenilworth Inn is now controlled by the War Department and is being used as a hospital?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then, whenever the War Department shall vacate that or discontinue its use for that purpose, I understand, under the language of this bill, it may be taken over at once by the Public Health Service.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes, sir; that can be done.

Mr. SIMMONS. That can be done under the bill without further legislation?

Mr. HARDWICK. Without any further legislation.

Mr. SIMMONS. And without any further appropriation?

Mr. HARDWICK. Exactly; if it could be done within the limits of the appropriation it might be accomplished, but if not it might be provided for by a deficiency appropriation. If it could not be taken care of under the appropriation in the bill, of course, another appropriation would be required; but it could be taken over in the same status that it is now in the War Department by this other bureau by this legislation so long as the money lasted.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator is correct about that, of course, that guarantees the continuous use of the building so long as the Government may need this property for hospital purposes.

Mr. HARDWICK. I believe that is so.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, let me ask the Senator this question: The Senator concedes that Asheville is a very desirable point for a hospital of this character?

Mr. HARDWICK. I can not say that from my personal information, but I will say to the Senator that I think it is and that all the hospital officials also think it is.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then, the Senator concedes that we have not now probably more than——

Mr. HARDWICK. A fraction of what we will ultimately need.

Mr. SIMMONS. A fraction of what we will ultimately need?

Mr. HARDWICK. That is true about every class of patients.

Mr. SIMMONS. And especially with reference to tubercular patients?

Mr. HARDWICK. I think that it is true, not only in connection with patients afflicted with tuberculosis, but also, and perhaps in as great degree, of patients afflicted with mental diseases as a result of the war.

Mr. SIMMONS. The result of that is that we will need this hospital.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think so.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is eligibly situated, and if the Government does not acquire this property for a hospital, it will probably have to build some other hospital.

Now I will ask the Senator, in that condition, if the Government can acquire this property now, which it is certain to need or to need some other hospital, which it will have to construct at perhaps a greater cost than this building can be acquired for at the present time, does not the Senator think it would be very good policy for the Government to buy this property?

Mr. HARDWICK. Not now, because it is being used by the War Department under a lease, and it is needed for soldiers.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is no reason why the Government should not buy it, but it may be a reason why it should not be included in this particular bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. The reason for that is that nobody knows anything about its price or what it is worth—I mean in so far as the committee is concerned.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will say to the Senator that the Army has appraised it, and they are paying $100,000 for the lease.

Mr. HARDWICK. That question, however, has not been considered in connection with this bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is the reason I want the matter to go to conference.

Mr. HARDWICK. If it were thrown into conference in the closing hours of this session, we could not in the short time we have obtain the necessary information upon which to base intelligent action.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not mean to say that my suggestion is at all possible, but my inquiry now is whether, if it is thought desirable to buy this property—and the Government will almost certainly need it—whether it would be proper to make an appropriation to that effect in this bill?

Mr. HARDWICK. Not now; because when you came to a determination of that question you would have to consider what you would have to pay for this building and how much it would cost to construct a similar building or a building of equal capacity. You would have to consider those figures and be in possession of all the facts and plans before a legislator could give an intelligent opinion or vote on the question. I would not desire to foreclose these questions now, and I think the Senator ought to wait until it may be determined whether the proposition is a feasible one, and it is one which may be considered in the near future.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I want it distinctly understood that, so far as North Carolina is concerned, I do not know now of any insistence upon the part of the people of that State for the location of hospitals of any kind there. I did not know that there had been at any time any insistence for the location of hospitals there. It is true that there are three or four hospitals in and around Asheville, within the zone that is supposed to be so favorable for the treatment of tubercular patients. I do not speak with authority about it. Nobody, so far as I now remember, has solicited me to assist in any way in securing the location of these hospitals in that zone. My impression, therefore, is that the department itself has selected this point for the location of these four hospitals, because it thought that climate was especially suited for the treatment of this class of diseases. I shall not myself insist upon the purchase of property there for this purpose unless it is in the interest of the Government. The inquiries I have made have been solely and exclusively for the purpose of ascertaining the views of the Senator having this bill in charge as to the requirements of the Government and whether the proposition presented by my colleague ought not, as a reasonable proposition, to be accepted by the Government.

Mr. KING. May I ask the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], who, in the absence of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], as I understand, has charge of the bill, if it is not a fact that the persons having charge of this matter, after careful investigation, made selections of points for these hospitals where they deemed the best interest of the public could be and would be subserved?

Mr. BECKHAM. That is my understanding.

Mr. KING. And that the interest of any particular section has not been considered, but that the welfare of the soldier primarily and the good of the country generally were involved in the selections which have been made?

Mr. BECKHAM. Mr. President, I am confident, I will say in answer to the Senator's question, that no member of the subcommittee or any member of the committee at any time considered the question of the location from the standpoint of any desire to get a hospital located in a particular State. Our effort from the start was to avail of all of the military hospitals which had been constructed during the war and have them turned over to the use of the Public Health Service. From the beginning of our investigation, which lasted at least four weeks, our efforts were to get officials of the Bureau of Public Health and the officials of the War Department in cooperation, and to get the War Department to turn over to the Public Health Service any hospitals suitable for the purpose not needed by the War Department. I think the committee in the end secured a very desirable result in that respect.

As was explained, before the Senator came in, by the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], the two House bills that came to us for consideration appropriated $12,000,000, and they would have provided for 5,500 beds. We, as a result of our investigations and consultations with the officials of the Government, reported a bill appropriating $7,000,000 as a substitute for the two House bills. Under that bill there are provided nine thousand three hundred and forty-odd beds. Of course, we get that increase by reason of the fact that we have taken over the Speedway Hospital in Chicago and by arranging with the War Department to turn over to us all such hospitals as they were abandoning or that could be spared by the Army.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, I think that in the establishment of these hospitals the policy indicated ought to be pursued. I can realize that, if it is left to the suggestions of the Senators and Representatives or other influences, perhaps a scientific plan, a broad and comprehensive and suitable plan, might not in all respects be realized.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, speaking for myself, I have the opinion that the State from which I come has the best climate in the world, and that it is the most suitable place in the world for the establishment of the hospitals provided for in this bill, yet it seems to me that it would be improper for me to urge my views in the face of a fair and dispassionate investigation of the subject conducted by men charged with this important responsibility, trained men, scientific men, men who have the welfare and interest of the public at heart. In view of what the Senator has said, that this investigation has been made fairly and impartially by scientific men, and a conclusion reached, I would not feel that it would be the part of wisdom for me to suggest my State or any other State as a location for one of these hospitals.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not know whether the Senator wishes to reflect on me because I submitted an amendment, but the Senator did not hear probably——

Mr. KING. I did not know the Senator from North Carolina had offered an amendment, so I disclaim any such purpose.

Mr. OVERMAN. I said that this hospital in North Carolina had been selected by scientific men; it has been indorsed; it is a hospital which already cares for 500 men, and the Government is now paying more money—8 per cent on about $1,500,000—than the sum for which the property could probably be purchased. It could be bought, I think, at a lower price than that.

It is admitted by both Senators that this hospital at some time will be taken by the Government. It is admitted that there is but one tubercular hospital provided for now, although there are in this city over 1,000 men afflicted with tuberculosis, and the one hospital provided only takes care of 500 men. What are we going to do with these men? The hospital is there; it has been selected; its price has been assessed; everything has been agreed on except to make it the property of the Health Department instead of the War Department.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I did not know the Senator had made this proposition; and let me say——

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield to me for a suggestion?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. The reason that provision is not made in this bill for using, under the Public Health Service, the hospital at Asheville, as reported by the chairman of the committee and confirmed by other members of the committee, is found in the fact that the War Department is now using that hospital; that it can not spare it, and has refused to do so.

Mr. KING. I was going to say the same condition exists in my State. We have a hospital there now which is caring for I do not know how many, but for a large number of soldiers. That hospital has 1,200 or 1,500 beds. I could with as much propriety, I think, suggest that that hospital be taken over under the provisions of this bill as the hospital referred to by my distinguished friend from North Carolina; but, as I said a moment ago, I think that the method adopted here is the best method, and, so far as I am concerned, I shall stand by the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. My colleague suggested that he could present an amendment providing that the hospital in Salt Lake City be incorporated in this bill with as great propriety as attends the amendment relating to the North Carolina hospital submitted by the Senator from that State. I wish to say that such an amendment could be offered with a great deal more propriety, because there is not a hospital between Chicago and California provided for in this bill.

Mr. KING. I agree with my colleague as to that; and yet, having a proper appreciation—at least I hope I have—of the disinterested course which I understand has been pursued in the selection of these hospitals, I feel like following the plan which has been adopted and supporting the program of the committee.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, as the author of the resolution referred to by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], providing for an investigation of the subject of hospitals for military and kindred purposes, which investigation has resulted in this proposed legislation, I feel it my duty to say that I am highly gratified at the work the committee has done. It has presented, through its chairman, a plan which will give us the benefit of nine thousand three hundred and some odd beds at a cost of approximately $7,000,000, whereas under the legislation originally proposed 5,500 beds would have cost $12,000,000. The bare statement of those figures constitutes a convincing argument as to the importance of the work done by the committee and of the legislation proposed.

The Speedway project is, in my judgment—and I will say that I investigated that project prior to introducing the resolution—the best that has ever been presented to the Government of the United States. It furnishes hospital accommodations at less cost than is contemplated in any other project, and it gives a modern up-to-date fireproof hospital, the very best that American architects can design and American contractors can construct. No one can justify a failure on the part of the Government to avail itself of this opportunity, due to the generosity and patriotic spirit of a private citizen.

The committee in providing for the use of military hospitals to the extent that they can be spared by the War Department has done the sensible and the practical thing. It is not my purpose to discredit Asheville or sites in Colorado available for hospital purposes. I know that everything that has been said by the Senator from North Carolina and everything that has been said by the Senator from Colorado touching the merits of proposed sites in those States is true, but it is not expected that this legislation shall constitute the entire program of the Government concerning hospitals and the construction of hospitals. There are many localities not specified in the pending bill where additional hospitals may be established if needed. This is in the nature of an emergency proposition, designed in large part to meet urgent and immediate demands. The committee, in my judgment, have shown diligence and prudence and ought to be commended by the Senate for displaying appreciation of the Government's obligation to provide for our wounded and afflicted soldiers now rapidly being discharged. The committee has shown sound judgment in reporting a plan that may be speedily consummated.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, with reference to the pending amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], I think when the Senate realizes just what that proposition would cost the Government, even admitting that the Government ought to secure a tuberculosis hospital there, the amendment will not be very largely supported. At the present time the War Department is leasing this hotel building, which has a bed capacity of 451. Up to January 31 of this year we had been paying a rent of approximately $100,000 per year; beginning the 1st of February the rent was reduced to approximately $75,000 per year. The pending amendment proposes that the Government shall purchase this old hotel building, which has been reconstructed——

Mr. OVERMAN. No; I absolutely know that this is a new building.

Mr. LENROOT. It is a hotel building.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; it was erected as a fireproof hotel; but it is not an old building.

Mr. LENROOT. I did not mean "old" in that sense; I meant having been erected as a hotel building. The Senator asks the Government to purchase that property, which has a capacity of 451 beds, at a cost of $1,250,000, or, in round numbers, $2,800 per bed.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the Senator's statement is misleading, although I am satisfied he is not intending it to be misleading. The amendment provides for buying the building and 40 acres surrounding it and four residences.

Mr. LENROOT. That does not change the statement I made in the slightest degree, because the accommodations that would be secured, if this amendment is adopted, will cost the Government $2,800 a bed.

Mr. OVERMAN. That may be so.

Mr. LENROOT. Under this bill we are securing the Speedway Hospital, one of the finest hospitals in the world, for a maximum cost of $1,200 per bed and a contract price of $1,000 per bed, a building erected for hospital purposes, a complete hospital, while the building referred to in the amendment now pending is a renovated or reconstructed hotel. No department of the Government has suggested for a single moment that the Government ought permanently to secure that building.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. In connection with the Speedway Hospital proposition the Senator omitted to say that there is surrounding it a large tract of land, which is also to be acquired and which is ample for recreation purposes.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; over 300 acres of land go with the Speedway project. If it is desired to secure another permanent hospital at Asheville, neither the Public Health Service nor the War Department would recommend the taking over of this hotel at a cost of $2,800 a bed, when they can build a new hospital there, according to their own plans and specifications, with all hospital conveniences, for a less sum than this hotel building would cost.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I merely submitted the amendment in order that it might go to conference; I wanted to have it determined what a fair price would be. I know what the lease is, and the lease is based upon the sum which is proposed to be appropriated in my amendment. I understand the building cost that much, although I do not know.

Mr. LENROOT. That may be, but I am very sure the Senator can not find that either the War Department or the Public Health Service advocates the acquirement by the Government for permanent hospitals of reconstructed buildings. As has already been made perfectly plain, this hospital is now being utilized by the War Department under a lease, and when the War Department gets through with it under the provisions of this bill it can be turned over to the Public Health Service under lease so long as may be necessary, but certainly the Government is not going to purchase this building under these circumstances. The amendment ought not to go to conference; the Senate ought not to express itself as in favor of paying any such sum for a building not adapted to hospital purposes.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I should like to give him the facts about the reconstruction of this building as I understand them. It was erected as a fireproof hotel and was about completed when the Government took it over and changed it into a hospital. That is the fact of the matter.

Mr. LENROOT. That may be, but neither the Public Health Service nor the War Department would ever for a moment think of constructing a hospital that might be turned into a hotel, and no more would they think of taking over permanently a building constructed according to plans and specifications for hotel purposes and utilize it for a hospital. The reason is very plain. When such a building is used for hospital purposes there is absolutely of necessity a waste of space and a lack of conveniences. In the case of a hospital erected according to plans and specifications prepared by the Surgeon General's office of the War Department or by the Surgeon General's office of the Public Health Service those officials have in mind the convenience of the wards, the operating rooms, exits, entrances, and everything of that kind—a very different proposition from plans for the exterior and interior of a hotel building.

Now, with reference to the amendment that is intended to be proposed by the Senator from Colorado, I wish to repeat what the chairman of the committee has said, that the subcommittee, in making the recommendations they did as to the specific hospitals, were guided wholly and solely by the recommendations of the Public Health Service itself after consultation with the Secretary of War. No member of that committee suggested the location of a single hospital included in this bill, although it does so happen, I think, that there are three in the States of members of the committee—there is none in my State—but I am very sure that that had not the slightest influence in the decision as to the location of these hospitals. The chairman and members of the committee, the Secretary of War, and the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service had but one thing in mind, namely, to secure the greatest accommodations possible for the least amount of money under the present conditions of the Treasury. It is true that the Public Health Service came to our committee and said they would not utilize any of the hospitals under the control of the War Department because the War Department refused to give them anything that they wanted; and it is true, I think, without any question, that the War Department only offered to the Public Health Service such hospitals as the Public Health Service could not be expected to want. The committee finally instructed the Public Health Service to find out which of the Army hospitals they would like to have, not what the War Department was willing to give them, and when they had ascertained that the committee would then undertake to see that the War Department would give them some of their desirable hospitals as well as their undesirable ones. The chairman of the committee [Mr. HARDWICK], in consultation with the Secretary of War, did work that out, and the result is found in this bill. The Army hospitals which it is proposed to turn over to the Public Health Service are entirely satisfactory to that service.

Now, with reference to the hospitals in the Rocky Mountain States and the far West, I have always been of the opinion which has been expressed two or three times this afternoon that climate had a great deal to do with the recovery of persons suffering from tuberculosis; and I am frank to say that I am still of the opinion that climate is a factor; but that question was asked of some of the physicians of the Public Health Service who appeared before us, and of some of the greatest specialists in tuberculosis in America, and every one of them stated to us that climate had practically nothing to do with the cure of tuberculosis. The most that was said with reference to climate was that if the locality was so far south and the elevation was so low as to be enervating to any individual, it did retard recovery from tuberculosis; but, aside from that, they said that climate had absolutely nothing to do with the case.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, does not the Senator recognize that it is universally considered that if the climate is such that the weather is clear and sunshiny, and the atmosphere rare, those are qualities that aid very much in the recovery of persons suffering from tuberculosis?

Mr. LENROOT. I indicated that the medical men who appeared before the committee did not wholly convince me that climate had nothing to do with it; but I will say, from some observations that I have had of these cases, that I am satisfied that the principal benefit of the mountain climate is in the more bracing atmosphere, and the better appetite that the patient has in that atmosphere, rather than anything else that might be considered in the way of climate.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. Without meaning to reflect in any wise on the very good State from which the Senator from Colorado hails, I know that in Ohio a good many years ago tubercular patients were advised by their physicians to go to Colorado; but now we have tubercular hospitals in Ohio, and the patients are going to those hospitals. [Laughter.]

Mr. LENROOT. That is true. One member of this subcommittee is a resident of Florida; and I think I am violating no confidence in saying that one of the medical men who appeared before us said that Florida, in his opinion, was not a very desirable place for a hospital, because of the enervating climate of the southern part of that State, when the Senator from Florida undertook to prove, and did seem to prove conclusively, that where tuberculosis patients had failed of recovery in Rocky Mountain States, they came to Florida and were cured. [Laughter.]

Mr. OVERMAN. The doctors do not know everything.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, with reference to the Rocky Mountain States, the Public Health Service now has a hospital at Fort Stanton, N. Mex., with a capacity of 250 beds. The Public Health Service is proposing to increase that capacity to 1,000 beds; and I think it is conceded that the climate of Fort Stanton is about the same as the climate of Colorado.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. If the Senator from New Mexico wishes to deny that, or to state that it is not as good as that of Colorado, I will yield. [Laughter.]

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I am sure that, owing to its being farther south and having a very suitable altitude, it is much better than anything in Colorado; but I wanted to make this inquiry of the Senator:

I notice in the bill as it came from the House, on page 2, that specific provision was made there for adapting the facilities at Fort Stanton, N. Mex., to this particular service, and for enlarging them. I notice no specific reference to Fort Stanton in the bill as it comes from the Senate committee. Can the Senator explain why that fails to appear in the bill as it comes from the Senate committee?

Mr. LENROOT. I can not specifically. I should have to refer the Senator to the chairman of the subcommittee for detailed information, except to say that the committee, in making the provision it did make, provided more beds than were asked for by the department in the bill passed by the House, and the committee has followed the recommendations of the department as to where these additional facilities should be located. I think the chairman of the subcommittee can give the Senator the information he desires.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think there is language in the bill—and I pointed it out to the Senator—which will cover that. If not, we will certainly see that it is amended, because we did not intend to change that.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I supposed in reading this general language that it was intended to cover the Fort Stanton situation, inasmuch as the bill as it comes from the Senate committee does provide generally for enlarging buildings already owned and the construction of buildings on sites now owned by the Government.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes. That is my construction; and I know that that is what the draftsman meant who prepared this bill under my direction. If that does not develop to be undoubtedly true, we will take care of it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That will be entirely satisfactory.

Mr. LENROOT. I think it is included in the general language of the bill.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I did not see how there could possibly be any reason for overlooking the Fort Stanton situation. There is a hospital owned by the Government there now; and I think, from the reports of the Army physicians, that that is recognized as one of the ideal places in all the country for the treatment of tuberculosis.

Mr. LENROOT. And I will say that the recommendations of the Public Health Service are that the 250 beds at Fort Stanton shall be increased to 1,000 beds.

With reference to Colorado and Wyoming, the committee went into that question at some length; and I want to take just a moment to read some of the testimony, notably the testimony of Gen. Marshall, before the committee. It occurred to the committee that there were in these States some abandoned Army posts that might be utilized for hospital purposes, and Gen. Marshall testified as follows:

I have taken some five Army posts not now occupied—Fort William Henry Harrison, Mont.; Fort McKenzie, Wyo.; Fort Meade, S. Dak. or N. Dak.; Fort Missoula, Mont.; Fort Lincoln, Nebr.; and Fort Logan, Colo. I have taken these places on the basis of 80 square feet per bed and 1,000 cubic feet per bed, allowing 30 per cent of the space for the utilities in connection with the hospitals, such as operating rooms and other things, and the hospitals that I have worked out in this table on that basis at these posts are all of substantial construction, brick or concrete or similar material, and well laid out, and, generally speaking, in beautiful localities, so far as their surroundings are concerned. They are in the country, but they are amid beautiful surroundings. For instance, Fort Missoula is on a plain, backed up by mountains on two sides of it, and it is out 5 or 6 miles from the town of Missoula. Street cars run out there, and the buildings are substantial, though old. That is probably the least desirable of these that I have here.

He was asked as to the state of repair of these buildings. He replied:

The buildings are excellent. In Fort William Henry Harrison the barracks will need considerable repairs. The officers' quarters are good.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] asked him this question:

Has any estimate been made of the cost of repairs?

Gen. MARSHALL. Yes; $65,000. I think it would be double that amount, because it has not been occupied for a year or more.

Senator HARDWICK. To make available those beds to the Government, have you figured what it would cost—what the cost of the repairs would be in the aggregate?

Gen. MARSHALL. One hundred and thirty thousand dollars or $140,000.

Senator HARDWICK. For the five?

Gen. MARSHALL. No; one.

Senator HARDWICK. What is the aggregate for the five?

Gen. MARSHALL. Probably $800,000 to $1,000,000.

Senator HARDWICK. To get those five hospitals?

Gen. MARSHALL. Yes; all of them.

Senator HARDWICK. One thousand eight hundred beds, or something like that?

Gen. MARSHALL. Approximately.

He then goes on to show that if it is desirable to secure additional hospital facilities, we might utilize these old Army posts in the Rocky Mountain States, and that we could secure them at an outside cost of $500 per bed. He says that at Fort Logan, Colo., this would provide for 384 beds.

Mr. SHAFROTH. What would?

Mr. LENROOT. A reconstruction of Fort Logan—384 beds, at a cost of $500 a bed, very much less cost than is proposed in the amendment of the Senator from Colorado; and that is a matter that the committee will further consider when it receives further information as to the needs and necessities of the service. But having in mind the condition of the Treasury, Mr. President, the committee believes it has gone as far as it should go at the present time, and that if this bill is passed as reported by the committee present emergencies will be taken care of, understanding, of course, that in all probability in the very near future we shall have to make further provision for additional facilities.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I will state to the Senator that the reason why I put in the measure at the rate of $1,500 a bed was because just preceding that there was a proposition to build one at Dawson Springs at $3,000 a bed, and I thought surely we could do it for that.

Mr. BECKHAM. Mr. President, I wish to put in the RECORD a letter from the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service with regard to the relative cost per bed of the hospital proposed at the Speedway and that proposed at Dawson Springs.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE,
Washington, February 20, 1919.

Hon. J. C. W. BECKHAM,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In reply to your inquiry as to the apparent difference in cost per bed of the sanatorium referred to in the amended H. R. 13026, at Dawson Springs, Ky., as compared with the Chicago, Ill., project, I beg to advise you that the Chicago project is one large compact general hospital building requiring very few detached buildings in a location where, of necessity, all subsistence supplies must be purchased and where city water supply and sewerage are already available, whereas for a sanatorium such as proposed for Dawson Springs, the plant will be composed of a very considerable number of buildings owing to the different types and stages of diseases treated requiring buildings especially adapted for their purposes, and on a new site where water supply, fire protection, and sewerage system must be installed for the use and protection of the plant. It is also necessary and very essential to carry on certain dairy and agricultural pursuits for the supply of milk and other dairy products which must be absolutely pure and produced in large quantities. It is also proposed to raise a certain amount of poultry, poultry products, beef, pork, and mutton for subsistence of patients. In fact, these activities will be practically a duplicate of those at the present sanatorium at Fort Stanton, which have proved eminently satisfactory and economical. The cost of installing these activities is in this case, of necessity, charged up against the bed capacity of the plant, for the reason that they are associated activities necessary in connection with such a sanatorium as is required by the service.

As a matter of fact, if consideration is given only to the construction of the buildings required for patients the actual cost per bed will figure in the neighborhood of $1,500 to $1,800, and a plant once installed could be extended in patient capacity approximately that rate per bed increase, as the additional cost of extending water and sewerage accommodations would then be in proportion to the ordinary hospital construction where such facilities already exist.

It has been found that at Fort Stanton the agricultural activities carried on in connection with the sanatorium, aside from producing economical subsistence, also provide a most satisfactory opportunity for the proper exercise of patients by giving them light outdoor employment during such periods as the medical requirements of the case may require, and is a very important factor in expediting recovery and keeping patients contented, and thoroughly justifies the investment for the establishment of such activities in connection with the sanatorium.

Respecfully,

RUPERT BLUE,
Surgeon General.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I believe the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] is before the Senate at the present time. It provides for the purchase of the Kenilworth Hotel, which is now used temporarily as a hospital. It seems to me that we should know first what the problem is that is facing us as far as our responsibility is concerned toward the soldiers who are maimed and those who have become diseased, before we appropriate any additional sums of money for increased hospital facilities.

We have 32 hospitals at the cantonments and National Guard camps throughout the country. While many of these hospitals are frame, they are equipped up to the best standards of modern sanitary and hospital arrangements. They have their laboratories; they have their operating rooms; they have their X-ray rooms; they are fully equipped with the most advanced equipment that science can produce in the way of research equipment and surgical apparatus.

That is what the Government has—32 fully equipped hospitals at these various cantonments. In addition to that, we have scattered throughout the country 40 general hospitals under the Surgeon General's Department. Taking the accommodations afforded by these 32 hospitals, with 1,800 beds in each, we have a total of 50,000 beds, at least, available. When our Army of 4,000,000 men is demobilized all of those facilities will be available.

What is our problem? Say that we have 300,000 casualties. In that number there are probably 25,000 tuberculosis patients. As long as they are in the Army, the Army—the Surgeon General's Department—is responsible for them; but the minute they are discharged, if they have any insurance under the war-risk insurance act, they become a public charge, and the Treasury Department must take care of them. So let us assume that outside of private care—for many of these patients will go back to their homes and be taken care of by their families—the problem will be the care of 15,000 of these patients.

The Secretary of War has offered to the Secretary of the Treasury 15 of these cantonment hospitals, with facilities of some 20,000 or 22,000 beds. Now, where are they? He has offered two in Texas, one at Camp MacArthur and the other at Camp Logan; Camp Hancock in Georgia; Camp Greene in North Carolina; Camp Fremont in California; Camp McClellan in Alabama; Camp Sevier in South Carolina; Camp Beauregard in Louisiana; and Camp Cody in New Mexico. Of those cantonment hospitals five have been accepted by the Treasury Department, but more are availble, I am told. Therefore there is no need of spending $1,200,000 for the purchase of an additional hotel under permanent title by the Government.

The Dawsonsprings (Ky.) Sanitarium proposition is not completed yet, as I understand, and therefore it will probably be nine months or a year before the Government can utilize those facilities; but I want to point out to the Senator from North Carolina that there are available at the present time nearly 20,000 beds in the cantonment and National Guard hospitals in this country for these tuberculous patients.

Now, what are we going to do with the question of the maimed? That is another proposition. There are probably 50,000 of those; and when they are discharged from the Army they become public charges, under the war-risk insurance act. We have these general hospitals. We have the rehabilitation hospitals, where they are taking these men who have lost their arms and their legs, and they are equipping them with artificial limbs, and they are teaching them some vocational pursuit, some trade, so that they can go out in the world and earn their own living. But I want to point out to the Senator that we have at the present time all the facilities that are needed, and we will have more than enough when the Army is demobilized; so, when we get a perspective of what the Government already has in hand, purchased, built, equipped, I think we will realize that it is unnecessary to buy a hotel in North Carolina for this purpose.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I do not know the capacity of the hospital at Camp Cody, in New Mexico, but my understanding is that that hospital is very permanent in character, and that it has all of the equipment of any modern hospital. It is being abandoned by the War Department at the present time, and it is a question of whether that hospital will not be immediately dismantled and torn down simply for the material that may be saved from it. The citizens of Deming are very anxious, if the Government is not going to use that hospital, to acquire it in some way, in order that it may be conducted as a private hospital for tubercular patients.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Does the Senator know that this hospital has been offered by the Secretary of War to the Secretary of the Treasury for the purposes of the Public Health Service?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I did not know that until the Senator mentioned it just a few moments ago. I have had the matter up with the War Department, and the only information I have been able to obtain from the War Department is that they have determined to abandon the hospital.

Mr. LENROOT. What is the name of it?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. It is the hospital at Camp Cody, N. Mex.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not find it in the list. Is that the name of the hospital?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That is the name of the hospital.

Mr. HARDWICK. It was not included, because it was determined by the experts that it was not reasonably suited for this purpose; so, of course, it would have to be sold.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] in regard to some of the features, at least, which he has presented here. As I have understood the chairman of the committee to express himself, these buildings are to be used as structures until they can find out the necessities of the situation. If that is the purpose, why not use these hospitals, wherever they are, now?

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, will the Senator let me interrupt him for just a minute?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. With pleasure; I yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. While that hospital is not included by name, we put in a blanket or basket clause at the top of page 7, reading as follows:

> And such hospitals, with other necessary buildings, hereafter vacated by the War Department, as may be required and found suitable for the needs of the Public Health Service for hospital or sanatoria purposes.

So that under this general language even that hospital—although it was not thought at this time, in the first investigation, that it would do at all—could be turned over and they could use it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then the language of the bill would authorize that to be done?

Mr. HARDWICK. Even that; and every other one they have.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I can now give the Senator the present capacity of Camp Cody, if he desires it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I shall be very glad to have it stated.

Mr. LENROOT. One thousand one hundred and sixty beds.

Mr. HARDWICK. They can take it under this bill if they want to.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I can not conceive why a hospital already provided with 1,160 beds should be abandoned and await the construction of a hospital at some of these other points, where even the sites are yet to be purchased.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I shall be glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Are the climatic conditions in New Mexico such that they can take care of tuberculosis patients?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Why, Mr. President, that site is located in one of the most favorable spots on this entire continent. It is so recognized by everybody. Within 50 miles of this site, at Fort Bayard, N. Mex., the Army already has a hospital; and Fort Bayard and Fort Stanton, referred to elsewhere in this bill, are considered two at least of the ideal spots in the world for the treatment of tuberculosis. The climate there is dry; the sun shines, as they claim, about 360 days in the year; the rainfall is light, and when it does come it comes nearly all at one time; and the conditions have been considered ideal.

Now, another question. At one other point in New Mexico the Government already owns the land. It has not been selected as a hospital site or a sanatorium site, but it is a section of country where there are hot springs of the most desirable quality. The Government owns the land now, and petitions have been presented to the War Department to have a sanatorium erected at that place. At other points in New Mexico favorable sites exist which can be purchased or obtained as a gift; and it seems to me that as long as this bill is to provide temporary means to enable the department to get a survey of the necessities of the situation, they might very well be authorized now at least to look into some of these other things.

Mr. HARDWICK. They are looking into them.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I have no doubt they are; and if that be the case, why would it not be advisable?

Now, the word "sites" is used in line 21, page 4. It says, "on sites now owned by the Government." That may be construed, and probably will be construed, to be only a sanatorium site already selected. I would suggest that the words "or lands" be inserted after the word "sites," and then, after the words "now owned by," that the words "or which may be donated to" be inserted.

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, well, the sites may be acquired "by purchase or otherwise."

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. But the words "acquired by purchase or otherwise" are limited to specific places.

Mr. HARDWICK. But we are not intending and do not propose if we can help it, to give to this committee a roving commission to go around and do that sort of thing. We are confining them to specified projects on purpose, because this is merely a temporary measure to relieve an immediate, pressing necessity. If we should do what the Senator suggests, we would open up a flood of possible expenditures and appropriations.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am inclined to think that it will be necessary to open up that floodgate at some time.

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, possibly; but not now.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Why not now?

Mr. HARDWICK. I will tell you why not now. The Senator has not been here during the debate. Because we have not got the Army demobilized yet; because we do not know, and can not tell now, how much of this Army stuff we can use, and therefore we can not tell how much we shall have to purchase; because we do not know, except by way of estimate, how many of these discharged soldiers are going to demand this hospital treatment that they are entitled to under the law, and that we promised them; because we want knowledge, in the place of estimates, before we spend untold millions on these things.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, it does seem to me that it is admitted by practically everyone—I have not heard all of the debate here, but I have heard a good deal of it—that the tubercular patients will be several thousand in number, at least; and under this bill there is no provision for more than a very small number of tubercular patients.

Mr. HARDWICK. I have already explained to the Senator why—and we had the concurrence of all the departments in that view—that it was not wise to provide at present, or attempt to provide at present, anything like what we know will be eventually required.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then it is expected that there will be further legislation on the subject?

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, yes. This is a temporary project to meet an immediate, pressing, urgent demand. It is a moral obligation on our shoulders, and we do not profess that this is even the beginning of it. It is merely to do what we must do at once, unless we are to let men lie suffering without hospital accommodations.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. It does seem to me, under all the circumstances, that after the admissions which have been frequently made here such hospitals as those referred to by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], including Camp Cody, N. Mex., ought not to be dismantled so long as these urgent necessities exist.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think the Senator is right. I do not think they ought to tear them down unless they know they can not possibly be used.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, one word. I do not agree with the Senator from New Jersey at all, and I hope, whether this amendment is adopted or not, it will not be the policy of the United States Government to send our tuberculous boys down to old, frame, dismantled hospitals in a hot climate. I hope they will take care of these people like human beings and send them to some good place.

This amendment provides for a hospital that has already been equipped and is used, and whether you use those at Asheville or not, do not let us send the boys from New Jersey to those frame hospitals, whether in the South or in other sections of the country.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I want to correct the statement of the Senator from North Carolina that these are old frame, tumble-down hospitals and are insanitary. They are all up-to-date modern hospitals. The Army are now taking care of many tuberculosis patients there and they are working a wonderful cure in many cases.

Mr. OVERMAN. In these frame buildings?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. In these frame buildings. It has been recognized, I will say to the Senator from North Carolina, for many years that the pavilion cottage system in the care of tuberculosis is much better than the fireproof modern building that can not be destroyed.

Mr. OVERMAN. I agree to that, Mr. President, in the proper climate, but you would not agree to send tuberculosis patients down to Florida or where the climate would be enervating to them.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, just a word. I want to ask the Senate to vote on the bill, independent of the amendments. Applications are coming in by hundreds and thousands and we wish to get the bill into conference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that there is now on the calendar a bill for taking care not only of tubercular soldiers, but tubercular sufferers from all over the country whether they are soldiers or not.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator knows I do not believe in any such thing as that and it will not be done unless some future Congress authorizes it. I can not help it if they do it. I would not vote for it if I were here.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator says it will not be done. That may be true or it may not.

Mr. HARDWICK. I said it would not be done if I could help it, but I will not be here to vote against it.

Mr. SMOOT. I am only calling attention to the fact that a bill is now on the calendar; and there is quite a propaganda back of it, I will say. As far as that is concerned, I think myself if the Government of the United States is going to expend money to take care of patients, whether they be in the Army or not, it could be expended to take care of tuberculosis cases perhaps to better advantage than for the cure of any other dread disease that humanity suffers from. I do not believe that bill will become a law at this session of Congress, but I do believe that it is going to become a law before very long. It is true that the Senator making the report on the bill and asking immediate consideration for it remarked that it did not carry any appropriation, and therefore it ought to go through. Mr. President, everyone knows that if that bill becomes a law it will not be long before the expenses will run into millions of dollars, and necessarily so if it is to do any good.

This bill, however, is simply to take the first step and change the law so as to create a bureau in the Public Health Service specifically named. It is the beginning of the authorization of future appropriations the limit of which nobody can tell.

I feel, Mr. President, that the Government is under obligations to take care of the returned soldier who finds himself in a physical condition unfit and impossible to carry on an avocation of life to make for the future a living, if you please. I believe it has been tacitly understood by the passage of laws that are now on the statute books that these unfortunate soldiers should be taken care of. I do believe, however, that the hospitals provided for in the doing of that work ought to be located in all parts of the country.

I am not going to offer an amendment to the bill, and I expect to vote against all the amendments that will be offered to it, but I do know that the great intermountain country is left entirely out of the bill. No hospital is to be built under the provisions of the bill, no hospital is to be taken over under the provisions of the bill, between the city of Chicago and California. That ought to be rectified. Perhaps in the near future it will be done. I recognize that under the provisions of the bill the authority is given, and it can be utilized in the future.

Mr. HARDWICK. I merely wish to suggest to the Senator, so the RECORD will show it, that the reason for that is because it was the policy of the Government to locate these cantonments in the South, and the hospitals are in connection with them. For climatic and other reasons the cantonments were put down there, and we find the hospitals there.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not want the Senator to think I am referring to the fact that they were located in the South. I do not care anything about that. I want them located——

Mr. HARDWICK. We had to take them where we found them.

Mr. SMOOT. I want them operated wherever the need is most urgent and at places that will cost the least to the Government of the United States. That is the position I take.

I know that we have many, many applications from my State and surrounding States, and it is very expensive, I will say to the Senator, for the Government to send patients so many thousands of miles to locate them in a hospital when they could be located near at home, where they could have their friends visit them and see how they were progressing; and I say that means a great deal in helping to restore a sick person to health.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will pardon me, the Public Health Service and the War-Risk Insurance Bureau say they intend to adopt that as a permanent policy.

Mr. SMOOT. I am very glad to hear the statement made by the Senator. I do not want the bill to be plastered up with amendments. I think the mere offering of these amendments will be heralded throughout the country, and every man or every company that has a defunct hospital, or is losing money on it, will be notified, "For Heaven's sake, hurry to Washington and have the Government buy it."

I wish distinctly to refer to the last paragraph of the bill where the appropriation is made of $785,333 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919. I heard what the Senator from Georgia said in relation to the reasons why this was put in the bill and not carried in an appropriation bill. I want to disabuse the Senator's mind that there were not going to be any more deficiency appropriation bills. I assure him now that there will be at least one deficiency appropriation bill and more than likely two before the end of this session.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will pardon me, the trouble is that we can not estimate for these hospitals until this measure becomes a law. We have got to wait until that happens and then get an estimate.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator, as far as the Committee on Appropriations are concerned, if this bill became a law without this last paragraph in it, the very first thing they would do would be to report an appropriation to pay the expenses.

Mr. HARDWICK. It might not become a law in time to do it. That is the real reason.

Mr. SMOOT. There may be something in that, I will say to the Senator; only I did not want it to go out that it was feared the Committee on Appropriations would not make the appropriation to carry out the law.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; not at all. We were afraid we might not have a chance; that is all.

Mr. THOMAS. We may not have any money.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Colorado suggests that perhaps we may not have any money to make the appropriation with. I will say to the Senator that we have never thought of that in the past. We simply appropriated the money.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not see any prospect of it in the future.

Mr. SMOOT. We simply appropriate the money necessary to carry out the laws that have been passed by Congress, and we can not do otherwise. The question of raising money comes, of course, from another committee.

I want the Senator from Colorado to know, and I know he does know, that, as far as I am concerned, I should like to cut every appropriation to the bone, particularly now after the war. While we were engaged in the conflict I paid no attention to whether the demands were really based upon actual needs and wants or not. I would not have cared whether the Secretary of War had asked for $5,000,000 or $10,000,000 or $1,000,000,000, if the department should have said through its representative that it was absolutely necessary to have the money to win the war or to carry it on successfully, I never would have hesitated, nor did I hesitate when all the billions was going out to give my support to the amount that was asked for.

But now, Mr. President, we ought to begin to study the appropriations. We ought to make the closest investigations possible, and every dollar that can be cut out of any estimate made by any department of the Government ought to be done. We know if it is not done at this session of Congress it will be before long, because our financial condition will be such that the American people are going to ask when will the end come. Instead of listening to the appeals of the people here in Washington interested in getting every dollar out of the Treasury that it is possible to get, we are going to listen to the American people before long, and the quicker the day comes the better it will be for the American people, and I am going to say for the world itself.

Mr. President, I do not know that I have anything more to say upon this bill, but I am going to vote against every amendment offered to the substitute of the committee, and I am going to vote for the bill as reported to the Senate.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I hope now we can have a vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARDWICK. On page 5, line 13, I offer a committee amendment. I move to insert before the word "limit" the word "total," so as to read "at a total limit of cost." That is an error in typing.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STERLING. I offer the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Strike out lines 9 to 15, inclusive, on page 7, and in lieu insert—

So much of the Battle Mountain Sanatorium at Hot Springs, S. Dak., of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers with its present equipment as is not required for the purposes for which these facilities were provided is hereby made available for the use of the Public Health Service for the period of five years from the approval of this act unless sooner released by the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service.

Mr. HARDWICK. What is the difference between that and the language the Senator moves to strike out?

Mr. STERLING. I wish to make plain the reason for this amendment in a word or two. This as is indicated by the amendment is a home for disabled volunteer soldiers of the war. It is a branch or an auxiliary of the National Soldiers' Home for that purpose. The old soldiers there are very much attached to this home, and when the proposition was first made that the Battle Mountain Sanatorium be given over to the Public Health Service entirely there was very vigorous opposition to it and protests against it. I received many letters of protest.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will pardon me, I think I can shorten this. I think the Senator's amendment is right, and the committee will accept it.

Mr. STERLING. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HARDWICK. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendment, and that the Vice President appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. HARDWICK, Mr. BECKHAM, and Mr. FRANCE conferees on the part of the Senate.

UNIFORMS OF SOLDIERS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13366) permitting any person who has served in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps in the present war to retain his uniform and personal equipment and to wear the same under certain conditions, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. HITCHCOCK, and Mr. WARREN conferees on the part of the Senate.

INDIAN BUREAU APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. ASHURST. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 14746, the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I hope the Senator——

Mr. ASHURST. If the Senator will yield to me for just a moment, I desire to say that if this bill shall be made the unfinished business, I shall be glad to have it laid aside not only this evening, but to-morrow as well.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I shall be very glad to have that done.

Mr. ASHURST. I will ask that the bill be temporarily laid aside as soon as the Chair puts the motion upon proceeding to its consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arizona, to proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 14746) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, which had been reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments.

Mr. ASHURST. I now ask unanimous consent that the bill be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have a bill, which has been reported for some time, which I should like to bring up for consideration, if the Senator from Arizona will yield to me for that purpose.

Mr. ASHURST. I will yield as soon as the bill which has been taken up for consideration is temporarily laid aside. I ask unanimous consent that that may be done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. For what purpose does the Senator desire the bill laid aside?

Mr. ASHURST. For the consideration of conference reports and such other business as Senators may wish to have considered this evening.

Mr. SMOOT. If that is the case, I object.

Mr. ASHURST. Very well; then we shall have to proceed with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I gave notice last evening—I presume I am not quite so insistent as I ought to be—that immediately after the bill which the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] had charge of was disposed of, I should ask consideration for the Military Academy bill. If the Indian appropriation bill has been laid aside, I now ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Military Academy appropriation bill.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Arizona has not yet had his bill laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to taking up the Military Academy bill?

Mr. ASHURST. I am obliged to object to that.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to taking up the Military Academy bill or to laying aside the Indian appropriation bill for that purpose, but I do object to having the Indian appropriation bill laid aside temporarily for every other purpose that any Senator may desire considered at any time.

Mr. ASHURST. I can not parcel out the time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to laying aside the Indian appropriation bill——

Mr. ASHURST. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. For the purpose of——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Considering the conference report on the Post Office appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; for the consideration of the Military Academy bill.

Mr. ASHURST. I have no objection to that, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Has any other Senator any objection? The Chair hears none.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 15462) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

The first amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, on page 2, line 1, after the word "cadets," to strike out "$600,000" and insert "$800,000: Provided, That the pay of cadets for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, shall be fixed at $800 per annum and one ration per day or commutation therefor, such commutation to be 69 per cent over and above the cost of the Army ration, to be paid from the appropriation for the subsistence of the Army," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of cadets, $800,000: Provided, That the pay of cadets for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, shall be fixed at $800 per annum and one ration per day or commutation therefor, such commutation to be 69 per cent over and above the cost of the Army ration, to be paid from the appropriation for the subsistence of the Army.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee if similar action to that involved in this amendment is to be taken, or is it proposed to take similar action in the case of cadets at the Naval Academy, or if he has had any consultation with the chairman of the Naval Committee on that subject?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have not had any consultations with the chairman of the Naval Committee on this matter, for I find that whenever we have tried to arrange the two bills together we almost always get into trouble.

Mr. WEEKS. My only suggestion is that, of course, if the pay of the cadets at the Military Academy is to be increased, the same provision should be made in the naval appropriation bill; and I thought, possibly, that some concerted action had been suggested. I call to the attention of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] the amendment which has just been read.

Mr. SWANSON. To what amendment does the Senator from Massachusetts refer?

Mr. WEEKS. The one in connection with the pay and emoluments of the cadets at the Military Academy.

Mr. SWANSON. We have the same provision included in the naval bill as to the naval cadets.

Mr. WEEKS. Is it exactly the same?

Mr. SWANSON. It is exactly the same, except regarding the system of subsistence. In some of the bills which have passed the House there is a little different method as to the subsistence in the Navy and in the Army. This bill, I think, provides for 60 per cent more than the Army ration.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I wish to suggest to the chairmen of the Military and Naval Committees that my experience is that we are all the time jacking up the service of one branch or the other, for when we pass legislation relating to one which is a little more favorable than legislation relating to the other, then there is a demand that the other be brought up to the same level. It does seem as if it would be practicable, in a matter of this kind, where cadets are performing similar service and receiving the same kind of education, that they should be made exactly equal. It would be in the interests of harmony in the future, and trouble will come if it is not done.

Mr. SWANSON. There was no request for any increase of the pay of the cadets at the Naval Academy until this provision in the House bill for cadets at the Military Academy was inserted. I think that the cadets at the Naval Academy ought to be treated similarly to those at the Military Academy. The department suggested that we should give them the same compensation as is provided in the Military Academy bill.

Mr. WEEKS. I think they ought to be treated in exactly the same way.

Mr. SWANSON. I concur with the Senator. The Army has generally taken the lead in this matter of increase. I have simply followed them, so that the cadets at the Naval Academy are treated with equal consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was on page 12, line 14, after the word "apparatus," to strike out "$2,700," and insert "$2,400," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of one chief engineer of power plant, whose duties will include those of engineer of heating and ventilating apparatus, $2,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 29, after line 4, to strike out:

For repairs and alterations to the hospital so as to increase its capacity, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 29, after line 6, to insert:

For cadet hospital and nurses' quarters, $400,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 34, after line 6, to strike out:

The Secretary of War is hereby authorized to allow any corporation, company, or individual to erect on the United States Military Academy reservation at West Point, N. Y., a hotel, in accordance with plans and specifications to be approved by the Superintendent of the United States Military Academy, and to enjoy the revenue therefrom for a period of 50 years, after which time said hotel shall become the property of the United States: Provided, That the title and ownership of said hotel may be accepted by the Secretary of War on the behalf of the United States at any time. That said hotel shall be conducted under such regulations, including the rates and the charges for accommodations thereat, as may be promulgated by the Superintendent of the United States Military Academy under the direction of the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTIN of Kentucky in the chair). The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 34, after line 6, it is proposed to insert:

That the President of the United States is hereby authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint George R. Rogers, late cadet lieutenant and quartermaster at the Military Academy at West Point, to the position of second lieutenant of Cavalry in the Army, and to place him upon the retired list with the pay of a retired second lieutenant of Cavalry.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, the particular case was one where a young man, in the very last part of his senior term at West Point, following orders, was injured and paralyzed. He remained a year or more in the hospital. The action that is asked is one for which there are many precedents, and I have the precedents here, and I will ask that the Senator in charge of the bill accept the amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing to accept it, because I know of the precedent that has been established for the same kind of cases; but I will ask the Senator to put the record of the young man in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as a part of what he has to say. So far as I can, I am willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. With the consent of the Senate, then, I will hand in the record of the young man, a very brief epitome of his injuries, or read it, as the Senator may desire.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I suggest that the Senator insert it in the RECORD.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I will insert it in the RECORD, then, with the permission of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the matter will be inserted in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

CASE OF GEORGE R. ROGERS.

George R. Rogers was disabled at West Point during his first-class (senior) year and had practically completed his course of study. He stood about 20 in a class of 115 members and held the rank of cadet lieutenant and quartermaster and was injured while in service. He was a member of the class of 1905. He was injured while riding under orders.

After over a year's treatment at the Army and Navy General Hospital at Hot Springs, Ark., it was determined that the partial paralysis of his limbs was permanent, and he was honorably discharged for physical disability.

A precedent has been established in the case of J. Randolph Peyton, who was disabled at the Military Academy and was retired (see act of Mar. 4, 1909).

Also, the case of Clyde R. Altman, in the act of May 29, 1917.

We can refer you to Col. Charles G. Treat, who was his commandant of cadets, and to Charles W. Exton, then captain, who was company commander.

George Rogers is a brother of William Rogers, cashier of the Merchants' National Bank of San Diego, who is employing him at the present time. He is refused under the Government the right to take the civil-service examination and qualify for a civil-service appointment, which is a double handicap.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from California.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, after the amendment just adopted, I offer the following:

That the President is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to promote Col. S. E. Tillman, retired, superintendent of the Military Academy, to the rank of brigadier general on the retired list of the Army.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of the bill, the following:

That the President is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to promote Col. S. E. Tillman, retired, Superintendent of the Military Academy, to the rank of brigadier general on the retired list of the Army.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, this officer has had a long service in the Army. He was retired several years ago, but returned to active duty and served during the war. He is now the superintendent at West Point, and has a record there second to that of no man who has ever served in that capacity.

I feel certain that the chairman of the committee, when he understands the facts of the case, will agree to accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I had an amendment here that I desired to offer, but it has been misplaced, and I shall not detain the Senate while I look it up. I can offer it on another bill just as well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there are no further amendments to be offered as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert at the end of the bill the following:

That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, Col. L. Mervin Maus to the grade of brigadier general in the United States Army and place him on the retired list.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say just one word. This bill passed the Senate. It was introduced by the late Senator Ollie James. Some of the Senator's friends asked me to offer it to this bill, and I therefore offer it as an amendment to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendments, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. HITCHCOCK, and Mr. WARREN conferees on the part of the Senate.

ADDITIONAL CLERKS FOR SENATORS.

Mr. ASHURST rose.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator from Arizona yield to me to report a resolution from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate?

Mr. ASHURST. Just for a moment. Will the Senator tell me in a few words what it is?

Mr. McKELLAR. It will take only a moment to state it and, I think, only a moment to pass it. The Senator and all Senators will remember that last night an amendment was added to the legislative appropriation bill providing additional clerks for Senators. Of course, that will be operative July 1, 1919. This resolution which I report favorably from the committee simply provides that the clerks shall be paid as at present until July 1, 1919, when that bill becomes operative. As it is now, the law provides only for a continuance of the clerks until the 4th of March. If the Senator from Arizona will yield to me, I will report the resolution and ask for its consideration.

Mr. ASHURST. So far as I have any power, and with the understanding that it does not displace the Indian appropriation bill, I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thank you very much.

I report Senate resolution 432 from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate with an amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendment was, at the end of the resolution, to strike out the words "otherwise provided by law" and insert "July 1, 1919," so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That Senate resolution No. 75, agreed to on April 3, 1918, being a resolution authorizing the employment of an additional clerk by each Senator having no more than one clerk, one assistant clerk, and one messenger for himself or for the committee of which he is chairman, for the remainder of the second session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, at the rate of $100 per month, said compensation to be paid out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate, and which said resolution was extended and continued under authority of Senate resolution No. 328, agreed to on November 15, 1918, until the end of the Sixty-fifth Congress, be, and the same is hereby, further extended and continued in full force and effect until July 1, 1919.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. I wish to ask the Senator from Tennessee if there is any necessity for the resolution in view of the fact that we shall have an adjournment on the 4th of March. If Congress should be reconvened in an extra session, then the matter would be before the Senate, and if the appointment of these additional clerks were deemed necessary steps could be taken then to pass such a resolution.

Mr. McKELLAR. Would he know where he could get his clerk at that time? As far as I am concerned I am paying for extra help in my office now, and I imagine a great many other Senators are doing the same. I heard the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] say that he had two extra clerks whom he is paying out of his own pocket. Our work has been very heavy, as every Senator knows, during the war period, and the war period has not closed yet. I hope the Senator from Utah will not object.

Mr. KING. I do not object to the consideration of the resolution, but I oppose it.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I wish to say a word. I have one of these extra clerks in my office and there is more work now there than I ought to ask any four clerks to do. Though Congress will adjourn, whether there is an extra session or not, I am satisfied, knowing the work of the office as I do, that I will need this extra clerk until July 1 at least.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

INDIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14746) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920.

Mr. ASHURST. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the bill be read for committee amendments, and that until the committee amendments are disposed of no other amendments shall be considered.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. It is the usual request.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand the Senator simply means to get the bill before the Senate at this time and then adjourn until to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I am willing at all times to yield my personal inclination to whatever any particular Senator wishes. A number of Senators have told me that they want to go ahead. I am not controlled in the matter by my own feelings. A large number of Senators—I do not want to mention names—have urged that we should go ahead with the bill, that they would call up another bill and displace the Indian appropriation bill if I did not show a disposition to go ahead. I leave that to Senators to determine. It is now the unfinished business, and if there are any little matters that are pressing I am willing that the appropriation bill shall be laid aside, but let me say I am going to talk very little on this bill. The 4th of March is approaching. This is not the most important bill, but it is a very important bill. It deals with $2,000,000,000 worth of property in trust and 8,000 employees. If any Senator on either side has a bill that he could have passed to-night without protracted discussion, I am willing that this bill shall be laid aside temporarily.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought we had a kind of a gentlemen's agreement that when we passed the bills that have been under consideration to-day we would adjourn.

Mr. ASHURST. I do not know that I am a party to it.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not any desire to defeat or try to defeat or delay the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. ASHURST. I believe that.

Mr. SMOOT. But I want to say to the Senator he will make no time whatever by trying to keep the Senate here and pass the bill to-night. It will not be done.

Mr. ASHURST. I know the Senator does not mean that as a threat, but he states a fact, and I believe he is stating what is true. I do not construe it in the light of a threat.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not want the Senator to so construe it.

Mr. ASHURST. Sitting in this Chamber are many Senators who have urged that this bill shall be considered to-night and that such progress be made as could be made, but, of course, there is no use to stay here if we can not consider the bill.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I wish to say that I am one of those who believe that we ought to stay here to-night and consider this bill, or some other bill. This session of Congress is drawing to a close. For my part, I think it is our duty to our country to stay here and pass these bills. I am willing to stay here not only to-night, but every other night until we can do these things.

I do not understand that any good reason has been offered why we should not go ahead at least until 10 or 11 o'clock every night. I have heard nobody present any reason why we can not do it. With all deference to the views of other Senators, and especially the older Senators, I insist that we should go ahead with the work before us.

Mr. SMOOT. But it is a question as to whether we want to go on to-night or not. I have a very important appointment at 6 o'clock, but I realize that does not make a particle of difference to the Senate. I am willing to remain here if the Senator insists on going on to-night, but I state to the Senator now that there will not be any time gained.

Mr. ASHURST. I reiterate that I do not construe the Senator's remark as offensive or as a threat. I think he is stating a fact. If that be true, I take it we would make better time by adjourning; but before we adjourn I want to yield to one or two Senators who have formal matters to present.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

W. B. GRAHAM.

Mr. HENDERSON. I should like to call up the bill (S. 29) to reimburse W. B. Graham, late postmaster at Ely, Nev., for money expended for clerical assistance. This is a bill which was introduced some years ago by the late Senator Nixon, of Nevada. It provides for the payment to the postmaster of Ely, who had charge of the office there from September, 1905, until March, 1908, during the boom days of that copper camp, and he had to employ additional help at his own expense. A letter has been received from the Postmaster General in favor of the passage of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I remember the case very well. I have no objection at all to the passage of the bill.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, and it was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to W. B. Graham, late postmaster at Ely, Nev., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,335, to reimburse him for money expended for necessary clerical assistance.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. KENYON. Was the bill reported from a committee?

Mr. HENDERSON. From the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. It is accompanied by a report which is with the bill at the Secretary's desk.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Iowa that a similar bill was passed here a number of years ago and I remember very well the statement made here at that time. After a thorough examination into it I decided at that time that it is an absolutely just claim.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I wish to say a few words about the progress of the business of the Senate. There may be some good reason why we should not go ahead with the business to-night, but I have not heard any advanced before the Senate or even in the cloakroom. I certainly feel that unless we are going to do what I conceive to be an abandonment of the public business some good reason should appear. Such a reason may exist. If it does, I do not see why we should not at least have some information as to what it is. Of course, I understand perfectly that if Senators do not want the business to go ahead they can prevent it from going ahead.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator if the Democratic conference decided to go ahead?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. It did.

Mr. KENYON. Then, why do we not go ahead?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That is what I want to know. I do not see any Democrats on the floor of the Senate objecting to going ahead.

Mr. KENYON. There are not very many on the floor.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. There are more Democrats here than Republicans by a considerable number.

Mr. SMOOT. No matter how many there are in the Chamber, I want to say to the Senator that beginning at least with next Monday nobody could object to holding night sessions, but there were certain appointments made, not thinking that a session would be desired to-night, and they are very important appointments.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator from Utah certainly knows that the result of the Democratic conference was published in the newspapers on the morning after it was held, which was last Friday morning, a week ago to-day. I think that is quite a sufficient reason, and for one I have canceled engagements in the evening so as to be here. I should like to see the public business go ahead.

Mr. ASHURST. I am ready to proceed with the bill that is the unfinished business.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I ask unanimous consent to call up House bill 171. It is in relation to the Rocky Mountain National Park.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator if we are going to remain here for the consideration of the appropriation bill I think more likely we had better have a quorum, and I think more than likely we had better confine ourselves to that measure.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state to the Senator that this bill was passed——

Mr. SMOOT. I know all about the bill, and I told the Senator just a little while ago that I was not going to object to it when it was brought up.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not think it will take long.

Mr. ASHURST. I do not object, provided there is a distinct understanding that under no circumstances will it displace the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, no; it will not.

Mr. ASHURST. Let that be understood by all Senators.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 171. It is identical with the bill that passed the Senate in January, 1917. It went over to the House, and instead of taking up that bill a Representative there called up a bill which was a copy of the bill. It is identically the same word for word, comma for comma, period for period. A similar bill has already passed the Senate, and I ask that it be put upon its passage.

Mr. ASHURST. Does the Senator ask unanimous consent for that purpose.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; I ask unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. I think there is a sentiment here that we have done about all the business we ought to do to-day. It is pretty hard for some Senators to have to remain here from the time the Senate meets until this late hour.

Mr. ASHURST. I move that when we adjourn it be until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arizona.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator withhold the motion? I suggest that he allow the consideration of the bill the Senator from Colorado desires to call up.

Mr. CURTIS. Very well.

ROCKY MOUNTAIN NATIONAL PARK.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 171) to repeal the last proviso of section 4 of an act to establish the Rocky Mountain National Park, in the State of Colorado, and for other purposes, approved January 26, 1915.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the last proviso of section 4 of an act entitled "An act to establish the Rocky Mountain National Park, in the State of Colorado, and for other purposes," approved January 26, 1915, which is in the words and figures following: "Provided, That no appropriation for the maintenance, supervision, or improvement of said park in excess of $10,000 annually shall be made unless the same shall have first been expressly authorized by law," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to ask for the consideration of——

Mr. CURTIS. I insist on my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, February 22, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, February 21, 1919.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou Great Spirit, never far from us, we would draw near to Thee in the spirit of devotion.

Help us by the contact to acquire that spiritual momentum which shall enable us to overcome evil and satisfy the longings, hopes, and aspirations of our better self. In Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PERMISSION TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Texas rise?

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent for leave to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD on the military appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks on the military appropriation bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent for excuse for to-day from attendance on the House of my colleague, Mr. DRANE, of Florida, owing to illness.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—BRITT AGAINST WEAVER.

Mr. WATSON of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a report (No. 1115) from the Committee on Elections No. 3 on the contested-election case of Britt against Weaver, tenth North Carolina district. I ask that the report be filed and printed and lie over until I can find a suitable opportunity to call it up for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contested-election case of James J. Britt v. Zebulon Weaver, tenth North Carolina district, report of Elections Committee No. 3, by Mr. WATSON of Virginia, chairman.

The SPEAKER. Ordered printed and to lie over.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire of the chairman when he desires to put the case down for hearing before the House?

Mr. WATSON of Virginia. After consultation with Mr. KITCHIN, majority leader, I think we can not call the case up for consideration until the pending appropriation bills are disposed of, probably the 25th or 26th instant.

The SPEAKER. Is this a unanimous report?

Mr. DOWELL. It is not, Mr. Speaker; and I desire consent to file a minority report later. I have not been able to examine the report as yet and I want a little time to do so.

The SPEAKER. How long does the gentleman want?

Mr. DOWELL. Oh, I suppose five days, if the case is not to be heard before that time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks leave to file the minority report within five days. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. WISE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill in reference to voluntary enlistments in the Regular Army.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. We could not hear what the request was.

The SPEAKER. It was to extend his remarks on enlistments in the Army.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the railroad bill now before the House by incorporating a resolution passed by the House of Representatives of Alabama on that question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 14555 An act granting the consent of Congress to the board of supervisors of Itawamba County, Miss., to construct a bridge across the Tombigbee River at or near Barrs Ferry in said county;

H. R. 5999. An act for the establishment of Gulfport, Miss., as a port of entry and delivery for immediate transportation without appraisement of dutiable merchandise;

H. R. 12995. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a combined bridge and dam across the Mahoning River in the State of Ohio;

H. R. 13369. An act to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across the Connecticut River between Springfield and West Springfield in Hampden County, Mass.;

H. R. 13393. An act to revive and reenact the act entitled "An act to authorize the city of South Sioux City, in the State of Nebraska, to construct a bridge across the Missouri River between the States of Nebraska and Iowa," approved April 22, 1912;

H. R. 13427. An act granting the consent of Congress to the county of Allegheny, Pa., to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Monongahela River at or near the borough of Wilson, in the county of Allegheny, in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania;

H. R. 13647. An act granting the consent of Congress to the county of Allegheny, Pa., to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Ohio River at or near McKees Rocks Borough, in the county of Allegheny, in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania;

H. R. 13648. An act granting the consent of Congress to the county of Allegheny, Pa., to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Allegheny River at or near Millvale Borough, in the county of Allegheny, in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania; and

H. R. 13649. An act granting the consent of Congress to the county of Allegheny, Pa., to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Allegheny River at or near Sixteenth Street, in the city of Pittsburgh, county of Allegheny, in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 5279) to authorize the resumption of voluntary enlistments to the Regular Army, and for other purposes, had requested a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. HITCHCOCK, and Mr. WARREN as conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 195) providing for the filling of a proximate vacancy in the Board of Regents in the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than Members of Congress.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled joint resolutions and bills of the following titles:

S. 4244. An act for the relief of entrymen within the Castle Peak irrigation project in Utah.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. CALDWELL was granted indefinite leave of absence on account of illness.

VOLUNTARY ENLISTMENTS IN THE ARMY.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Alabama rise?

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 5279—the bill just reported—to further insist upon the amendments of the House and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 5279, to further insist on the House disagreements, and to agree to the conference asked for by the Senate. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 5279) to authorize the resumption of voluntary enlistments in the Regular Army, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the conferees.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. DENT, Mr. FIELDS, and Mr. KAHN.

The SPEAKER. When the House adjourned yesterday the unfinished business coming up was to take a vote on the railroad money bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kentucky is not here, and I would be very glad to have the order for a roll call vacated, but the House had ordered the yeas and nays when we adjourned.

The SPEAKER. Who is insisting on the order?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Kentucky asked for the yeas and nays, and the Speaker counted and declared there was a sufficient number. I do not know whether the Journal showed that or not, but that is what took place.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky still want the yeas and nays?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; it is my understanding they were ordered yesterday.

The SPEAKER. They were ordered, but the order could be vacated.

Mr. SHERLEY. I still desire a roll call.

SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE FOR SUNDAY.

The SPEAKER. Before beginning that the Chair designates the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] to preside next Sunday, and when they come to eulogies on the Senator from Wisconsin the Chair will ask the gentleman from Kentucky to invite Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin to preside, and when they come to the Senator from New Jersey to invite Mr. EAGAN to preside.

Mr. MANN. Is next Sunday set aside for eulogies?

The SPEAKER. Next Sunday is set aside for eulogies upon three.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS FOR TRANSPORTATION SYSTEMS.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill. The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 311, nays 14, answered "present" 3, not voting 101, as follows:

YEAS—311.

So the bill was passed.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. HELM with Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island.

Mr. COADY with Mr. BOWERS.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER with Mr. JOHNSON of Washington.

Mr. ESTOPINAL with Mr. EMERSON.

Mr. WHITE of Ohio with Mr. NORTON.

Mr. LITTLEPAGE with Mr. COOPER of West Virginia.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH with Mr. COSTELLO.

Mr. SLAYDEN with Mr. LUFKIN.

Mr. HAMILL with Mr. BACHARACH.

Mr. BENSON with Mr. COOPER of Ohio.

Mr. BLACKMON with Mr. DAVIS.

Mr. BOOHER with Mr. DUNN.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee with Mr. FORDNEY.

Mr. CALDWELL with Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania.

Mr. CAREW with Mr. HAMILTON of New York.

Mr. CRISP with Mr. HASKELL.

Mr. DRANE with Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota.

Mr. EAGLE with Mr. KAHN.

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina with Mr. KIESS of Pennsylvania.

Mr. HENSLEY with Mr. LAGUARDIA.

Mr. MCANDREWS with Mr. LANGLEY.

Mr. PARK with Mr. MORIN.

Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY with Mr. MUDD.

Mr. SABATH with Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan.

Mr. SEARS with Mr. NOLAN.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD with Mr. PLATT.

Mr. SISSON with Mr. ROWLAND.

Mr. THOMAS F. SMITH with Mr. RAMSEY.

Mr. STEDMAN with Mr. SANDERS of New York.

Mr. STEVENSON with Mr. SIEGEL.

Mr. SULLIVAN with Mr. VARE.

Mr. TAGUE with Mr. VOIGT.

Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas with Mr. WILSON of Illinois.

Mr. MAHER with Mr. ZIHLMAN.

Mr. PRICE with Mr. WARD.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. LUFKIN, and I discovered when the pairs were read that he was not present. Therefore I wish to withdraw my vote of "nay" and answer "present."

Mr. BURROUGHS. Mr. Speaker, I came into the Hall after my name was called. Had I been present I would have voted "yea."

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Members who did not get here in time for this roll call be allowed to vote now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LUNN). The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the gentlemen who were not here at the time of the roll call be given the privilege of answering to their names.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I can not hear the request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the gentlemen who were not present be allowed to vote on this bill. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe the Speaker should submit such a request. I have no objection to the gentlemen who are here now voting, but that request will always be made in violation of the rules.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I ask that those who did not answer be called again.

Mr. FLOOD. That is the request.

Mr. MANN. No; that is not the request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] object?

Mr. MANN. I object to the request that is made. I have no objection, so far as I am concerned, to having the roll of the absentees called again.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I modify my request to conform to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] modifies his request——

Mr. HUMPHREYS. What is the request?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The request is that the gentlemen who were not here when their names were called——

Mr. FLOOD. The request is that the names of those gentlemen who did not vote on these two roll calls be called again.

Mr. MADDEN. That instead of two roll calls there will be three. That is the request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there any objection to a roll call again?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. Does that proposition mean three roll calls?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes.

Mr. FLOOD. Three roll calls on this vote.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, how am I recorded?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is not recorded. Was the gentleman in the Hall listening when his name was called?

Mr. FOCHT. I always tell the truth, and there was so much confusion I could not tell whether my name was called or not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman votes "present."

Mr. BAER. Mr. Speaker, I renew the request and ask unanimous consent that the names of the absentees be called again.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, we can not hear anything here.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BAER] asks unanimous consent that the names of those who were not here when the roll was called be called again, notwithstanding they were not in the Hall. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the names of those who did not answer.

The roll was called the third time.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The bill is passed.

On motion of Mr. SHERLEY, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. GARLAND rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. GARLAND. To ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey makes the same request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. DICKINSON rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Missouri rise?

Mr. DICKINSON. I rise to ask unanimous consent to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in connection with the bill (H. R. 4404) for the relief of James W. Master.

The SPEAKER. Has any adverse report been filed?

Mr. DICKINSON. No report at all has been filed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to withdraw from the files the papers in connection with the bill (H. R. 4404) for the relief of James W. Master, no adverse report having been filed thereon. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

STATEMENT BY THE SPEAKER.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wants to make one remark to the House in the interest of order. That was a very dangerous precedent that was set down here a little while ago about calling these names. All the effect that that will have will be to induce Members to stay in their rooms two or three minutes longer when the signals are sounded on a roll call. The most important days of the session have come, and Members ought to be here until late in the evening. Last night when the question of adjournment was raised 75 Members went out of here like a house afire. If they had stayed long enough, they would have known that the House met at 11 o'clock to-day.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, in that connection will the Speaker permit me to say that I should not have been willing to grant the request that was made except that various Members stated that there was something the matter with the bells making the call.

The SPEAKER. That was excusable; but to attempt to get down here and force a third roll call is dangerous.

VALIDATING ENTRIES OF CERTAIN PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill S. 3797 for the purpose of having conferees appointed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 3797) validating certain applications for and entries of public lands, and for other purposes.

Mr. FERRIS. I ask unanimous consent that the House insist on its amendments to the Senate bill and grant the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that the House insist upon its amendments and grant the conference asked for by the Senate.

Mr. MANN. Did the Senate add any more amendments?

Mr. FERRIS. I do not think so. I have not examined it critically, but I think they simply disagreed to all the House amendments and asked for a conference.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker announced as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. FERRIS, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, and Mr. LA FOLLETTE.

GUARANTY PRICE OF WHEAT TO PRODUCERS.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12596) to enable the President to carry out the price guaranties made to producers of wheat of the crops of 1918 and 1919 and to protect the United States against undue enhancement of its liabilities thereunder.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 15796, the wheat bill.

Mr. LEVER. And pending that motion, Mr. Speaker, let us see if we can not agree upon some time for general debate. What requests has the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] had?

Mr. HAUGEN. I have had more requests for time on this bill than on any bill that has ever been brought up for consideration. I realize that the time is short, but it seems to me we ought at least to have three hours on this side to accommodate to any extent whatever the gentlemen who have asked for time.

Mr. LEVER. I fully sympathize with the gentleman's position. I think I have had as many requests for time on this bill as I have ever had when in charge of a bill from a committee; but that makes six hours; that would carry us to 6 o'clock.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will say now that he is going to try to keep the House in session until he passes the bill.

Mr. LEVER. I want to try to pass it to-night. It is a short bill.

Mr. MANN. We have got to the point in the session now where we have to wind up some things. Let the gentleman say that the House will stay in session until the bill is passed.

Mr. LEVER. I will try to have the House stay until the bill is passed to-night. I suggest to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] that we make it two hours on a side.

Mr. MANN. Let it be six hours in all.

Mr. LEVER. Very well. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the general debate close at 6 o'clock to-night, the time to be equally divided between the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] and myself.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture would it not be possible and proper to confine the debate to this bill which we have under consideration?

Mr. LEVER. I am perfectly willing that that should be done.

Mr. RUBEY. I think that ought to be done.

Mr. HAUGEN. I should be glad to have that done. I concur in the statement of the gentleman from South Carolina. I want to expedite the passage of this bill as much as anybody does; but, after all, we have these requests for time and I believe we ought to accommodate them as far as possible. If it can not be done, of course gentlemen who have asked for time will yield. If it is possible to give six hours, very well.

Mr. LEVER. Then I change my request. I ask unanimous consent that general debate on this bill, which shall be confined to the bill, shall close in six hours.

Mr. MADDEN. I object to that.

The SPEAKER. What is it that the gentleman objects to?

Mr. MADDEN. To confining the general debate to the bill.

Mr. LEVER. Then I withdraw that part of it, and ask that general debate be limited to six hours, three hours to be controlled by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] and three by myself.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects.

Mr. LEVER. I hope the gentleman from Texas will not object.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I object, unless we can find out how long a time we are going to spend on this bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. LEVER. I am going to stay here until this bill is passed, if it takes until next week.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. That is all right, but the calendar is filled with private bills for which we can not get consideration, and some time ought to be granted before the end of the session for the consideration of those bills.

Mr. HAUGEN. I suggest to the gentleman from South Carolina that he modify his request, to make the general debate five hours.

Mr. LEVER. Then, Mr. Speaker, I modify my request, and ask unanimous consent that the general debate close in five hours.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the general debate be limited to not exceeding five hours, one half the time to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on going into the Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. LEVER, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15796) to enable the President to carry out the price guaranties made to producers of wheat of the crops of 1918 and 1919 and to protect the United States against undue enhancement of its liabilities thereunder, with Mr. HAMLIN in the chair.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVER. I ask to be notified when I have consumed 30 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, on August 10, 1917, the food-control bill became a law. That act was passed primarily to meet two situations. We were advised, by those who should be in a position to know the facts, that the world at that time was facing a world shortage of food. This was especially true with reference to bread. It was urged upon the committee, and they were impressed with the idea that bread was as necessary to win the war as was war material of every description. I believe it can be said truthfully that except for the action of Congress at that time our allies might have broken down because of a lack of bread before we had time to send across any of our man power.

The second purpose in passing this act was to stimulate the production of wheat during the continuance of the emergency, and at the same time to protect the farmer from any unusual drop in the price due to any sudden change in the world situation. The act has justified itself many times over. The wheat farmers of this country, responding to patriotic appeals, and with a guaranty given by the Government against any great loss, produced in the year 1918 one of the largest wheat crops in the history of this country—917,000,000 bushels in round numbers; so that when the armistice was signed we had a reserve of wheat that made it absolutely sure that our domestic consumers, our Army, and our Navy, and the armies and domestic consumers of our allies would have bread.

The urgency of this legislation is indicated by the fact that although it was a bill conferring vast powers that had never before been conferred upon any President of the United States, notwithstanding that fact there were only five negative votes cast. When the bill was finally agreed upon in conference and brought back to the House for its action, upon a yea-and-nay vote on the bill in its final form there was not a single negative vote cast. So Congress at that time was impressed with the urgency of the situation and responded to the appeal of the world for more wheat and more flour.

Section 14 of that act grants the authority to the President to guarantee the price of wheat, in the following language:

> That whenever the President shall find that an emergency exists requiring stimulation of the production of wheat and that it is essential that the producers of wheat produced within the United States shall have the benefits of the guaranty provided for in this section, he is authorized from time to time, seasonably and as far in advance of seeding time as practicable, to determine and fix and to give public notice of what under specified conditions is a reasonable guaranteed price for wheat in order to assure such producers a reasonable profit.

Acting under that authority, on September 2, 1918, the President issued his proclamation in this language:

> The sums thus determined and fixed are guaranteed by the Government of the United States at the respective principal primary markets of the United States above mentioned to every producer of wheat of any grade so established under the United States grain standards act, upon the condition that said wheat is harvested in the United States during the year 1918 and offered for sale before the 1st day of June, 1919, to such agent or employee of the United States or other person as may be hereafter designated.

That is the guaranty of the President of the United States, acting under authority of law. The purpose of the bill now under consideration is to make good this guaranty.

The committee was confronted with two fundamental theories as to the character of this legislation. The first was to protect the Treasury at the expense of the consumer. The second was to protect the consumer against carrying the entire burden of loss. The bill follows the latter theory. The committee felt that it was unwise, unjust, certainly in these days of unrest, to shift this burden, which some one must bear, upon the shoulders of the consuming public, thereby protecting the Treasury from loss. It might be entirely possible that this surplus of wheat be handled without any loss at all to the Government, but in doing so the burden of loss would be shifted to the people of the United States, to the consumers of wheat bread. And it so happens in this country that the largest consumers of wheat bread are people with large families. Nature is always trying to equalize things. It happens that the poor have plenty of children, who are more valuable and more precious than rubies and diamonds, and to have adopted the first theory would have had the effect of placing the burden on those least able to bear it. So the committee thought it wise to adopt the policy to allow the wheat to be handled, as sane business men would, with the thought in mind of making no artificial price to the consumers of this country. The committee thought it would be unwise for England, France, or Italy to be buying their loaf of bread at one price and our consumers in this country paying at a higher price. We felt that we could not afford in this period of reconstruction, when men are thinking abnormally, when the world itself is in an unsettled state, to take any chance on that kind of a proposition. I feel that the committee was wise in coming to the conclusion it did.

When we had decided on the theory as fundamental to this legislation we were confronted with various methods of carrying it into practical effect. Some who appeared before the committee suggested and earnestly urged that forthwith we should resume prewar conditions in the grain business, open up the exchanges, take off all restrictions as to exports and imports, revoke the licenses issued—in other words, let the trade go back to its normal condition.

Another suggestion advanced was that we might partially resume prewar conditions in the grain business by controlling speculative transactions in the grain exchanges, by enabling the Government itself, whenever there is any indication of manipulation of the market, to be in a position to stabilize the market.

Finally, it was suggested that something like the present machinery should be kept in force until the time fixed in the bill, when the grain trade might safely resume its prewar operations.

The committee did not agree to the first proposition, for the reason that the grain trade thought it economically unsafe to do so. The leading members of the Chicago Board of Trade thought it might be unwise to do this so long as there is foreign control over wheat and wheat flour.

We did not adopt the second proposition of partially controlling the situation through Government agencies and allowing the trade to get back to prewar conditions as far as possible, for the reason just stated. So the committee has brought in a bill that in its practical effect retains the machinery now existing, known as the Food Administration Grain Corporation, which in its effect has complete monopoly of the wheat business in this country.

There are many difficulties in handling this matter. First of all, we have the proposition of the carry over from the 1918 crop. Mr. Barnes in his testimony said that up to the time of the signing of the armistice the Grain Corporation was bending its efforts to build up a reserve of 150,000,000 to 200,000,000 bushels of wheat, so that if any calamity happened anywhere we would be in a position to meet the situation. Immediately, however, after signing the armistice Mr. Barnes, who headed the Grain Corporation, began to look about for purchasers of the surplus crop of 1918, and I am very glad to be able to say to the committee that in his testimony he encourages us to believe by figures that we need not have any fear of the carry over from the 1918 crop. His figures are as follows:

> Of the 348,000,000 bushels, we have exported to February 1, 1919, practically 180,000,000 bushels. We have then for export disposition between February 1 and the end of the 1918 crop year approximately 170,000,000 bushels. Against this we have the following commitments, definite and estimated, to be supplied as wheat or wheat flour: European allies, 100,000,000 bushels; commission for relief in Belgium, 20,000,000 bushels; neutrals, 15,000,000 bushels; and European relief, 30,000,000 bushels. Total, 165,000,000 bushels.
> These exclude any contribution to enemy countries, such as may be approved by the supreme council on supply and relief or the armistice authorities later, but also these enemy country necessities may be satisfied with rye and other grains, instead of wheat, should we be short available wheat.

So that, as a matter of fact, we have in sight a surplus with the grain corporation of only about 5,000,000 bushels of wheat from the 1918 crop.

Now, then, another difficulty faced the committee. We produce in this country about 325,000,000 bushels of spring wheat.

Mr. WELLING. Would it interrupt the gentleman if I asked him a question?

Mr. LEVER. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WELLING. Is the 1918 carry-over crop being disposed of to foreign Governments, so that there will be no loss to the Government of the United States?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman pardon me for a question? I like to follow the gentleman, who is making a very interesting statement. Is the gentleman making the statement now that out of the money set aside by the United States Government to take care of any shortage between the price that we have guaranteed the farmer and the price at which we have sold in the world's market, and that we are not making any use of the reserve money when wheat is sold at the guaranteed price and that it represents no loss?

Mr. LEVER. The money to which the gentleman refers is a revolving fund and goes back into the Treasury.

Mr. JUUL. The gentleman states that the 1918 crop is practically disposed of.

Mr. LEVER. That is true.

Mr. JUUL. Does the gentleman mean to state to the House that it is disposed of without any loss to the country, and that we are practically maintaining the price we are guaranteeing?

Mr. LEVER. That is true.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Chairman, is there any good reason why the Government guaranty should not be limited to the crops now seeded?

Mr. LEVER. I am coming to that.

Mr. ROBINSON. To the crops now seeded, up to the 1st of March, 1919?

Mr. LEVER. That is a problem with which the committee wrestled quite a while. The spring wheat production of this country normally is about 325,000,000 bushels.

It is about one-third of the total crop. It is true that not very much of the spring-wheat area has been seeded, if any. We asked Mr. Barnes about that proposition, and in that connection I want to say that he is one of the fairest men who ever appeared before the House committee.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Does the gentleman wish his answer to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. ROBIN-

SON] to stand just as he made it, that the committee "wrestled" with that question for a long time; that is, the question of whether or not the Government should make good its guaranty on the spring wheat? Is it not true that the committee dismissed that promptly and determined without any difference of opinion that we ought to make good the spring-wheat guaranty?

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman is correct. I was misleading in my statement. I should have said that it was discussed at various times during the hearings, but the committee felt from the outset that the farmers should get the guaranteed price.

Mr. Barnes, before the committee, said:

As to excluding the spring-sown wheat from the guaranteed price as the termination of a war contract, I should point out the practical difficulties even while I say in advance that the proposal appears to me to border too closely on bad faith. If an attempt is made to reimburse producers' actual loss for expenditures made in preparation for growing under that guaranty, the practical difficulties in arriving at fair conclusions as to those damages in several hundred thousand cases, and the scandal sure to follow in a storm of charges of preference and prejudice in determining those claims, would alone condemn it. In the marketing of wheat it would be impossible to segregate spring-sown wheat from fall-sown. Some areas grow both in the same counties. The flow of grain interchanges from one territory to the other, and in any attempt to apply one method of price to fall-sown and another method of price to spring-sown the door is wide open to fraud on a stupendous scale.

More than that, if I may have the attention of my friend from North Carolina [Mr. ROBINSON], I would like to read again in this connection the proclamation of the President of the United States making this guarantee:

* * * that said wheat is harvested in the United States during 1919 and offered for sale before the 1st day of June, 1920, to such agent or employee of the United States or other persons as may be hereafter designated at one of the above-mentioned cities.

That is the proclamation of the President. The President has given his solemn word, "I will pay you $2.26 per bushel on the basis of No. 1, northern spring wheat, Chicago, if you present it to my agent before June 1, 1920." I fully agree with Mr. Barnes in the statement that for us to undertake to segregate spring wheat from fall wheat at this time would be to border dangerously close on bad faith. The committee, without hesitation—and I am glad my friend corrected that—came unanimously to the conclusion that the spring wheat farmer was included in the proclamation. The Government is in a contract with the farmer, and if the producer fulfills his contract by the delivery of wheat, as provided for in the proclamation, there is nothing left for the Government to do but to live up to the agreement.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. For a question.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Is it not true that the President's guarantee is based upon No. 1 northern spring wheat?

Mr. LEVER. That is true.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Then clearly spring wheat was in contemplation at the time of the guarantee.

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. BAER. And is it not true that Congress authorized the President to fix the price?

Mr. LEVER. Absolutely.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, if what the gentleman says is true, and I think it is conceded by everybody, that this agreement was regularly and honorably made and authorized by the Congress, what is the use of our having five hours of debate on the question?

Mr. LEVER. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. Could wheat sown in the fall of 1919 be harvested and offered for sale by June 1, 1920?

Mr. LEVER. No.

Mr. ROBINSON. If that is true, you are working a great injustice to the public by giving these wheat farmers a bonus of $1 a bushel, at the present prices.

Mr. LEVER. The guaranty goes to June 1, 1920, for the 1919 crop; that is, for wheat planted in the fall of 1918 and for wheat sown in the spring of 1919.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is, it goes to wheat offered to the Government agents by June 1, 1920?

Mr. LEVER. Yes; if grown at the times I have stated.

Mr. ROBINSON. The question I asked was whether wheat sown this fall could mature and be offered for sale by June 1, 1920?

Mr. LEVER. No.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. I wonder if the gentleman will permit me to proceed——

Mr. LAZARO. Just one question.

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. The gentleman stated awhile ago that the purpose of the law was, first, to have bread in order to win the war, and, second, to increase the production of wheat. I fully agree with the gentleman on that. I want to ask this question for information: Is there anything that this Government could have done to get the allies pledged to help us bear this burden in the event an armistice was signed suddenly?

Mr. LEVER. Well, that question was asked Mr. Barnes, and he informed us nothing had been done.

Mr. KREIDER. If the gentleman will permit me in order to correct a statement, in reply to the question asked by the gentleman from North Dakota as to the possibility of selling this year's crop of wheat, selling, for instance, at $2.20 and buying at $1.25, the chairman said it would be possible in reference to seed wheat. That is not possible because the wheat price is guaranteed until June 1, and there is no spring wheat sold in June and the price will be guaranteed while the seeding is being done. You could not sell one and buy the other. I simply say that to show, if it were true, it would have in it the element of speculation which the bill does not possess.

Mr. LEVER. I am obliged to the gentleman. Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I think the committee will be interested in what the prospects of this country are for the crop of wheat in 1919. In a memorandum prepared by the Food Department and Department of Agriculture I find this:

The number of acres of wheat planted for the 1918 crop was as follows: Winter wheat, 42,301,000 acres; spring wheat, 22,406,000 acres. However, of the winter wheat planted about 5,000 acres were abandoned. From this planting there was harvested 917,100,000 bushels. For the harvest of 1919 it is estimated there have been planted 49,261,000 acres of winter wheat, an increase of 16.5 per cent over the winter wheat planted in the fall of 1917 for the crop of 1918. The spring wheat has not yet been planted, but if there is the same increase in the planting of spring wheat in 1919 as there is as to winter wheat, the total acreage of spring wheat may be about 26,000,000 acres, or a total estimated acreage of about 75,000,000 acres.

The CHAIRMAN. The time the gentleman allotted to himself has expired.

Mr. LEVER. I yield myself 10 additional minutes. This would indicate, Mr. Chairman, if the conditions in the wheat area continue throughout the season, that we will have a production of 1,250,000,000 bushels of wheat. I think no one before the committee, and the entire grain trade was represented, had any idea unless some calamity overtook the crop that we would produce less than a billion bushels of wheat. The world production of wheat ranges from 3,500,000,000 bushels to 4,000,000,000 bushels a year. Now, I would like to take up with the committee briefly the foreign situation as it touches wheat. First, as to the consumption of wheat by foreign peoples.

Mr. SUMNERS. If the gentleman will permit, I do not know whether the gentleman cares to be interrupted——

Mr. LEVER. I would like to submit to interruptions, but I have only 10 more minutes. The estimated available stocks from surplus wheat countries other than the United States in January, 1919, were: Canada, 100,000,000 bushels; Argentina, 185,000,000 bushels; Australia, 210,000,000 bushels; or a total for the three countries of 495,000,000 bushels. The estimated surplus of the United States of the harvesting of last summer was 277,000,000 bushels, making a grand total of the four countries of 772,000,000 bushels. Our allies and the neutral countries in Europe will need to import this year about 649,000,000 bushels to meet their normal prewar requirement. If Germany and Austria-Hungary also are supplied on a prewar basis they will need to import about 79,000,000 bushels. This will make the total requirement for Europe 728,000,000 bushels in excess of their home production. These estimates do not include Russia or any of the Balkan States. It is probable that India, which produces something like 350,000,000 bushels of wheat per year, will be an importer of wheat this year. Mr. Barnes said in his testimony he had seen a cablegram, while in London a few weeks ago, to the effect that stocks of wheat in India had run practically out and that India instead of being an exporter of wheat, as she usually is, would be an importer.

Now, then, the probable demand for wheat, without going through all the figures, will be 728,000,000 bushels. It would seem from the figures that we will have a left-over exportable surplus of 167,000,000 bushels of wheat, and my figures are these: Canada, 100,000,000 bushels for export; Argentina, 185,000,000 bushels; Australia, 210,000,000 bushels; and America, 400,000,000 bushels, making a total export of 895,000,000 bushels, as against the European demand on the prewar calculation. I am convinced that more wheat will be consumed than there was before the war. As food prices go down consumption of wheat, not only in Europe but in this country, will increase.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Is it clear all are going to have a surplus?

Mr. LEVER. That is true; they may not have a surplus. So while this bill carries $1,000,000,000 on its face and has shocked the sensibilities of some, I am not so sure that the Government is going to stand a loss of a very great sum of money on this proposition. [Applause.]

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LEVER. For a short question.

Mr. LONDON. In what manner does the measure protect itself against loss? Is the Government a selling agent?

Mr. LEVER. The Government in this case has a complete monopoly; it buys and sells it.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. For a question.

Mr. McCULLOCH. The gentleman has stated this bill will protect the poor, the consumer, and I have listened with interest, but have heard no explanation whatever of this statement. I would like to know wherein this bill will protect the consumer.

Mr. LEVER. The theory of this bill, I will say to the gentleman from Ohio, is that the wheat shall be bought from the producer at the guaranteed price.

It was the intention of the committee, as we felt it to be the will of this House, that there should be no possibility of a fall-down with respect to the guaranty to the farmer. He should get for his wheat the fixed price. The grain corporation, or whatever agency the President sets up, will sell this wheat at what may be a reasonable price, taking into consideration prices that may be existing in the great centers of foreign nations, I was about to say, sell it on the basis of a world price; but it was very distinctly set forth and made plain to the committee that under these abnormal conditions there can not be any world price. The lack of international credit, the tie-up in transportation, and various and sundry things entering into the economics of the situation make that impossible.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Will the gentleman permit? Is the price determined by the law of supply and demand?

Mr. LEVER. As much as possible.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Does the gentleman take care of the difference by paying the farmer, or will the Government keep the price up to the guaranteed price?

Mr. LEVER. I will say to my friend that the committee took this view of it: We are legislating on prospects. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] yesterday said it was dangerous to legislate on predictions. It is more dangerous to go into the details of legislation when you are legislating on a prospect. No one knows what the wheat situation is going to be two weeks from now or two months from now. Some great calamity may sweep over the country, like a hard frost, and instead of having an extra large crop we may have a subnormal crop. It may be possible that on account of this abnormal weather that we have had throughout the wheat belt wheat is going to be attacked by insects, flies, or bugs, and thereby greatly reduce the prospects of a large crop. No one can tell, and for that reason we have put as little detail in this bill as possible.

Mr. McCULLOCH. I want to develop one point. Will the consumer get his flour and his wheat by the law of supply and demand, or is he going to pay the guaranteed price?

Mr. LEVER. I have tried to answer the gentleman.

Mr. McCULLOCH. What does the bill provide?

Mr. LEVER. The bill provides that it may be sold at that price or any other price.

Mr. McCULLOCH. As determined by the President?

Mr. LEVER. Not determined by the President, but by the law of supply and demand.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I will take 10 minutes more.

Mr. HARDY. I would like to ask the gentleman whether or not it was intended that this provision would enable the Government to bear the market on the price of wheat?

Mr. LEVER. The committee did not think the Government ought to put itself in position of bearing the market. The committee thought the Government ought to act in this matter as a sane business man transacting his own business would. That is the theory of this bill.

Mr. SUMNERS. I want to ask the chairman if he has explained the theory on which the country is considered to be obligated to take care of the price of spring wheat that is not yet planted? If the gentleman stated it, I did not hear him.

Mr. LEVER. I referred to that.

Mr. OLNEY. Literally the object of this bill is to subsidize the wheat grower at the rate of a dollar a bushel.

Mr. LEVER. It is not a subsidy. It is carrying out the faith of the Government with the farmer.

Mr. OLNEY. You spoke of the amount of seed on hand as 90,000,000 to 100,000,000 bushels.

Mr. LEVER. That is the amount.

Mr. OLNEY. Would not we be carrying out our moral obligations by paying the farmer for the seed on hand?

Mr. LEVER. He has the right to sell his wheat on hand.

The powers conferred in this bill are broad, and we have tried to make them elastic, so that the agencies created by the President might meet any situation that may develop as the crop progresses. We necessarily had to make the provision broad. The appropriation is large, a billion dollars, and it is a revolving fund. We do not know whether that will be necessary or not. I am inclined to think that the Government will get out of this with very much less than a billion dollars. But the Government must pay it to keep its faith. That is all there is to it. What we did in the passage of the food-control act was to suspend a law of economics. We undertook to repeal the law of supply and demand. You can not do it, as a witness before our committee said, and avoid paying a penalty. Congress did not make the law of supply and demand, and we are paying in this bill the penalty for having done violence to that economic law. But, gentlemen of the committee, it was necessary to do it. Congrsss felt it necessary in order to win this war. We have won the war, and this is a part of war expenses.

That is what it is. This bill is confined to wheat and wheat flour. It was suggested in some of the testimony before the committee that we ought to include cereals of all kinds, and some went so far as to say that we should make the language of the bill broad enough to cover meat and various and sundry things. The committee thought, after listening to the testimony, that it was the will of Congress and the judgment of the American people that as quickly as possible we should get back to the normal prewar condition. Therefore we confined it to wheat and wheat flour.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. I am sorry, but I can not yield. Will not the gentleman take time under the five-minute rule? I am limited in time.

Now, gentlemen, I am about through. The Government has entered into a solemn pledge with the wheat farmers of this country.

Mr. WELTY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. I can not yield. The Government has given its word to the producers of wheat. They have responded nobly. They are producing the greatest wheat crop that this country ever produced, and the Government should comply fully and freely with its agreement.

If this war had continued, the probability is that we would have needed every bushel of wheat that the farmers are going to produce. It is the solemn duty of this Congress to make good that guaranty. The Government of the United States is as binding in this matter as it is to pay liberty bonds or its circulating notes. I can not conceive that there is a single, solitary Member of this House, who is honest in his own transactions and his own personal dealings, who would have the hardihood to vote against it. [Applause.]

If such should be the case, I shall be greatly disappointed in that individual. I believe that the honest people whom he represents would likewise be sadly disappointed in him. Our faith is given. Our word is pledged. We must keep it.

They do not grow enough wheat in my district or in my State to make biscuits for breakfast every day in the year. I have no personal interest in this matter at all. If the Government had given its guaranty as to the prices on steel, copper, oats, meat, pork, beef, cotton, sheep, mutton, or anything else, I would be standing here pleading that the contract be kept with the producers of those commodities and all others that might have had a guaranty. I am standing here pleading that the Government keep its pledge with the wheat farmers of this country who have kept faith with it. Gentlemen, I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, has the gentleman time to yield to a question?

Mr. LEVER. How much time have I, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has one minute and a half.

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Somebody at one time said that when we guaranteed the price of wheat we did so in order to produce a large crop of wheat, so that we would be able in part to feed the countries allied with us in the war. Now, we expect to carry out the guaranty and produce an extra large crop of wheat, part of which is already planted, much of which is not yet sold, much of which will go to the allies. Is there any way by which they are going to contribute to the loss which may be incurred or are we to be the only ones to hold the sack?

Mr. LEVER. I am sorry I can not tell the gentleman that. When Mr. Barnes was before the committee the question was asked if he had any arrangements with the allied Governments as to the 1919 crop, and his answer was that there was no such arrangement. It seems to me we shall have to bear the burden alone.

Mr. MANN. We undertake to raise a large crop of wheat for the benefit of our allies. We are expecting to pay the high price guaranteed for that and let them get off without any expense?

Mr. LEVER. I will say to my friend from Illinois—and I think it will be interesting to him—that Great Britain is now buying a large quantity of wheat from Argentina.

Mr. MANN. Can the gentleman say at what price they bought it?

Mr. ANDERSON. One dollar and thirty-five cents.

Mr. MANN. It was not a matter of credit, then. If they can buy it at a dollar a bushel less than from this country, that is the reason they bought it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] is recognized.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKINLEY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MCKINLEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] has so clearly set out the provisions of this bill that it seems hardly necessary for one who is in favor of it to attempt to talk further on it.

I will vote for this billion-dollar appropriation because the President has pledged the good faith of the Government, and the promise must be kept.

The farmers in 1917 and 1918 asked Mr. Hoover and the President not to control prices. Nevertheless, the President did spread his fatherly hand over the farmers of the North, and now we should and must pay for his mistake. It was not many years ago the country was startled by the statement that Congress had appropriated a billion dollars to run the Government for one year. This year it is stated the expense will be eighteeen billions. Let me suggest a few items totaling five billions that are hardly noticed. For instance, in 1918 under Mr. McAdoo it cost twelve hundred and fifty millions more to run the railroads than it did in 1917 under private ownership. We are dropping a billion dollars of revenue in the passage of the prohibition measure. The insurance policies on dead soldiers will cost seven hundred and fifty millions—a very proper expenditure, by the way, and one the country will willingly pay. In our little frenzy to build worthless wooden ships and Hog Island shipyards we have expended so much money that Mr. Hurley, the President's ship manager, advises us to charge off $1,000,000,000 loss and forget it. So here we are:

Wheat experiment, one billion.
Railroad experiment, one and one-fourth billions.
Ship experiment, one billion.
Prohibition, one billion.
Insurance, three-fourths of a billion.
Total, $5,000,000,000.

There is a saying in the West that "in the end the farmer pays it all." In this instance he will get a chance to pay back this wheat billion on account of the other four billions, and particularly in increased freight rates, to make up the one and one-fourth billions, through the President's experiment in running railroads.

In closing let me touch again on the President's shipbuilding hobby. You will remember before the war he endeavored to put this over but was defeated in the Senate. Under the stress of war and the plea of patriotism he brought it forward again and was granted unlimited funds. From figures before me which, I think, are authentic, the total value of all the ships in the world in prewar time was three billions. When we get through with our shipbuilding policy we will have expended about six billions and will own about one-fourth of the tonnage of the ships in the world.

In other words, our ships will have cost us eight times as much per ton as privately owned ships of other nations. The farmers and other heavy-freight shippers are expected to pay additional freight in order that we may operate American ships costing eight times as much as foreign-owned ships.

I yield back the balance of my time. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 14078) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes, had requested a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendments, and had appointed Mr. MARTIN of Virginia, Mr. UNDERWOOD, and Mr. SMOOT as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

GUARANTY PRICE OF WHEAT TO PRODUCER.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, as stated by the chairman of the committee [Mr. LEVER], under the terms of the proclamation of the President on November 2, by virtue of an act of Congress of August 10, 1918, the wheat growers of this country were guaranteed a certain price for their wheat at 22 principal primary markets. The lowest price per bushel for No. 1 northern spring, No. 1 hard winter, No. 1 red winter, No. 1 durum, No. 1 hard white was $2 at Salt Lake City; the highest, $2.29½, at New York City; $2.21½ at Minneapolis; $2.26 at Chicago. As has been stated, the object of the proposed bill, among other things, is to enable the President to make that guaranty good; so far, very well. I take it that all are agreed that every legitimate and proper contract, great or small, should be redeemed unconditionally—certainly a contract made by the Government. I can not imagine that anyone with any sense of honor would ever suggest the repudiation of a legitimate obligation. If so, it is not necessary to discuss that phase of the bill; so if that were all there is to it, we would have no controverted question before us.

But, gentlemen, that is not all that is in this bill. If you will turn to section 3, you will find that it guarantees the millers, the bakers, the wholesale jobbers, and the merchants buying in carload lots against loss.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. HAUGEN. I will yield in a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. HAUGEN. So in order to honorably discharge one obligation made in time of war, made to aid in bringing the war to a triumphant conclusion, it is proposed now in time of peace, with taxes high and Government bonds selling below par, to take on an additional burden. The question then is, Why go into this insurance business and thus extract additional millions from the Public Treasury at a time when the American people are staggering under the burdens of taxation and bond issues already imposed? Why single out certain classes—the miller, the baker, and the dealer purchasing in carload lots—all most excellent people, but there are others? The dealers who do not buy in carload lots are entitled to consideration also.

One contention is that it is necessary in order to insure a steady flow of wheat and flour. That is, of course, absurd. If necessary to insure the miller, the baker, and dealers in wheat and flour, it is just as necessary to insure the groceryman, the dealers in food and in hardware. Prices are high all along the line. The prices of groceries and hardware are just as certain to go down as is wheat or flour. Why the discrimination? They are all worthy and deserving people, all entitled to the same consideration. What will be the result? In the proclamation the guaranty expires June 1, 1920. Therefore it is fair to assume that the buying of wheat and flour should cease before that day. In this bill, instead of its closing up its business on that day, it will find that it is obligated to buy wheat and flour held by millers, bakers, and merchants. So instead of having sold its wheat and closed its business it has simply loaned it to the millers, bakers, and merchants.

Who is back of this proposition? No merchant asked for it. Certainly not the millers! Here is what their representative, Mr. Bell, had to say about it. See page 145 of the hearings before the Committee on Agriculture:

Mr. HAUGEN. Your contention is that the miller should get a guaranteed profit?
Mr. BELL. No, sir.
Mr. HAUGEN. I understood you to say so.
Mr. BELL. No, sir.
Mr. HAUGEN. Did you say something about safeguarding men against loss?
Mr. BELL. No, sir.

On page 155 the chairman asked this question:

Have you any other gentlemen who represent the millers who desire to be heard?
Mr. BELL. No; Mr. Chairman, our committee was content to allow me to be their spokesman.

That, I believe, makes it clear as to the millers' position in the matter and disposes of the guaranty to millers and merchants.

So then, gentlemen, that proposition does not come at the suggestion of the millers or the dealers in flour. Oh, no; according to the Federal Trade Commission's report the millers were permitted to increase their profit of 175 per cent on operating; 100 per cent on their capital. They did not have the gall to ask for it.

Mr. SUMNERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. I would prefer not to at present. I will yield in a moment. Now, what is the other proposition? Mr. Barnes, who represents the Government at the head of the Grain Corporation, who probably knows more about the handling of wheat than any other man in the United States, ought to know what is necessary to carry out this contract in good faith. What did he suggest? If you will turn to page 162, you will find that Mr. Barnes asked for authority to license carriers and elevators in order to reflect fairly the terminal price back to the producer at country stations, to prevent breaking down the country price, and so any fair reflection of the natural guaranteed price; in other words, to protect the producer and the Government. No such provision in the bill. He asked for preferential rail service on American railroads and steamships. No such provision in the bill. What about the exchanges? He asked for authority to control exchange trading. He said that this would be necessary. He stated: "To recognize exchange trading in those same commodities and the speculatively influenced possible prices thereby would embarrass price maintenance."

On page 172 the chairman asked: "What do you say as to the partial coming back to prewar conditions in all exchanges, with the Government a partial buyer and seller, as occasion might demand?" His answer was: "Practically, I am inclined to think it would not operate fairly without great abuse."

The bill closes the exchanges as far as wheat and flour are concerned, but it permits speculation and manipulation of other cereals, and we all know that as the price of oats and corn is hammered down, down goes the price of wheat. Mr. Barnes appeared before the committee as a representative of the Government and asked for—> authority to buy and sell wheat and other cereals and their products and other foodstuffs, at home or abroad, for cash or for credit. This is purposely recommended wide enough so that a national policy of combined sales of wheat and other imperatively needed foodstuffs may facilitate the marketing of wheat; also, wide enough to permit the encouragement of wheat sales abroad by the credit inducement, which may offset price comparison altogether. New legislation should allow the purchase of 1918 balance as well, and there should be no limitation on those with whom either purchases or sales should be made.

> Import and export embargo power. This is necessary as a basis for any national policy of combined foodstuffs sales, and should include authority over all foodstuffs.
>
> Mr. BARNES. The reason I think other foodstuffs than cereals, if you please, wheat or wheat flour and other cereals, should be controlled is with the idea it might be a necessary defensive public policy to make combination sales of our products. I think I commented in my statement that the European needs for a meat supply are at least 50 per cent of their requirements. Our idea is to be in a position to say, "If you want to purchase our meat products, you should make purchases of a certain percentage of our wheat products also."
>
> The CHAIRMAN. Is there a larger shortage of meat products in the world than there is of wheat?
>
> Mr. BARNES. Yes; they are more dependent upon the United States for meats.
>
> The CHAIRMAN. They are more dependent upon us for meats?
> Mr. BARNES. Yes.

He says it is necessary to control foodstuffs outside of cereals. Gentlemen, that is not in the bill. Why is it necessary? He says that the world is short on fats. We are long on fats. He proposes that we put ourselves in the position that when these people come to us to buy our fats we shall say to them, "If we let you have the fats, we also expect you to take some of the wheat, that we may unload some of our surplus of wheat."

Another thing, a most stupendous proposition—I can not imagine that any business man would ever suggest such a thing. If you will turn to page 161 of the hearings, you will find that Mr. Barnes asked for authority to borrow money, to pledge the credit of the agencies and the property of the agencies. What does the bill provide for? It provides for pledging the credit of not the agencies but the United States without limit. Have you ever heard of such a thing? Has anybody thought of such a thing? Can it be possible that Congress could ever suggest such a thing? Yet it is in the bill. It is true that it provides that the property of the agencies shall be pledged, but who cares for the collateral securities? Government bonds have been sold without any collateral security.

Why, gentlemen, the integrity of 110,000,000 people and our $250,000,000,000 of resources have been considered adequate, and we have never been called upon to put up collateral security. What does the banker or investor care about the collateral security? What does he care about the name? This agency can buy 100,000,000 bushels of wheat and pay $250,000,000, and sell it to John Jones, it matters not who he is, and his note can be offered as collateral security. What does the banker care about John Jones? He looks to Uncle Sam. That is all that is necessary. The money is obtained on the note. The Government agency turns around and buys another 100,000,000 bushels, and probably buys back the very 100,000,000 bushels that it sold to John Jones. Thus you have an endless chain and credit after credit without limit.

Much has been said about the bargain we made. Let me call your attention to the kind of a bargain we made. We guaranteed the price of $2.26; Italy guaranteed $4.44 for the 1919 crop; France guaranteed $3.84; Holland guaranteed $3.30; Switzerland guaranteed $3.18; Norway guaranteed $4.09, and so all along the line. Yet people are scared to death that we are going to create a loss of a billion dollars. Yet the price is only half what is guaranteed in other countries.

But you speak of a surplus. Everybody agrees we have not got a bushel of surplus of the 1918 crop. It is true that a few speculators have been trying to make out that we have a surplus, but evidently they have sold short and they are now trying to hammer down the price by sending out these reports.

Now, my friends, it is well to review the history of this legislation. As you know, Mr. Hoover came here. Whether he was sent here or sent for, it matters not; but we were told by Mr. Hoover that the price of wheat was likely to go to $7 a bushel. He told us that his task was to furnish flour at $6.60 per barrel. That would net the farmer about $1 per bushel. Later he said the price might be fixed at $1.50 a bushel. Congress fixed it at $2 a bushel. We provided for a commission, and that commission fixed the price at $2.20.

Wheat was then selling at $3.45. Neutral nations offered $1 premium, or $4.45. The railroads were taken over and the rates were increased, and the price was increased to make up for the increased rates, and the price was fixed at $2.26. The farmer said, "I am not so much concerned about the price of wheat as I am about winning the war." He said, "Fix the price at any price." It was fixed at less than half what the wheat would have brought under the natural law of supply and demand. So any farmer who sold a thousand bushels sacrificed at least $2,000. Now you propose that he shall go down in his pocket and pay his share of the taxes and purchase his share of bonds to make good this insurance that we are granting to these other people. Are we dealing fairly with him, gentlemen? Have we dealt fairly with the farmer? We told him to plant and harvest and sell, and he planted and produced, as has been stated here, 917,000,000 bushels of wheat, which is about one-third of the total production of wheat in the world. They produced over 5,600,000,000 bushels of cereals, or about one-third of the total production of cereals in the world, 19,500,000,000 pounds of beef, mutton, and pork. If you will take the Secretary's report, you will find that the 1918 production of live stock on hand January 1 aggregated in value $24,700,000,000. It amounts to about three times the total stock of money in the United States, even after our printing presses have been running night and day to the full capacity.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Did the committee estimate how much more spring wheat would be planted this spring as the result of this guaranty than would have been planted if this guaranty and not been made?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes; we have had all kinds of estimates. Unfortunately there seems to be a tendency in this country to overestimate the surplus and thus depress the prices and cause a loss to the Government; I do not know for what reason.

That seemed to be the tendency all along the line and that seems to be the aim of the representatives of the exchanges. We have no way to estimate the crop. The 1918 crop is reported to be 917,000,000 bushels, and it is possible that the 1919 crop may be a billion bushels, but all may be needed. It is simply an estimate. We may have an increase of acreage, but we must take into consideration the climate and a number of other things.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. I agree with what the gentleman says about the Government guaranteeing the price to the farmers, but I do not catch his reasoning nor that of the chairman of the committee in reference to wheat to be sown this next spring.

Mr. HAUGEN. It is to be sown this spring and offered for sale before June 1, 1920. We have a provision in the law providing drastic penalties for anyone who may violate the law by making false statements, and so forth.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. I will.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. If I understand the statement, the guaranteed price by European countries is higher than ours.

Mr. HAUGEN. Many of them.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. It is safe to say that the world's market will not get below $2.26.

Mr. HAUGEN. Wheat is selling 10, 20, and 30 per cent above the guaranteed price. Everybody is talking about a loss. We are making money now and the corporation has millions of dollars to its credit and probably will have at the end of the year. We have made this contract and we propose that it shall be carried out. The duty of Congress is to give the authority asked by the representatives of the Government, and it is for the interest of the Government and for the protection of the Government for us to give authority to carry out this contract in good faith. We are not complying with the Government's recommendation.

Mr. SUMNERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. I will in a minute. Let me make this clear. My friends, the proposition is this: To vote against the bill is to repudiate the contract made by the President, and a vote for the bill is to turn down the recommendation of the Federal Government and a failure to give to the Government proper aid or protection to carry out the contract in good faith. I for my part do not want the contract repudiated, so there is nothing to do but to vote for the bill.

Mr. SUMNERS. I just want to ask the gentleman one question. We have got the spring wheat to plant in the future?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes; certainly.

Mr. SUMNERS. I gather from the statement of the gentleman here that we have a large surplus for exportation. We do not need the spring wheat; and as the matter seems to me, the Government might do justice to the people who have not planted their wheat, and which planting will increase the difficulties, and at the same time not submit too heavy a planting of the spring wheat. I do not know whether it is possible or not.

Mr. HAUGEN. What leads the gentleman to that conclusion? Corn is selling on a parity with wheat. People in the corn belt are not likely to plant wheat. We planted wheat in the corn belt last year because the Government appealed to us to do so, but we know that wheat planted in the corn belt is too often a loss. Until we dispose of the black rust the wheat proposition in our country is an uncertainty.

Mr. SUMNERS. If the guaranty of the price of spring wheat to planters will not stimulate production, the refusal to guarantee will not do him an injustice.

Mr. HAUGEN. I did not catch the gentleman's question.

Mr. SUMNERS. If the guaranty of the price of spring wheat will not stimulate production, the refusal to guarantee will not do the farmer any injustice.

Mr. HAUGEN. But it will. The question involved here is to make the Government contract good. It is always an injustice to repudiate a contract. I have no sympathy with a man who will repudiate a contract, great or small. I believe the contract should be redeemed. Why, my friend, the pirates of old had a sense of honor that led them to sacrifice life rather than their word. Can it be possible that any Member of Congress suggests repudiation? I know the gentleman would be the last to suggest such a thing.

Mr. SUMNERS. I do not; I was asking the gentleman a question.

Mr. HAUGEN. I know the gentleman is in sympathy with what I said, and I am not charging him with suggesting repudiation.

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. The spring-wheat planter has not performed any part of the contract.

Mr. HAUGEN. He has a contract with the Federal Government. Are you going to make it good or repudiate it? Now, I do not want to take up any more time of the House.

Mr. SUMNERS. I will not interrupt the gentleman any more. I presumed that the gentleman would give information to those who are not fortunate enough to have it.

Mr. HAUGEN. I am willing to give all the information I can.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Has the gentleman heard of any Member of Congress who wanted to repudiate these contracts?

Mr. HAUGEN. No. I stated at the outset that I could not conceive of a man in or out of Congress suggesting repudiation.

Mr. McCULLOCH. The price of wheat ordinarily will be determined by the law of supply and demand.

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes; and if we had not interfered the price to the farmer would have been twice as much. We deprived the farmer of 50 per cent of the value of his wheat in a free and open market, which for a billion bushels would be $2,000,000,000. He brought it to town and sold it cheerfully at the price fixed. His representatives came to Congress and said, "We are not interested in this proposition; fix the price yourselves."

Mr. McCULLOCH. The law of supply and demand determines the price to the consumer and would determine the price of flour.

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. McCULLOCH. It would determine the price of wheat.

Mr. HAUGEN. Speculation has something to do with that.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Under this bill you authorize the President or the Government to pay the guaranteed price of $2.26, do you not?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. McCULLOCH. How is the price of wheat and flour to the consumer going to be determined, or what is going to be the result of this bill to the consumer?

Mr. HAUGEN. The consumer will have to pay the going price. If you leave it open to speculation, you would have to leave it to the judgment of the speculators.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Is it not true that under this bill it is left to the President?

Mr. HAUGEN. If you permit the practice going on here in Washington, there will be no way of estimating the greed of these people.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Under the bill, the law of supply and demand will not determine the price to the consumer and neither will the guaranteed price be the price to the consumer, but the price to the consumer will be the amount that the President decides it should be.

Mr. HAUGEN. Is the gentleman not willing to leave it to the President?

Mr. McCULLOCH. I do not think I am, if you are asking me a question. I think Congress should determine that.

Mr. HAUGEN. We have given the agency the authority to buy and sell. It may sell at any price, but it must pay the guaranteed price.

Mr. McCULLOCH. What the Government ought to do is to accept the loss and pay whatever it is, and let the consumer get the material at the price fixed by the law of supply and demand.

Mr. HAUGEN. Oh, there is nothing in the bill to prevent that. We hear a great deal about the consumer. The consumer got the benefit of the low-price wheat. The wheat growers' loss was his gain, except what the miller, baker, manipulator, and jobber took in excess of a reasonable profit. If Congress is concerned about the consumer let it turn its attention to what is going on in this city. We do not hear a word about that. No complaint made as to profits made by others. The Steel Trust alone increased its profits from $47,000,000 in 1914 to $478,000,000, an increase of $431,000,000, 1,000 per cent. Has anybody suggested that we should interfere with the Steel Trust? Four packers increased their profits $121,000,000 over their prewar profits. Morris & Co. are reported to have made a profit of 263.7 per cent on its three million capital outstanding. Has anybody any concern about the price of meat? The millers increased their profits 175 per cent. No one suggests depriving them of their profits. To the contrary, we take them under the protecting wing of the Government; we bring them under this bill, and guarantee them against a loss.

The railroads were on the verge of bankruptcy; they were about to go into the hands of the receiver. The stocks had been watered to the limit. They were unable to borrow money. The Government took them over and guaranteed $175,000,000 to $200,000,000 compensation in excess of the amount estimated by the Interstate Commerce Commission, which nets the railroads from 10 per cent to more than 600 per cent. We are paying for some of the roads many times over each year. Rates were increased. A $900,000,000 burden was pinned on the producers and consumers by way of increased rates, notwithstanding that the Director General of Railroads reports a loss to the Government of $196,000,000. Only an hour ago we passed a bill carrying $750,000,000 in addition to the $500,000,000 previously appropriated on account of taking over the railroads. Yet no one has suggested a reduction in rates in the interest of the consumer. No; we are most generous with some people.

I believe that we should have just laws and we should have the honest administration of just laws. I do not believe that anybody can be contented with anything else—not legislation to meet the views of the demagogues, or those who have no respect for property rights or law and order, not legislation to deprive an individual or a corporation of a single dollar or interest honestly acquired, but legislation to meet the views of those who would proceed in an orderly way; legislation dealing with all questions in a broad and comprehensive manner, with a spirit of fairness and justice to all concerned; legislation that will bring progress, prosperity, and happiness to all of the people in all communities. Unfortunately this bill and the price fixing under the food-control act does not come under this rule. What unpardonable sin have the farmers committed? There are 6,000,000 of them, and there are 6,000,000 farm laborers who are tilling 6,000,000 farms. Have they not done their part in bringing this war to a triumphant conclusion?

Did they not clear the forest? Did they not develop the prairies and the wilderness into these productive fields, producing bread in sufficient quantity not only to feed our 110,000,000 people, but, as they have demonstrated recently, in sufficient quantity to feed the people of the world? Have they not also contributed to the building of roads and bridges? Have they not contributed to the building of the factories and the mills in the towns and villages, our farms and homes, our charitable institutions, and the construction of this vast system of public schools? In common with others, they have advanced step by step along the lines of accumulation of wealth and refinement, until to-day we boast of the fact that we rank amongst the most successful, practical, and intelligent people on earth. These achievements, the morality and industry of our people, are not the achievements of any one class or the people favored under this bill. To the contrary, they bear upon them the impress of the most enlightened views and policies of all the people, executed with the greatest prudence, firmness, and wisdom. They are the trophies of freedom and the grandest monument of our national glory. Though they are the results of the activities of all our people, nevertheless we should not lose sight of the fact that all wealth springs from the earth. The farm is the base of it all. So with business lagging on the farm, we have dull times in the cities and crumbling banks, factories, and mills. Hence, whenever the farmer and farm laborer are denied a living profit, necessarily they buy and produce less. As a result, labor in the factory and mills is out of employment. What a mistaken idea it is on the part of those contending for low prices on farm products to reduce the high cost of living and at the same time hope to maintain high wages. No; low prices on farm products do not always reflect the price to the consumer as long as the speculator and manipulator of prices has a free hand. The wheat grower gets less than $10 for the wheat necessary to make a barrel of flour. The consumer pays the baker more than $30 for the bread made from it. On the other hand, high wages result in high cost of production; hence high cost of production and high cost of living go hand in hand. Unfortunately one can not both eat the pudding and save it. In the Government price fixing the wheat grower was discriminated against by denying him the benefit of the law of supply and demand, possibly to the extent of $1,000,000,000. This bill provides for paying him the contract price. The millers were permitted to increase their operating profits 175 per cent. It is true that the price of the miller's bran was fixed, but he took his $24 bran and mixed it with water and sand and corncobs and peanut hulls and other substitutes, and sold it to the farmer for $52 a ton. And now it is proposed to guarantee the miller against loss, and compel Mr. Farmer to walk up and pay his share of that loss.

Mr. BAER. The gentleman left out sawdust.

Mr. HAUGEN. And sawdust and a number of other inferior substitutes. But, Mr. Chairman, I have used entirely too much time as it is. I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, problems connected with the Government's obligation under the guaranteed price for wheat are, I think, the most difficult that have ever confronted an agency of the Government. These problems are essentially economic problems. They affect the largest single industry in the country, and I refer in that statement to the farming industry, and they also affect the third largest manufacturing industry in the country, the milling industry. The operations of the grain trade and the flour trade in the United States and throughout the world are exceedingly technical. The machinery of that industry is exceedingly delicate, and interference on the part of the Government with the ordinary operations of that machinery results in phenomena which are both expensive and difficult to remedy. Fortunately these problems need not be solved in the legislation we are now considering. The pending bill is designed to provide the machinery for making good the Government guaranty of the price of wheat for 1918 and 1919. Before I discuss the details of the bill I want to make some general observations leading up to the necessity for this bill.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, would it interrupt the gentleman to propound an inquiry there?

Mr. ANDERSON. I want to say that of course I would like to make the speech I have prepared, but I recognize the fact that many gentlemen have questions in their minds to which they would like to have answers, and I am perfectly willing to lay aside entirely the speech that I have prepared and answer any question that may be propounded.

Mr. GORDON. The gentleman can answer it now or later, as he prefers. I would like a little explanation of the reasons why this crop to be planted this spring is to be included in this guaranty?

I have asked that question of the chairman and the ranking member of the committee, and their answers are not clear.

Mr. ANDERSON. I will get to that question specifically later on. Of course, at the time the guaranty was made nobody could predict the circumstances which now exist, but I will get to that in a moment.

The food-control act of August 10, 1917, contained a provision which guaranteed to the producers a price of not less than $2 per bushel for wheat of the 1918 crop at the principal primary markets. Subsequently, in February, 1918, the President, under a further authority of that act, by proclamation established the price guaranteed for the 1918 crop at certain primary markets designated in the proclamation on the basis of a price of $2.20 per bushel at Chicago. This price was subsequently increased to a basis of $2.26 at Chicago, in order that the increased freight rates should not wholly implement themselves against the price agreed to be paid to the farmer. The President by proclamation subsequently guaranteed the 1919 crop on the same basis.

The policy of guaranteeing a minimum price was adopted by Congress. The proclamations of the President were authorized by an act of Congress and in accordance with the policy which it laid down. These guaranties were each and all of them without condition except that the grain should be delivered before the times designated in the proclamations—in the case of the 1919 crop before June 1, 1920—at the markets designated in the proclamation.

The proclamation constitutes an obligation which is as definite and as certain and as obligatory on the United States as a United States bond. I do not think the question of whether this guaranty should be made good or not is open to argument, but if it is open to argument it is clear that it should be considered from the standpoint of the conditions existing at the time it was made and not from the standpoint of the conditions which exist now.

There was in 1917 an actual world's shortage of wheat. This shortage was equal to approximately 375,000,000 bushels, or about one-half of the normal world's exportable surplus. Part of this shortage was due to failure of crops, part of it to unavailability of certain crops owing to lack of shipping. Russia, which ordinarily has an export surplus of wheat and wheat flour amounting to 175,000,000 bushels had no surplus at all; the Argentine crop dropped from a normal of about 170,000,000 bushels to about 70,000,000 bushels; the Australian export crop, normally about 60,000,000 bushels, was wholly unavailable.

There were in this country on January 1, 1918, out of a total crop amounting to 638,000,000 bushels, 250,363,000 bushels. Out of this must come requirements as follows: Twenty-three million two hundred and seventy-three thousand bushels for seed; 250,760,000 bushels for domestic consumption on a normal basis; and 135,000,000 bushels on account of commitments to allied countries; making a total of 409,033,000 bushels. The shortage of wheat in this country, taking into account our obligations to the allies, represented a requirement for a net reduction in consumption throughout the entire year from July 1, 1917, to July 1, 1918, of 20 per cent. This voluntary reduction of 20 per cent grew to a compulsory reduction of approximately 50 per cent in February, 1918, for the balance of the year.

I mention this simply because I want, if I can, to have you understand the situation under which we made this guarantee for our own protection and for the protection of our allies and the supply of our Army and the armies of our allies across the water.

In the 60 days prior to the passage of the food-control act the price of wheat ranged from $2.24 to $3.45 per bushel, and it is said that a premium of $1 a bushel in excess of the higher price was offered on future contracts for delivery abroad. In the light of the shortages which I have endeavored briefly to present, it was to be expected that the price would reach a very much higher level before the end of the crop year, when the necessities of our own population and of the civilian populations of our allies and of the armies abroad could be fully exploited under unrestricted commercial conditions.

The Government, however, not only guaranteed the price of the 1918 crop on the basis of $2.20 per bushel at Chicago, but said to the American farmer, "You shall not receive for your 1917 crop a price in excess of $2.20 per bushel," and we proceeded to provide the machinery whereby that maximum price could be maintained. In doing so we took away from the wheat farmer the best market and the highest market he has ever had or is likely ever to have. We took away from the farmer the free market; we took away from him an advantage which we took away from nobody else. The farmer has not complained. I think I have never received a single letter objecting to the maximum price fixed by the Food Administration. The farmer never asked to be permitted to exploit the necessities of a world fighting for liberty and democracy, and he only asks now that the conditions which he himself has created at the solicitation of the Government and under its expressed guaranty should not be permitted to exploit him.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I will.

Mr. MORGAN. In view of what the gentleman said, is it not a fact that the price of wheat was fixed in 1917 really for the benefit of the consumers?

Mr. ANDERSON. Unquestionably; I am coming to that.

Mr. MORGAN. Because at the time the price was fixed that crop was already produced, and therefore you could not say that you stimulated production for the wheat of that year.

Mr. ANDERSON. Absolutely. In other words, as the gentleman suggests, the Government not only guaranteed the price for 1918 on the basis of $2.20 a bushel, but it said to the farmer, "You shall not get more than $2.20 a bushel for your 1917 crop which you have already raised."

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman answer me one question for information?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Was it a fact or not that the wheat-growing Representatives, acting for their constituents and as their constituents desired, all agreed to vote for this price-fixing bill?

Mr. ANDERSON. I think every Member of Congress voted for the food-control act that gave power to fix the minimum price.

Mr. HARDY. It has been stated here that a great deal of controversy has arisen as to the Government fixing this price. Was not that at the instance of the wheat men? I think we ought to have a full statement in reference to that matter.

Mr. ANDERSON. No.

Mr. HARDY. How many wheat men, either by voice on the floor of the House or by vote, opposed this bill—men from a wheat district?

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not think anybody voted against the bill.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. The food-control bill passed unanimously. The vote the first time was only five against——

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman remembers that other things were spoken of as being included, and when those other things were spoken of representatives of the other interests opposed including them in the minimum price-fixing measure; but was it or not practically upon the solicitation of the wheat men that the minimum price of wheat was guaranteed?

Mr. ANDERSON. No; the proposition originally came from the Agricultural Department and the Food Administration.

Mr. WELLING. If the gentleman will permit an interruption right there, at the time the price was fixed wheat was selling on the open market at something like 40 or 50 cents more than the guaranteed price.

Mr. ANDERSON. I have already said that.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I have only a few minutes, but I yield.

Mr. LAZARO. Is it not a fact that if Congress had not passed this law in reference to preventing hoarding and fixing the price of wheat that there would have been not only a shortage of bread among the armies of the allies and our own, but a shortage and suffering among the civil population, and a higher price for bread would have been necessary?

Mr. ANDERSON. Unquestionably so.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. ANDERSON. I can not yield further on this proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. ANDERSON. It is claimed that the spring wheat farmer is not entitled to the benefits of the guaranty, and that it would now be proper to so amend the terms of the guaranty as to make them applicable only to wheat already sown. I point out again that the terms of the guaranty were absolute; that the offer made in the guaranty was made alike to producers of spring wheat and winter wheat without distinction. We did not say to the spring-wheat farmer that the guaranty would be made good to him providing the war did not end before he had put in his crop; we did not say to the spring-wheat farmer that we would make good our guaranty to him providing the war did not end sooner than we expected it would. We made the guaranty, on the contrary, in contemplation of the very circumstances which now exist. We knew at the time we made it that if the farmer raised a large crop in response to our appeals for increased production and the war ended before that crop was marketed that the price would probably go down, and we made the guaranty in order to protect the farmer in his patriotic efforts to increase production against that very condition. It would be a travesty upon justice if, having made this guaranty in contemplation of the end of the war, we should now say to the spring-wheat farmer, "You are not entitled to the benefits of the guaranty because the war ended before we thought it would."

The full force of the Government's policy of fixing a maximum price did not become effective until September, 1917. As a result a large proportion of the winter wheat crop was marketed at a price above the maximum, and the spring-wheat farmer was the principal loser from that policy. Having taken away his market and reduced his price far below the price justified by the then existing world conditions, having squeezed him at one end of the transaction, it is difficult to see any justification in now undertaking to squeeze him at the other end.

The policy of the Government as a whole must be considered in determining this question. It will not do to say in contemplation of the entire contract that, having taken advantage of that contract as a whole when it was favorable to the Government, to our own consumers, and to our allies, we now propose to repudiate it when its terms seem unfavorable.

We have appropriated something more than $3,000,000,000 for the construction of ships, more than one billion of this amount has already been charged off, and I am told that eight hundred million more will have to be charged off in order that these ships may meet the competition of the ships of other countries. It has never been proposed that these amounts should be charged up either against the people who built the ships or the people who will operate the ships.

We are obligated upon contracts which require us to make good the losses between the construction and installation of buildings and facilities for the manufacture of war materials and the value of those buildings and equipment at the end of the war period, and we shall be obliged to make good those contracts. It has not been suggested that these contracts should be repudiated because the war ended before we anticipated that it would end, and our liability was therefore greater than we had hoped it would be.

If the repudiation of this contract as it applies to the spring-wheat farmer can be justified upon any ground at all—and I do not think it can—the political, social, and economic consequences incident to such a repudiation far outweigh and will outlast the purely temporary and monetary gains which would result from it. Again, entirely aside from the justice or equity of repudiating our contract with the spring-wheat farmer, the physical and mechanical difficulties of administering this act and of handling the wheat crop of 1919 on a basis of $2.26 a bushel for winter wheat and a lesser or different price for spring wheat are absolutely insurmountable. I venture the assertion that if such a policy is written into this bill no man with sufficient ability and judgment and knowledge of grain marketing to administer it can be found who will undertake to administer it under such conditions.

I turn now to the discussion of the details of the bill itself and the policy which underlies it.

The committee intentionally refrained from writing into the bill any specific method of dealing with the 1919 crop. The committee was constrained to adopt this policy because the indeterminate factors which will largely determine the possible methods of dealing with that crop can not now be determined with sufficient certainty to make it either reasonable or possible to write into the bill a specific method of dealing with the situation. These indeterminate factors are: First, the size of our own crop, which on the basis of the present winter-wheat acreage and the expected spring-wheat acreage may be anywhere from 800,000,000 to 1,275,000,000 bushels; nor is it possible now to anticipate the extent or availability of the crops of other exporting countries. We do not know whether the existing allied buying pool will be continued, or whether the Governments of England, France, and Italy will continue to buy on Government account as distinguished from commercial buying during the 1919 crop year. We do not know when and under what conditions the blockade against enemy ports will be lifted, or to what extent existing embargoes will be removed or modified. We do not know the amount of shipping that will be available for the transportation of our own export surplus and that of foreign countries, or the rates at which shipping can be secured. If these artificial conditions should be lifted and the normal processes of trade reestablished; if private finance, both here and abroad, should be sufficiently rehabilitated to permit the operations of the grain and flour trades; and if in addition our own exports and those of other exporting countries should not be larger than the world consumption could take care of, one method of dealing with the situation might be adopted; if, on the other hand, the artificial conditions continue, it may be necessary to adopt an either partially or wholly different plan of dealing with the situation.

I have heretofore discussed the plans which have been proposed, and I do not intend to go into them in detail now, but I should say that any plan adopted should accomplish the following results: First, it should insure both the winter-wheat and the spring-wheat farmer the guaranteed price upon every bushel of wheat offered by him in accordance with the terms of the guaranty; second, it should give to the American consumer the principal product of wheat in the form of flour or bread at a price substantially equivalent to its intrinsic value on the basis of the world's supply and demand; third, it should restore the grain and flour business to a normal basis of commercial trading before the 1st day of June, 1920. The first one of these propositions I have already discussed.

As to the second proposition, the American consumer, competing in his labor and production with foreign labor and foreign production, should receive under existing conditions of reconstruction the principal products of wheat in the form of flour and bread on a basis substantially approximating the price at which these products are consumed abroad.

The whole question involved in the administration of the legislation under consideration is an economic one. It is not primarily a question of saving the Government against a temporary financial loss, but a question of getting for the money expended the largest possible economic benefits. The most economic method of using up any surplus which we may have is to get the people of the world to eat it up. One dollar expended for wheat flour or wheat bread is equivalent in nutritive value to two or three dollars spent for any other foodstuff, and every dollar spent for wheat products therefore represents an economic gain.

I have in another speech shown that the consumption of wheat in this country runs from 3.5 bushels to as high as 7.5 bushels per annum per capita. The principal factors in dealing with consumption of wheat flour are: First, the existence of industrial conditions of employment and wages which permit the American consumer to buy; and second, the question of price. It is apparent, therefore, that if we create artificial conditions which prevent the free flow of these products in commerce, if industrial conditions of unemployment exist which make it impossible for people to buy, or if the price be higher than is justified by existing wage or inductrial conditions, there must be a reduction in domestic consumption which implements itself against the accomplishment of the purpose which we seek to accomplish, and that is the disposition to the best advantage of whatever surplus we may have.

What I have said with respect to the second result to be accomplished by any plan adopted applies with equal force to the third, namely, that such a plan should restore the grain and flour business to a normal basis of commercial trading before the 1st day of July, 1920.

A consideration of the results in their entirety of the policy of a fixed price upon wheat demonstrates what history has heretofore demonstrated in practically every Government, ancient and modern, namely, that the theory of governmental price fixing is an economic fallacy. In the case of wheat, the fixed price policy resulted immediately in the destruction of the historical relativity between prices of wheat and coarse grains. It demonstrates that when you once begin a policy of price fixing there is no stopping place; that when you destroy or interfere with the law of supply and demand as the principal factor in the natural and normal distribution of a product, that you must set up in its place a wholly artificial and arbitrary method of distribution, and that to maintain this arbitrary and artificial method of distribution you must guarantee the commercial operator against loss and prohibit him from making gains which the normal operations of trade under normal supply and demand would themselves regulate. It demonstrates that when by legislative action, by the setting up of artificial and arbitrary means of distribution, you violate the economic law of supply and demand, you eventually and inevitably are required to pay the penalty for that violation. It is economically desirable that this penalty should be liquidated within the limits of the term fixed by the guaranty.

In other words, if the 1919 crop is not on a basis in price substantially equivalent to the world's level on June 1, 1920, and if at that time there is in the hands of commercial operators considerable quantities of wheat or of wheat flour purchased on the basis of the guaranteed price, we must either continue the artificial means and methods which this bill provides for or we must take a further and perhaps greater loss upon the surplus still moving in the channels of trade on the basis of the guaranteed price. No one can afford to buy wheat on the basis of the guaranteed price and sell it on the basis of the lower price, either as wheat or as flour. Therefore, when the wheat crop of 1920 begins to come on the market the price of that crop must be artificially maintained on the basis of the present guaranteed price, or the wheat in the channels of trade of the 1919 crop must be on the same basis, or substantially the same basis, as the new crop, and the channels of normal trade must be opened in such a way that the ordinary commercial risks can be insured against in the ordinary commercial way.

To put the proposition in still another form, there is no halfway step in dealing with this question. We must either come absolutely to a world's basis or we must continue to maintain the artificial machinery and restraints necessary to continue upon an abnormal fixed-price basis. All of these considerations emphasize the necessity of reducing the present abnormal and artificial conditions to normal before the 1st of June, 1920.

It is by no means certain, however, that the turnout of our own crop and that of other wheat-exporting countries during the crop year 1919–20 will justify a price for consumption much below the price represented by the guaranteed price. This matter is one entirely of speculation, but it is just as possible that we will have an 800,000,000-bushel crop as that we will have a 1,250,000,000-bushel crop. Russia, which ordinarily exports 175,000,000 bushels in wheat and wheat flour, will probably export none at all. Bulgaria and Roumania and Austria-Hungary, which ordinarily have considerble export, will probably export but very little if any. The crop in France will, in all probability, be at least one-fourth smaller than normal. India has no export this year and may have none next year. If present industrial and political conditions in Argentina continue, the export of that country may be a more or less negligible quantity. Shipping conditions may or may not give us a considerable advantage over whatever export Australia may have. Indeed, a short world's crop of wheat is, on the basis of factors now known, altogether possible.

In my opinion, probably not to exceed one-half of the amount appropriated by this bill will be required. It is nevertheless essential that a sum amply sufficient to meet any condition should be provided in order that the necessary natural losses incident to the situation shall not be increased by reason of a lack of confidence on the part of either the farmer or the trade or an inability to finance the crop to the best advantage.

The committee confined the powers conferred upon the agency which the bill authorizes the President to create to the control of wheat and wheat flour. I believe the committee acted wisely in adopting this policy. It is admitted by everyone that a return to normal conditions at the earliest possible moment is desirable, and that the present artificial conditions should not under any circumstances be continued beyond the limitation fixed by the guaranty for the delivery of this year's crop. The exercise of powers similar to those granted as to wheat and wheat flour with reference to other grains and foodstuffs would simply mean the creation of new, artificial conditions with incident and consequent losses or profits to those dealing in those products and added difficulty in returning to normal conditions. We desire, rather, to accelerate the return to normal than to invite the creation of new artificial conditions which will of necessity retard the return to normal. The sooner we understand that our present difficulties are largely the result of interference with natural economic laws, and the sooner we remove the artificial conditions of control and restrictions which the war has made necessary, the sooner these difficulties will disappear.

In writing this bill the committee has followed the same policy which it followed in the original food-control act. That policy contemplates that if control is to be exercised over any product at all that that control must be complete and absolute at every point in the distribution of the product from the time it leaves the hands of the producer until it comes into the hands of the consumer. Failure to make the control absolute and complete at every point simply means that that point becomes the point of attack for the speculator and the profiteer. The result is a complete failure of your plan of control and distribution.

And this particular situation suggests another reason for the adoption of the policy of not extending the powers of this bill to other products than wheat and wheat flour. If the power were permitted to be exercised as against any other product, it would have to be exercised at every point. Besides this, the exercise of the power as to another product might require the exercise of the power as against a competing product. For instance, if my memory serves me correctly, we fixed the price of lard. Having fixed the price of lard we were obliged to fix the price of a competing product—cottonseed oil. This led us to fix the price upon cottonseed meal and the price of a variety of other articles and products connected with the food and feed products of cotton. Fortunately, no other cereal product competes or can compete directly with wheat and wheat flour. Singularly enough, the only product which in reality competes with wheat flour is potatoes, and potatoes must be very cheap indeed to reflect any reduction whatever in the consumption of wheat upon anything like a normal basis.

These considerations justify the confining of the terms of this legislation to wheat and wheat flour.

I want now to discuss very briefly the legal theory upon which the bill is based. The food-control act of August 10, 1917, rested upon the power of Congress "to declare war, to raise and support armies, to provide and maintain a navy, and to make all laws which should be necessary and proper to carry into execution the foregoing power." In order to make certain the support of our Army and the armies of the allies the Government of the United States has entered into an obligation with the producers of wheat to pay for wheat produced during the crop year 1919 a specific price under fixed conditions. That obligation was a valid obligation when it was incurred under the war power. The present bill seeks to carry out that obligation on the one hand, and on the other hand to protect the United States against an undue enhancement of its liability under it. The bill goes no further than is reasonably necessary to carry out those two purposes, both of which it seems to me the Congress has the power to carry out under the Constitution. It can not be that having incurred this obligation under the war power the Congress is now without authority either before or after the declaration of the termination of war to make good its obligation or to protect itself against the undue enhancement of that liability even though the exercise of these powers and the accomplishment of these purposes necessitates a regulation of the conduct of individuals, which might not otherwise be within the powers of Congress under normal peace conditions.

It has been frequently held that the powers of Congress touching conditions growing out of war do not cease either with the cessation of hostilities or with the formal proclamation of the signing of a peace treaty. On the contrary, it has been held that the power of Congress extends to the doing of those things incident to the performance of the obligations incurred under the war power and to the creation and regulation of conditions growing out of the war. For instance, in the case of Santiago v. Nogeras (214 U. S., 260), it was held that the military power continued after the end of the war with Spain until Congress had established a civil government in Cuba, and included the power to establish civil or military courts. It was held in the case of Rutledge v. Fogg (3 Calder (Tenn.), 554), that taxes assessed under military occupation might be collected after the close of the war. In the case of New Orleans v. The Steamship Co. (20 Wall., 387), it was held that a contract made during military occupancy might extend beyond the end of the war.

Mr. ANDERSON was given leave to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, while the committee is considering the carrying out of the guaranteed price to the wheat growers of the country I want to call the attention of the committee briefly to the cotton situation of the country. The cotton-growing States have not asked the Government to come to their rescue with money; they simply ask that the Government take its hands off the exportation of cotton to the allied and neutral countries and to let them buy cotton in the quantities that they want to buy cotton and not in dribblings, as some official of the Government shall say how much cotton they may have. I contend now that since the war is over and this Government and the allies permit grain and other foodstuffs to go to Germany that the cotton producers are entitled, at least, to permit Germany and Austria to buy 2,000,000 bales of cotton—and that is the amount that they want—and store that cotton in the United States until the allied countries say it can move. [Applause.]

Gentlemen, that seems fair to me. If the Congress is called upon now to make a guaranty to the wheat growers, with some of the wheat not yet planted, it does seem to me that Congress can take this embargo off of this great American product. To-day the foreign countries need and want 8,000,000 bales of American cotton. They have already consumed two and one-half million bales of this crop. Our own mills have already consumed 3,000,000 bales of this crop, and there are less than 6,000,000 bales in the United States, with a demand for 6,000,000 bales more than we have. Now, gentlemen, is it fair to hold this cotton back and to permit foreign spinners and foreign cotton merchants to form a conspiracy, such as I charge they have, and as cotton producers and factors all through the cotton belt charge that they have, to beat down the price of this cotton, 4,000,000 bales of which are still in the hands of the producers, and they hold it hard and fast because the price has been beaten down far below the cost of production? Is it right, I say, to permit an American institution to stand here, like the New York Cotton Exchange, to be used by foreign cotton spinners and merchants to hammer down the price of this produce held for a living profit in the hands of the American farmer?

Gentlemen, as I said here before, the sons of these men fought through this war and many of them fell on the fields of France, and I think that they are entitled to have this Government take its hands off of the cotton produced in the United States and permit it to go freely to these countries. [Applause.] I think they are entitled to ask this Congress, when it is voting money to keep up a guaranteed price on wheat, that it shall investigate the New York and the New Orleans cotton exchanges and see just what is going on in those exchanges.

Let me show you. Look at this stuff I hold in my hand, and which is being tendered on contracts, it is charged, on the New York Cotton Exchange. Look at these bolls I have in this bottle [exhibiting]. That is a boll before it is open. In that shape frost strikes it, kills the boll, kills the fiber, and now they dry those things out and run it through a thrashing machine and gin that stuff and tender the lint made out of it, it is said, on the New York Cotton Exchange. Now, gentlemen, is that fair to producer or spinner?

This is cotton [exhibiting]. It is good cotton—middling cotton. You can see the great difference between these grades. I ask you if it is fair to permit these people on the exchange to make a contract on the basis of middling and then when the contract matures, tender stuff like this in settlement? You refuse to take it and they settle the difference with you in money between the various grades they make. And you say the difference between the middling grade and that of strict low middling is $4 on the bale, and they will tell you, "Oh, no; it is 75 or it is 85 cents." They not only fail to tender you spinable cotton, but they will rob you in the money settlement of the contract. Are we going to permit that practice to continue?

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman means that they arbitrarily fix the differentials between the stuff like that and real cotton?

Mr. HEFLIN. The money difference in the value of the grades, yes. Thousands of contracts are bought and sold where delivery is never intended on the part of either party, and the buyer is at their mercy and there is no remedy for him at all. So they rob you going and coming. They do not fulfill contracts with real cotton on the exchange. I reassert on this floor that the New York Cotton Exchange has not delivered to spinners in 12 months 100,000 bales of actual cotton out of a crop of 11,300,000 bales, the last crop. What legitimate purpose does it serve? Are we going to permit that exchange to continue its existence when, through processes of pure gambling, it is beating down the price of the produce that the farmer is holding for a living profit?

The producer is not selling cotton. He is going to continue to hold it hard and fast. We are going to hold 4,000,000 bales of it. The bankers, merchants, and farmers of the cotton-growing States are united as never before, and they are holding about 4,000,000 bales of cotton. Why? Because they say they planted it and worked and advanced money on cotton on the basis of 30 cents and above a pound, and that it cost 25 cents a pound to produce the crop of 1918. It has cost more by far than any crop that they ever produced. If it had not been for that they would have sold it long ago, but they can not afford to sell it under 30 cents. It would bankrupt the South. While we are holding it hard and fast we ask the Government that we love to to take its hands off of cotton, and let Spain have all the cotton she wants, and let Japan have all the cotton she wants, and let France have all that she wants, and not hold it back and dribble it out while foreign spinners and speculators in a combination with some of our spinners both North and South are using the exchange to rob the farmer who is holding his cotton for a living profit. [Applause.]

Gentlemen, is it fair? Is it right? Is it just? Now, they are driving us to this. Let me say to my western friends, we have bought from you $800,000,000 worth of mules and horses. We buy from you millions and millions of dollars' worth of meat and wheat and corn every year. Now, we have got to plant spring wheat and come in under the guaranteed price, because we could not afford, if we could, to make a big crop of cotton this year. We are going to reduce our acreage; we are going to cut it down until we will not make more than 8,000,000 bales. The farmers know the cotton supply is short and will be for two or three years, and they figure that if they produce but 8,000,000 bales it will go to 60 cents this fall and maybe 75 cents, which will bring $2,400,000,000 and 12,000,000 bales at 30 cents will bring $1,800,000,000—$600,000,000 less than an 8,000,000-bale crop. That is the situation that is confronting us.

We are driven to diversified farming of every kind. We have got to produce the stuff that we are buying from you, the western farmers of our country. We are driven to this course because the gambling exchange, that has no stuff to deliver on a contract, with the use of the chalk mark and the money back of the wild speculator, writes down the price of cotton day after day.

Let me call this to your attention: Cotton in the spot market in the South is worth 27 and 28 cents a pound.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. HEFLIN. The spot market, about 28 cents. Get that. And the future price 23 cents. Did you ever hear of anything like that? A difference of $25 a bale. It is unnatural, inexcusable, and indefensible. It is a gambling transaction, pure and simple. Do you know what it ought to be? If the spot market is 27, the future market, if it is an honest market, would be 28¼. Why? Because you have got to count the freight rate on the cotton from the local market to the exchange. That makes the difference. This exchange reverses that situation, and it is a gambling transaction.

But the future exchanges tell us that we can not get along without them. They used to tell us that about the bar rooms, that business would be dull and the town would die if we did not have a bar room on every corner. We have driven them out, and every town in the South where we formerly had them is more prosperous than ever before. [Applause.] They tell us we have to have future grain and cotton exchanges. We will not have them if they are going to be used to rob the cotton producers of the South and the grain growers of the West.

We are asking, through the Caraway resolution, for the opportunity to investigate the cotton exchanges. Is not that a fair request, gentlemen? We want to find out exactly what is going on in these exchanges. Nobody should object to that. Let me show you, before I get through, a telegram that I want to read to you which I received from New York this morning. I will not read this firm's name, because I have not that permission, but I hope to use these gentlemen as witnesses later on. Listen:

NEW YORK, N. Y., February 20, 1919.

Have read extracts of your speech in the Journal of Commerce. Can give you details which will amaze you. Will gladly come to Washington on receipt of your telegram. Accept expressions of our appreciation for your helpful assistance.

Gentlemen, here is a telegram from the exchange seat. They say they can give details that will amaze me. If they can amaze me, with what I know about their transactions, then there must be "something rotten in Denmark." [Applause.] I make this appeal to you, that you give us an investigating committee to investigate these exchanges and take the embargo off of cotton and help the cotton farmer to receive the price that will give him a profit. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HUTCHINSON] 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Mr. Chairman, in the short time allotted to me I want to talk on the necessity of this legislation.

When the food-control bill of 1917 was under discussion and finally passed we were at war and our Nation faced a crisis that looked dark and serious.

One of the first things we were called upon to do was to increase production of food supplies, especially wheat, to take care of the requirements of our allies and ourselves.

In the year 1917 we produced 656,000,000 bushels; in 1918, stimulated by the guaranty price authorized by the food-control act, we produced 917,000,000 bushels. Of that crop we have used, in consumption, seed requirements, and exports in wheat and flour, over 600,000,000 bushels; and a few days ago, when Mr. Julius Barnes, president of the United States Grain Corporation, appeared before our committee at the hearing on this bill, he told us there remains about 300,000,000 bushels, which, after our own needs for the balance of the crop year are supplied, will leave a surplus, practically all of which has been contracted for, and that we will enter the new crop with very little, if any, carry over.

Should we have a crop no larger than last year, the appropriation carried in this bill will not be needed, while on the other hand, if the yield is as large as estimated, this bill will provide the machinery for handling the situation.

We are told there are nearly 50,000,000 acres of winter wheat planted and the soil prepared and ready for the planting of 25,000,000 acres of spring wheat, which, with favorable growing and harvesting conditions, will give us a total wheat crop of from one to one and a half billion bushels.

Of course, this is an estimated crop, but if the yield should actually be that great, by the passage of this bill we will be in a position to carry out our contract with the producer, provide the consumer with bread on the basis of the world wheat price, and at the same time protect the National Treasury.

On September 2, 1918, our President, under the authority of the food-control act, issued a proclamation guaranteeing to the producer for a period ending June 1, 1920, a fixed price on wheat of certain grades delivered to specific primary markets, and it is this obligation, thus created, that must be carried out to the last letter.

The provisions of this bill are confined to wheat and wheat flour, and authorizes the President or his agents to buy, sell, and deal in these commodities only, thereby releasing all other food products to be regulated by the law of supply and demand.

To those who may object to the President having authority to handle this proposition, I would like to insert right here a part of the speech I made on June 20, 1917, regarding the same provision in the food-control act:

There will undoubtedly be some objections to the unlimited authority given to our President by this bill, but such authority is to be used only when the situation is such that conditions make it necessary for him to act, and at such times he should have power to use every possible resource for the control and regulation of the food and fuel supplies of the country.

To those who make such objections I might add that the authority given to the President is more than overbalanced by the responsibility we are placing on his shoulders for carrying out the provisions of this bill.

This has been proven to be absolutely true. Also what I said regarding section 14 of that bill, the provision which makes this legislation necessary:

This section means the establishing of minimum prices, a practice to which I am strongly opposed, as I do not think any farmer or producer, after seriously considering the situation, will desire it, nor do I think we ought to empower the President to fix duties on importations if we could.

To offset any fear as to the outcome of this bill, it is interesting to note that, under the food-control act, there was organized a Grain Corporation, with Mr. Julius Barnes as president. We appropriated $150,000,000, and the Government subscribed for all the stock, and I am reliably informed that the Grain Corporation will return all of this appropriation, and after paying the expenses incident to the work they have performed, will have a handsome surplus to present to the Treasury, providing, of course, unforeseen losses do not occur between now and June 1, 1919, when that corporation will cease business.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to answer a question?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Yes; I will answer.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman stated that if this bill passed the producer would be protected, the miller would be protected, the Treasury would be protected, and that the consumer would obtain his wheat at the world's price. Will the gentleman please tell us a little more about that if it does not upset his argument?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. I would rather answer it after I get through.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. All right.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. If the crop this year is no larger than that of 1918, with the same kind of management it will not cost the Government anything to carry out their guaranty, and if we should have 400,000,000 or 500,000,000 bushels of wheat more than our requirements it may cost the billion dollars appropriated, or even more; but that will be a good investment, for had the war continued we would have saved this appropriation and spent several billion dollars for equipment and supplies, besides sacrificing the lives of thousands of our boys.

Mr. Chairman, I think from the fact that we are privileged to cancel this obligation with money rather than the lives of our brave citizens we have reason to thank our Heavenly Father.

Your committee has given much thought and serious consideration to this bill and have prepared it with three objects in view—first, our contract with the producer; second, an effort to give the consumer his bread on the basis of the world price; and, third, to protect the National Treasury so far as the situation will permit, and I feel that the measure should have the support of every Member of this House.

Now, I will be glad to answer the gentleman's question if he will state it again.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman stated again in his wind-up that the consumer would get his bread at the world's price. I am interested in that because I come from a consuming constituency, which is very much interested in this bill.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. I will say that if the crop is not over 800,000,000 or 1,000,000,000 the price will be maintained by the demand, but if there is more than that, and the crop should be 400,000,000 or 500,000,000 more, they will have to reduce the price. This bill gives the Grain Corporation or the agency the power to sell for any price it wants to to meet the world's price.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Suppose the price in Europe is $1.25 and the guaranteed price in Philadelphia is $2.39, how is the consumer in the United States going to get the world's price?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. The Grain Corporation or the agency will have the power to meet the exigency of $1.25.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. So the Treasury will pay the difference?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. The Treasury will pay the difference.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Treasury will stand the difference between the world's price and the guaranteed price in the United States?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Yes. If we had not some agency to control the situation, probably some one would come in and break the price, so that under this regulation the Treasury and the consumer and the producer are protected. They are all protected under this legislation. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, this is a liquidation bill. The Government found it necessary to contract in advance for the growing of a wheat crop. The same necessity required similar action in the United Kingdom and in France. Now, we face a situation where a loss to the Treasury may be sustained. How much will it be and how shall we meet it? Various plans have been suggested. Some have thought that the Government should guarantee certain prices for the production of certain coarse grain in order to reduce the quantity of wheat. The objection to that plan is that no one can forecast where it would lead us to. It might cost more to liquidate such a guaranty than to clean up upon the wheat contract. Besides, it would be interfering with another line of production. The Government, to my mind, made a mistake in interfering with the marketing of wheat, and we should avoid making a similar mistake.

Others, Mr. Chairman, think the wheat price can be maintained for export at the $2.26 level by giving the control of the exportation of fats to the Food Administration Grain Corporation as a club. Undoubtedly the price could be maintained that way, but the cure might be worse than the disease. If the Grain Corporation were to impose an embargo on meats, or even threaten one, it might create, and doubtless would create, a disturbance in the live-stock market which might be disastrous to the shippers of live stock, without any corresponding benefits to the consumers. Our exports of fats greatly exceed in volume the exports of wheat. No; it will not do to give the power to control wheat, butter, and cheese exports. It would be like jumping out of the frying pan into the fire.

Mr. Chairman, I believe we shall act wisely if we confine this legislation to the one purpose of liquidating the contract with the wheat farmers, making it as simple and interfering as little as possible with other lines of industry.

The bill is direct, simple in its terms, and to the point. Section 1 declares an emergency to exist, thus fortifying it against attack upon constitutional grounds. Section 2 empowers the President to create the agency or agencies for carrying the act into effect. Section 3 authorizes the President to buy wheat at not less than the guaranteed price and thereafter to buy and sell wheat and wheat flour at such other prices as he may deem necessary. This section also authorizes the securing of adequate storage, including granaries upon the farms, and also to take such steps and to make such arrangements as may be necessary to protect millers, wholesalers, and retailers who purchase in carload lots against loss by reason of abnormal changes in the market price. The Food Administration officials claim that it is necessary to assure a continuous and adequate flow of wheat and wheat flour in the channels of trade, particularly in the large commercial centers. Section 4 is the same wording as the section in the food-production act in respect to closing the exchanges as to future trading in wheat. Five is the licensing section, and is a necessary part of the machinery to handle the 1919 crop in accordance with the guaranty. Section 6 confers the power to prevent the importation of wheat during the emergency. Section 7 fixes penalties for the violation of the provisions of the act. Section 8 appropriates $1,000,000,000 to carry out the provisions of the act, and section 9 provides that an itemized statement of all receipts and disbursements must be filed with Congress. The bill confers all necessary powers to handle this year's wheat crop in a businesslike way, and without mixing it up with other commodities, however desirable that might appear to some.

Mr. John M. Anderson, president of the Equity Cooperative Exchange, a large and successful commission organization of St. Paul, owned by farmers, says, in a letter to me:

> Our dairy people will, of course, want that the wheat will be ground in this country, thus leaving them the by-products. Therefore we feel that the wheat should be handled in such a way as to give the farmers the price promised and at the same time enable American millers to grind the wheat and sell the by-products at home.

Some Members have suggested to me that the guaranty ought not apply to wheat from land not yet seeded. There are several reasons why that is not the correct view. I shall mention some of them:

1. There is already a large portion of the acreage which was plowed last fall and is now ready for the seed. The farmers had to pay very high wages for plowmen, as high as $5 and $6 per day, plus board and lodging, or a total cost of from $6 to $7 per day. Mr. Ford requires the consumer of his automobiles to pay his common labor $6 per day. Why should not the farmer have the same privilege in producing wheat, especially when he has been forced to pay such wages. This would mean higher prices for wheat, but is it not quite believable that wheat has always been too low in price?

1a. If a high standard of living is to be maintained throughout our country, the farmer is as much entitled to consideration as anyone else. Statistics show that the average upon the farms is not at all equal to that in the towns and cities. A home with all modern conveniences is a rare thing upon the farms, and in some of the States there are 62 farms out of 100 where there are no privies of any kind.

2. Many of the farmers in the West lost all the way from one to three wheat crops during the past three years.

3. The wheat guaranty should be looked upon as a three-year contract under which the Government forced the farmers to sell the wheat grown during 1917 and 1918 at prices much below the market value, and now, to even up, should see that they have a chance to even up. On a three-year average the farmers are losers.

4. The wheat guaranty was based on No. 1 hard spring wheat. Those very words were contained in the President's proclamation.

Some Members have asked me whether the interests of the consumers would be adversely affected by this legislation. I do not think so. Not a single consumer appeared before our committee during the hearings, and no one claimed to speak for them excepting some grain dealers, who made much of the rights of the consumers; but some of us thought their real purpose was to have us permit gambling in wheat. A difference of $1 per bushel in the price of wheat increases the cost to the consumer a little over 1 cent per day for each individual, which is a very small increase, considered against the advantages which come by reason of such increased cost. I am speaking now with particular reference to the laboring man. The increased cost of wheat just referred to spells prosperity for the wheat growers, and that prosperity in turn means prosperity for the whole country, and particularly the workers in the cities.

Mr. Chairman, to my mind many people are borrowing trouble as to how this year's crop of wheat is going to be disposed of. To begin with, the wheat bins in Europe are low, and in some portions there is hunger and famine. The stock of wheat in our own country at this time, we have been assured by Mr. Barnes, president of the Food Administration Grain Corporation, is considerably below the normal. He assures us that on June 1 we will begin the crop year of 1919 with considerably less than the usual carry over. And this, you will understand, is in spite of the fact that most of the year we were seeking to conserve the supply of wheat. Until the armistice was signed, it was the policy of the Grain Corporation to have as many substitutes for wheat used as possible and to conserve the supply of wheat in every way possible. In spite of this, the carry over on June 1, out of a bumper crop raised last year, will be below the normal. Mr. Barnes, who recently returned from a visit to European countries, in addition to the statistical knowledge open to the ordinary investigator, has had the benefit of personal observations made in the chief importing wheat countries of Europe. I believe a careful reading of his testimony will convince any fair-minded man that it is exceedingly unlikely that the amount of wheat which we shall export from the United States will exceed 200,000,000 bushels, and it may be that for that amount of wheat, or even for considerably more than that amount, there is likely to be an active demand in Europe. Indeed, a fair reading of Mr. Barnes's testimony convinces one that that is more than likely to be true. If so, there will be no loss in handling the crop; and if these forecasts made by Mr. Barnes are inaccurate, it seems unlikely that the loss which the Treasury will be called upon to stand will be more than, say, $250,000,000.

There is another feature which ought to be considered, and that is that if it is found that we have a surplus of wheat to carry over at the end of the 1919 crop year our farmers are likely to greatly reduce their wheat acreage in anticipation of the effect which such a surplus may have on the price of the 1920 crop. The farmers are intelligent and are paying more attention to these marketing problems than ever before. For that reason, even if there should be a surplus to carry over at the end of the 1919 crop year the Grain Corporation may be able to dispose of it without exporting it, by reason of needs in the United States during 1920 caused by a shorter wheat acreage. And may I say also that in addition to the economic reason which will appeal to the farmers under the circumstances indicated to reduce their wheat acreage they will doubtless have the added reason of advice in that direction from the Department of Agriculture. It will be the duty under this bill for the Secretary of Agriculture to cooperate with the agency handling the 1919 wheat crop; and under the circumstances suggested the Secretary of Agriculture will doubtless make a campaign against seeding to wheat in the fall of 1919 and the spring of 1920. It is much easier, as everyone knows, to bring about a reduced production than to bring about a surplus.

Mr. Chairman, this bill gives power to the President to resell wheat at a lower price than the guaranteed price, which right will be exercised in the improbable event that the world price is lower than the guaranteed price. I am glad this provision is in the bill, for the reason that at the end of the 1919 crop year we will know to what extent, if any, the farmers have received a bonus over the market price. I predict that the 1919 wheat crop will be resold either for the guaranteed price or at a price little below the guaranteed price, and the people of our country and our allies will be under obligation to the farmers for having sold their crops of 1917 and 1918 at very much below the prices which would have obtained had the Government not controlled the price.

To my mind there is every reason why the officials appointed by the President to carry out the purposes of this act shall take hold of the big proposition of handling the wheat crop of 1919 upon the theory that it will not only be bought at the guaranty price but also sold at the guaranty price; and I want to assure every man in this House who is interested in maintaining the present standards of living, of maintaining present scales of wages, that if the Government stands firmly in the position of maintaining wheat prices it will be a big influence toward stabilizing values of all products; and this will be particularly true as an influence in maintaining the wages of workingmen in all occupations. Reconstruction is a much abused word. We get letters and editorials calling upon Congress for reconstruction legislation, in most instances without stopping to indicate what the character of the legislation shall be or even naming the subjects of such legislation. To my mind, for the most part reconstruction legislation should be of a simple character, such as this bill before the House, which deals directly with the question of carrying out the Government's contract with the farmers in a businesslike way. If the bill is passed and is carried out in the spirit in which it is passed, it will help to make prosperous farmers and it will do more than anything else I know of to stabilize the wages of workingmen in the towns and cities and assure them of continuous employment. So I venture to say that, in addition to being a liquidation bill, this is also the most important reconstruction bill pending in Congress.

If you want to help knock the bottom out of business, if you want to cut the heart out of labor, the way to do it is to cut the guaranteed price for wheat in the middle.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] 15 minutes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask to be notified when I have occupied 12 minutes.

When the Government fixed the price of wheat we provided in the food law for the agencies through which that was to be done. The Government provided ample power not only to keep the price down, but to prevent it from going up, thereby protecting the consumer of bread and also protecting the grower of the grain from receiving a less price.

It is said, and said truly, that one of the motives for this legislation was the stimulation of wheat production, which was of vital necessity in winning the war. Now, the proposition is to make good the guaranty of the President for the 1919 wheat crop. The representatives of the administration went before the committee of Congress and asked substantially that the same power which was vested in the Food Administration and given to the Grain Corporation be continued during this coming year, not only to control the price of wheat but other food products, for the reason, as explained by Mr. Barnes, chairman of the United States Food Administration Grain Corporation, in his testimony, that the so-called world price is nonexistent. He repeated time and again—and gave the reasons for that statement—that there is no such thing to-day, and will not be in the next 12 months, as a world price as generally understood in commercial terms, because the buying of wheat has been concentrated in Government agencies abroad. They are so depleted in financial means that they can not buy without Government financing of operations. In other words, they have got to sell bonds either to this Government or to private individuals here in order to establish credit with which to pay for the grain. In addition to that, the Government controls the tonnage upon the seas, so that transportation of these articles from the United States to Europe can not be carried on without the cooperation of the Governments of Europe.

On the subject he said at the hearing:

"I must protest with all the energy I have against the recognition in legislation of the fallacy that under present conditions there can be demonstrated 'a world price.' Prior to the war, when the transportation channels of the world were open, when finance was ample to care for international exchange, when buyers and sellers were free to supply their demands, on the one hand, and to offer their products, on the other, without the restraint now present as to transport and finance, there was much to be said as to the soundness of a world price. With all markets open freely for trading the general tendency of price probably fairly reflected the legitimate influences of supply and demand. Minor fluctuations were made by investors and speculators in attempting to anticipate the factors that govern supply and demand, such as crop deterioration in some section of the world—and a crop is exposed to growing influences somewhere in the world every day in the year—or such factors as a better appreciation of the actual supply or the actual consumption in the world, or the influence on consumption which a higher or a lower price level had created; but to deliberately propose that we shall recognize a price made in Liverpool, under present conditions, is national folly. The large markets of the central empires are closed at present, and inability to pay may keep them closed to our surplus or largely restricted.

"The natural consumption of all peoples abroad is affected by tonnage restriction, which will not be entirely overcome for many months or years. That natural consumption is also affected by governmental policies, which again reflect their international finance needs. The desire of certain peoples for wheat products to eat may be curtailed and influenced by a governmental policy that can not provide at the source of supply the finance to make such purchase as the individual peoples may desire to make. Therefore, I repeat, that there is no world price level, in the sense of fairly and soundly reflecting the natural play between the laws of supply and demand.

"More than that, it is a power we can not contemplate delegating to any other government that a price level subject to the control of that interested buyer shall be the basis for the marketing of any of our product. For instance, the food needs of the three close allies, of United Kingdom, France, and Italy, for imports of wheat will run at not less than 10,000,000 tons, and perhaps as much as 12,000,000 tons annually. Of this quantity the colonies of the British Empire can not soundly be expected to furnish over half. Yet that half, being under their influence, can be so used as to establish the price level on which under any definitely committed policy we must furnish the other half, and I protest that America shall not place the power to name the value on its products in the hands of any concentrated buying agency, no matter how friendly. Whatever legislation is passed do not write in the statute any recognition of this method of making prices on our products."

For this reason prices that were formerly fixed by supply and demand as estimated by the merchants do no longer operate. I should have liked to have seen the recommendations of the administration in regard to this bill granted.

They are not granted in full for the reason explained here by the members of the committee, that they want to secure as far as possible to the consumer of bread in this country a similar price to that which would be given to consumers in foreign lands in case we had as large a crop as has been estimated. That is a very laudable object, but it seems to me that it is shortsighted, because this abnormal amount of two hundred or three hundred million bushels of exportable surplus they say we will get if we have a good yield is not to be expected again, and why? Because no farmer under the present prices of labor, machinery, and the expense of raising wheat can possibly raise wheat for less than $2 a bushel on the farm. That is the price he is getting now.

Gentlemen talk about $2.26 a bushel. The Department of Agriculture itself estimates the price of wheat at $2 on the farm. The farmer has to haul the grain to the station, which costs 10 cents a bushel, and he can not haul over 50 bushels to a load, and it takes one day to do it. So it costs $5 to haul 50 bushels of wheat to a load. Then he has to pay the local elevator charge for putting it in the cars, and when he sends it to the terminal market at Minneapolis or Duluth or Chicago there is 2 per cent charge in addition, and then the switching charges and inspection charges in addition. So that the 26 cents is more than consumed in the charges that are imposed upon the wheat from the time it leaves the farm until it gets to the terminal market, where the prices are fixed. It is therefore incontestable that the price to the farmers is $2 a bushel. Very well.

It can be demonstrated to a certainty that it can not under present conditions be produced for less. There are many risks in raising wheat. If you, by stimulating production, have secured two hundred or three hundred million bushels surplus this year, and you should bear down the price, by not taking care of the surplus, to $1.25, the result would be that the following year there would be an underproduction of wheat. It would not pay the farmers to raise more than six or seven hundred million bushels. They would put in the land that was most suitable for the production of wheat and leave the other lands fallow or put in other crops. So if you should by any manner of means secure $1.25 wheat for the next year you would possibly get a little cheaper bread, and I will show you how much in a minute. But the following year the price would go up to where it is now. These things balance themselves, and you would only be doing a shortsighted injustice to the farmer if you did not pay him a price equal to this guaranty.

But even if you do pay him the guaranteed price, and the Government loses a billion dollars, the farmers and all other people will have to contribute that much in taxes. Then where are you? You are a loser to that amount. The gentlemen who are so zealous in representing the consumer, as they call it, are basing their arguments upon false reasoning. They argue, for instance, that wheat was $1.25 a bushel before the war, and that a pound loaf sold for 5 cents. They conclude that if you can get back to $1.25 wheat, a loaf of bread will be sold again for 5 cents. They overlook the fact that the part of the cost of the loaf that goes to the farmer is a very small fraction of the retail charge, for the reason that the journey from the farm to the elevator, to the commission merchant, to the miller, the transportation by rail, which transportation charges have been increased about one-third, and the miller's expenses are all greater, and the wages are higher. Bakers' wages have gone up about 100 per cent, and everybody that handles the bread until it reaches the private consumer gets more and he will continue to get more than he did before the war.

Take, for instance, the price of bread in Washington. I have gone to several bakers and grocers that retail bread, and what do I find? The biggest baking company in Washington—and they all agree—says that out of a barrel of good flour you can make 300 pound-loaves of bread. That wholesaled to the dealers for 8 cents, and if it is a Vienna loaf it weighs 14 ounces and retails for 10 and 11 cents. If it is a 12-ounce loaf it retails for 8 cents. That is to-day. Now, if you collect 10 cents a pound for bread, retail price, a barrel of flour is worth $30 in bread. The fact is, that 17 per cent of the wheat is feed—and the consumer of bread does not pay for that—so there is only $1.66 of the part that goes into the flour from a bushel of wheat which the bread dealer pays that goes to the farmer. That means in a barrel of flour the farmer gets for his labor $7.50 and the bread is sold for $30. If you cut the price to $1 he will get $3.75 for what makes a barrel of flour. That would mean that if the farmer produced the wheat for nothing, if you took it from him without paying a cent, all the difference it would make to the retailer, the man who buys the bread, or even the man who buys the flour in small sacks and who pays for it 7½ or 8 cents a pound, would be only 2½ cents on a loaf. That is what you would save the consumer. If you make him sell it for $1 instead of $2, you would save 1 cent a loaf. The quarter of a cent would be absorbed by the dealer. That 1 cent goes to pay the farmer for his labor, seed, and expenses, and do you tell me that the laboring man, for instance, the railroad employee, whose wages have been increased from four to six and seven hundred dollars a year, because of the high cost of living, is not going to be willing to pay the other man, who is also a laborer and who does not work only eight hours a day, but from daylight till dark, the 1 cent extra on the loaf? What did he get the increase in wages for? Was it not because of the high cost of living? Let us examine the table.

Railroad wage increases.

	Before Government control.	After Government control.
Crossing flagmen	$60.66 per month	$138.92 per month.
Baggagemen	$72.80 per month	$140.44 per month.
Drawbridge deckhand	$91. per month	$188.28 per month.
Drawbridge watchman	$66.12 per month	$147.89 per month.
Drawbridge operator	$88.83 per month	$184.86 per month.
Freight house watchman	$80.16 per month	$171.08 per month.
Ticket clerk and telegraph operator.	$75.83 per month	$182 per month.
Ticket clerk	$72.80 per month	$122.11 per month.
Porters and janitors	$71.28 per month	$138.19 per month.
Office boy	$8 per week	$13.40 per week.
Station agent	$74.75 and $98.28 per month.	$182 to $200 per month
Car repairer, blacksmith	$5.22 per day	$9.52 per day.
Plain carmen	$4.02 per day	$8.12 per day.

Now that he has got the increase, will he refuse to pay for that extra cost of living? Is that logic? I believe the laborer will continue to receive the higher wages. I hope he will; but if he does the farmer must also have a corresponding compensation. I have heard gentlemen here on the floor representing great production districts—like the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCCULLOCH]—say they want the bread and flour at the world price, and then they will probably turn around and want protection upon everything they produce in their own districts. That is consistency for you. [Applause.]

They want the farmer to work in competition with the peon laborer of Argentina, or the cheap labor elsewhere, but they want high protection—high as the skies—for what they produce in Pennsylvania and Ohio. That is the logic of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman to grant me five minutes more.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield five minutes more.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. No; I will not yield; the gentleman can answer in his own time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The statement is entirely unwarranted. Nothing has been said to provoke such a discussion.

Mr. STEENERSON. There is the man who talks about representing the consumer. Take the speculator and the miller. They want to get control of the price of wheat and bleed the Government. That is what they want. Here is a letter from a miller that says:

> Moreover, there will be insured intense dissatisfaction upon the part of the consuming classes in this country because of their being compelled to pay a higher price for flour than the consumer in a foreign land.

The consuming classes! Who are they? I once read an absurd novel about a secret society to which everybody belonged; and here is a class of people who consume wheat. Well, who does not—from the baby in its mother's arms up to the old man, everybody consumes wheat. There is no such thing as a consuming class.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. And I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that there was not a consumer who appeared before the committee, and the only ones who assumed to speak for them were the grain dealers.

Mr. STEENERSON. That is true. The apostles who preached on behalf of the consuming public were the grain dealers. I am a consumer and so are you. The average consumption of flour is one barrel per capita. If you impose a tax of 1 cent on the loaf in the United States, you impose on the consumers, all of the people, $300,000,000; but if you give it to them for 1 cent less you save that $300,000,000, but you impose a tax of a billion dollars on the people; that is, $10 per capita. You are fond of levying taxes; therefore, you want to absolutely throw away $700,000,000 because of the fun of taxing the people and paying it back to the farmer. That is the kind of management that is back of this proposition. I say to you that the farmer is as much of a laborer as any man working in a factory. No factory laborer will go before the public and claim that the farmer is not a laborer, when he knows that the farmer works early and late, and that his wife gets up before daylight to cook the meals for the hands that raise the grain, plant it, and harvest it. There is no eight-hour day on the farm. Will it be said that these men who get double the wages they did before because they are going to pay a higher cost of living are now going to refuse to pay that cost because they say they want the world's price? But there is no such thing as the world's price. The result would be that you would turn it over to the grain speculators and the millers, and they would manipulate the surplus of wheat so that they would get it all in at $1.25 and then sell it for $2.50.

That is the secret of the whole movement. Whether you impose it on the consumer or take it out of them in taxes is about an even thing, only you tax more than you do through the form of charging a reasonable price for the wheat. I am in favor of a bill which would give the President of the United States ample authority. I believe that this bill properly managed would not increase the cost of living to the man who eats the bread, and that is a very small item. If you go down in the restaurant of this House, as in many restaurants down town, and buy meat, they give you the bread for nothing. The men who advocate this theory of helping the consumer by reducing this small fraction of price on the barrel of flour are as ridiculous as the man who advocates cutting down the price of iron ore, which sells at the mine for $3, to $2, because he wants to cheapen the price of sewing needles, or of reducing the price of lumber $10 a thousand because he wants to keep down the price of toothpicks. They give you the toothpicks in the restaurant for nothing.

The Food Administration has managed it so that the 1918 wheat crop will be sold at a profit. It has not cost the country one cent. The consumer has got his bread for less than he would without Government control. In 1917, when the food act was passed, flour was $20 per barrel, wheat over $3 per bushel. While the bill does not confer all the power I think it should, I believe it is quite probable that the Government can so manage under it as to come out whole. But whatever the result, I shall vote for the bill as the best that we can get. [Applause.]

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. YOUNG].

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I have a distinction that falls to but few men in this House. I am one of five Members who voted against the original food bill that calls for this legislation. We suspended the law of supply and demand. When we passed the food bill we threw everything out of joint, and nothing has been able to go to the market as in former times. We are still operating under that food law, and another crop is at hand. While I voted against the original law in which the price of wheat was fixed, or the power to fix that price was given, I am going to vote for this proposition that we have in this bill, because the faith of this Congress is pledged to make good to the men who grow the wheat upon the basis of the price as named by the President of the United States. I do not see how anyone can do otherwise than vote to make that guaranty good.

If this armistice had come prior to the proclamation of the President fixing the price of the 1919 wheat crop, we would not have been in the condition that we are now, but unfortunately for the country the armistice was not signed until the fall crop of wheat was being planted and the proclamation had been made by the President that the farmers could expect this $2.26 for their wheat. I want to get out of this thing just as soon as it is possible to get out of it, and we are going to have to sustain a loss—that is, if the acreage that has been planted in wheat and that will be planted to spring wheat yields what we may expect it to yield, the Treasury of this Nation may sustain a loss of at least $1,000,000,000 and possible $1,500,000,000, because we are protecting everybody who handles wheat.

Mr. EAGLE. Handles it or produces it?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. We are not carrying protection to the wheat farmer only, but we carry it back to the man who buys the wheat, who handles it in carload lots or who makes it into the bread, and no man can guess what it is going to cost the Government. But here is my viewpoint. We have got to make this guaranty good because we are pledged, not by my vote, but by the overwhelming vote of this House, and we are bound to make it good, but while the war is now over——

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman permit, but are we pledged to the miller, the baker, and the candlestick maker?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. That is part of the machinery. I will get to that later. That is part of the machinery of making this guaranty good. The war is now over. We want to get back to the normal as rapidly as it is possible to get back to it. While the war is over, the farmer has made good by giving his land, his labor, his time to producing this wheat to win the war.

Now, we have got 100,000,000 American people who must be fed, and whatever the loss may be to the Treasury I do not think that if this crop yields as it is indicated it will yield that we can afford as a Government to set up a piece of machinery here that will charge war prices for the bread that the people must consume. We can not afford to do it. We are all consumers, and we ought not to have to pay war prices for bread in time of peace. So whatever machinery is set up here by the Government it must buy this wheat, and the machinery that is set up here since the Government becomes a monopoly is to handle this wheat in such a way that they may pass it on down through the millman, the wholesale dealer, the jobber, and the retailer at such prices as would reach as near normal prices and world prices as it is possible to reach. We handled this wheat situation a little differently during the war from the other nations. It is not our problem alone. Every nation on earth to-day has its wheat problem. They all had their wheat problems during the war. In France and in England and in other countries they tried to make a cheap loaf of bread to their citizenship even while war was on. Even then they sold that loaf of bread at a cheaper rate than the people of America were able to buy a loaf of bread, yet they were paying the same kind of prices for wheat that we were paying in this country. How did they do it? They sustained the loss directly out of the treasuries of the respective nations.

Mr. BAER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. That is what we have got to do now. We have reached the peace basis, and to get cheap bread to the people in peace time our loss must of necessity be sustained out of the Treasury of the Nation. Now, of course, there is no use of crying over spilt milk. Gentlemen from the wheat States—and I represent a State that will probably grow 30,000,000 or 40,000,000 bushels of wheat this year, not an insignificant crop—have complained that when the price of wheat was fixed that it was a loss to the wheat farmers. I have never agreed to that point of view. It is true at the time we had the food bill under consideration wheat had been stilted to an abnormal price by reason of the fact that shipping had gone to the bad, and the allies through their different branches were in this market competing against each other for the only supply of wheat that was available by reason of the shortage of shipping, and wheat had gone abnormally high; but at the time we had under consideration that bill an organization was being created to act as a single buying agency, not only for ourselves but for the other nations with whom we were allied, and that would have become the only market. Where would have been the farmer under that condition? This agency could have named prices way below what we did in the food bill. That was the situation that confronted us.

Following on the trail of this price-fixing legislation there has grown up a sentiment in different sections of this country urging price fixing of agricultural products as a permanent policy. That is a false system of government, but here is what it leads to, my friends, if the Government should ever enter upon a permanent policy of price fixing: You would have the corn men here saying that you have given by process of law undue advantage to the wheat grower, and he would have his Representative vote for a higher price for the corn that he grows; and the oats grower likewise, the barley grower likewise, the cattle grower likewise, the sheep grower likewise, and the cotton grower likewise. My viewpoint is that fixing of prices on farm products or any other commodity is not and should not be a governmental function. The quicker we can get away from this policy, which has been adopted as a war measure, the better for the Government and the better for individual initiative. [Applause.]

Mr. BAER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I will yield, but I want to say that the gentleman brings from his section very largely the point of view that I inveigh against.

Mr. BAER. The point is that the manufacturer now is charging $4 for a suit of overalls or $5 for a suit of clothes and the southern farmer only gets 42½ cents for his cotton. Now, I think something should be done in those cases to regulate those things.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I do not know what the manufacturer is getting for his overalls, but the gentleman is badly off as to what the cotton farmer is getting for his cotton; instead of getting 42 cents, he is getting about 20 cents.

Mr. BAER. I meant for the amount of cotton that goes into the overalls.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I grant you that is one of the outgrowths of the war powers that we have given. Here I will tell the gentleman what was done in that instance.

The manufacturer slipped in before this War Industries Board, without consultation with the cotton producer or anybody else, upon the theory that he wanted to stabilize the prices of his manufactured product, and he put one over on the War Industries Board, and they got their prices fixed, and when they fixed those prices nobody knew it. It was behind closed doors. And when they fixed those prices the first thing they had to take into consideration was, "What are you going to get for raw cotton?" They made the prices the public had to pay for manufactured cotton goods based on 36½ cents per pound for raw cotton. That is what they did. And they sold you overalls on that basis. But the cotton farmer did not get the 36½ cents per pound for his cotton. But it is one of the acts of the War Industries Board. And that is a point I am inveighing against, that as long as you break into the principles of government and violate those principles and violate all economic laws, you will have that situation.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. BLACK. On the question of stabilizing of prices, I wanted to interrupt to say that I know my colleague will agree that these stabilization orders are no longer in effect. And the reason I state that is because some of the farmers in my own district seem to think that the manufacturers still have some sort of a guarantee to get these high prices for their products, while they are forced to sell on the open market. That is really not true now. The War Industries Board has gone out of existence, and all the manufacturers have to sell their products in the open market. I think that is a fair statement of the condition, and I think the gentleman intends to be fair.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. That is true.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I will.

Mr. STEVENSON. How is the public going to be protected from buying its flour on the basis of $2.26 wheat if you are going to keep the wheat up, and if you do that is not the public paying a tax to keep it up and paying a tax on the flour?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. It was the opinion of the committee that we wanted the people to get that flour at peace prices, so far as possible for them to get it, but with the machinery in operation during this period the Government must pay the farmer $2.26 for his wheat. And following the world conditions and the world's markets, the agency that is to be set up under this bill ought to be men of sufficient judgment to know about what a fair price would be, and they, through the licensing system, will see that that fair price obtains to the consuming public. That is the only way I know of how to handle it. If the farmer dumps all of his wheat on the Government, what man is there that is interested in keeping up a fair price for wheat? Nobody. On the contrary, everybody would be interested in wheat selling at 50 cents a bushel. Unless you have some machinery that stands between the consumer—and the farmer will be one—and the speculator then the Government will lose more than anybody can tell. But it is hoped this machinery will be composed of men of sufficient judgment to handle the situation, make good the guarantee, and give us bread at fair prices, and let the Treasury sustain whatever loss it must sustain. [Applause.]

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, may I ask how the time now stands?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina has consumed 1 hour and 18 minutes, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] 1 hour and 25 minutes.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL].

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, in defining and announcing the 14 points which should be considered by the coming peace congress the President set out point No. 3, as follows:

> The removal so far as possible of all economic barriers and the establishment of an equality of trade conditions among all nations consenting to the peace and associating themselves for its maintenance.

The subject matter of this proposal is of the broadest and most far-reaching nature, and upon the solution of the extremely vital problems it presents measurably depend the permanent peace and friendship of nations. Instead of vainly striving to prevent wars after the causes have once arisen, this proposal has for its purpose the prevention of many causes of war. Since its announcement by the President some misconception as to the exact scope and meaning of this point No. 3 has arisen, and a few politicians have pretended and falsely intimated that the policy proposed would or might affect the right of a nation to determine its own economic policy as it relates to customhouse taxation. On October 28, 1918, the President made clear the meaning of point No. 3 in this respect, as follows:

> I, of course, meant to suggest no restriction upon the free determination by any nation of its own economic policy, but only that whatever tariff any nation might deem necessary for its own economic service, be that tariff high or low, it should apply equally to all foreign nations; in other words, that there should be no discriminations against some nations that did not apply to others. This leaves every nation free to determine for itself its own internal policies, and limits only its right to compound those policies of hostile discriminations between one nation and another. Weapons of economic discipline and punishment should be left to the joint action of all nations for the purpose of punishing those who will not submit to a general program of justice and equality.
> The experience of the past among nations has taught us that the attempt by one nation to punish another by exclusive and discriminatory trade agreements has been a prolific breeder of that kind of antagonism which oftentimes results in war, and that if a permanent peace is to be established among nations every obstacle that has stood in the way of international friendship should be cast aside. It was with that fundamental purpose in mind that I announced this principle in my address of January 8. To pervert this great principle for partisan purposes and to inject the bogey free trade, which is not involved at all, is to attempt to divert the mind of the nation from the broad and humane principle of a durable peace by introducing an internal question of quite another kind. American business has in the past been unaffected by a policy of the kind suggested, and it has nothing to fear now from a policy of simple international justice. It is, indeed, lamentable that the momentous issues of this solemn hour should be seized upon in an effort to bend them to partisan service. To the initiated and discerning the motive is transpartent and the attempt fails.

Mr. Chairman, this statement of the President only undertook to define the application of point No. 3 to provisions for discriminations and retaliation which are often found in the tariffs of different countries, and it did not enumerate and deal with many other trade methods, practices, and policies coming within the reasonable definition of "economic barriers" and "equality of trade conditions among all nations." I shall later undertake to enumerate them. I hope at this point I may be pardoned if I make brief reference to certain proposals I once offered in relation to this entire subject.

In February, 1916, after making some investigation of the various acts, methods, and policies practiced by many nations in their pursuit of international trade and commercial power, I was convinced that many of them were illegitimate, unfair, and unequal in their effects on other nations, with the result that much friction, ill feeling, and bitter economic strife often arose. I thereupon prepared a House joint resolution at the time stated, requesting that at the close of the war an international trade conference be held in the city of Washington, in which all commercial nations should be represented, for the purpose of establishing a permanent international trade-agreement congress, the function of which should comprise the consideration of all international trade methods, practices, and policies of an unfair, unequal, and objectionable nature, and to formulate agreements eliminating and avoiding such methods and policies in the future. After some conference, I deferred the introduction of this resolution until April, 1917, when I offered it in modified form. I append the original draft and an official letter defining its scope and meaning as exhibits to my remarks.

The proposal I offered, as does that contained in point No. 3 suggested by the President, as I would construe the latter, would require all commercial nations by mutual consent to abandon, as far as can be agreed upon, such acts, methods, and policies as I have just referred to. It would inevitably follow that their abandonment would both avoid the unjust injuries inflicted and promote fair and friendly trade relations among nations. This proposal does not mean the internationalizing of trade and finance in the slightest objectionable sense, but would only require nations to refrain from the acts and conduct stated in their efforts to develop or maintain their foreign commercial interests or to extend their economic power abroad. Any nation could prescribe a high or low or no tariff without the least interference except as to any provisions of discrimination and retaliation which such tariff might embrace.

Mr. Chairman, every business man and every intelligent citizen, though not a business man, knows that in addition to our material development at home we must now contemplate the important and permanent development of our international trade and finance. The United States must move forward or backward financially, commercially, and industrially; it can not stand still and stagnate, like China or other backward nations. Our chief expansion must be beyond the seas. We must give employment to labor and capital by developing our great resources. We must ship and sell abroad our surplus wheat and other cereals, cotton, minerals, iron and steel products, textile manufactures, lumber, and finished products generally. We have to-day an international commerce of more than $9,000,000,000, a substantial portion of which is temporary war commerce. In maintaining a goodly portion of our present great volume of foreign business after the war we must have shipping, harbor, banking, and other business relations with the citizens of almost all nations. Since the old sailing vessel was superseded by the fast ocean steamer, and letter mail by the ocean cable and the wireless, all commercial nations have been brought close together. European countries in this sense are now relatively nearer the United States than was Massachusetts to Georgia during the early years of the Republic. Our international financial and commercial fabric is common to all nations and, in a large sense, brings them close together and into a state of interdependence.

The United States emerges from the present world war in a stronger position than any other country. It possesses a relatively larger amount of capital, raw materials, skilled labor, and productive facilities than any other nation. It is now a creditor nation to the extent of more than $10,000,000,000 and has a favorable trade balance of $3,000,000,000 per annum. There is to-day a world demand for almost every surplus product we have or can produce. In my judgment, only the existing high prices and high cost basis and the inability of foreign countries to buy from us delays for a very brief time the leap forward which this country will take both at home and abroad in its material development and prosperity. Only the deepest lethargy and the utmost backwardness and lack of enterprise will prevent a colossal advance in the not distant future. Our international trade facilities are now supplemented by a great merchant marine, foreign branch banks, and the privilege of concert of action by our business men in reaching and supplying foreign markets under the provisions of the Webb law. As we emerge from the halting conditions of reconstruction we should gradually see American merchant vessels loaded with American goods on every sea and American commercial travelers penetrating all business territory in South America, the Pacific islands, the Far East, and many portions of the countries of Europe.

Mr. Chairman, 18 years ago, on September 5, 1901, President McKinley, in his famous speech at Buffalo, among other things, said:

> Our capacity to produce has developed so enormously and our products have so multiplied that the problem of more markets requires our urgent and immediate attention. * * * We must not repose in fancied security that we can forever sell everything and buy little or nothing. * * * The period of exclusiveness is past. The expansion of our trade and commerce is the pressing problem. Commercial wars are unprofitable. A policy of good will and friendly trade relations will prevent reprisals.

President McKinley emphasized the vital importance of fair and friendly competition in international trade. He doubtless had in mind the many lessons of the past that unfair, discriminatory, and objectionable methods adopted by a country to extend its foreign commercial power almost inevitably resulted in international quarrels, the arousing of the war spirit, increased armaments, militarism, and, ultimately, war. He also asserted the known truth that no important commercial nation can now maintain a situation of isolation or exclusiveness. Having been projected into the field of international trade and finance, the policy of justice and fairness should uniformly characterize the conduct of this Nation and its citizens in their foreign commercial relations, and a like standard should at this juncture be demanded of other countries.

If a real economic peace can now be effected it will afford the greatest possible assurance of permanent world peace. The accomplishment of this is most desirable and would in no wise conflict with any suitable plan for a league of nations that may be devised, but, on the contrary, would supplement, strengthen, and make easier its operation, in that there would be far fewer commercial and trade controversies for settlement.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to take the time to enumerate a long list of wars at least one of the principal underlying causes of which was due to trade wars, economic strife, jealousy, and strenuous contests for commercial advantage, such as I am undertaking to define and discuss. The President's point No. 3 should not only deal with the ordinary acute commercial controversy, such as has occurred in past years between Austria and Italy, Germany and Russia, Serbia and Austria, America and Germany, Sweden and Norway, but wherever the controlling purpose is to secure economic gain and commercial ascendancy by unjustifiable methods, point No. 3 should also deal with the struggles for colonies, protectorates, and concessions in undeveloped countries, including intense rivalries between business men, financiers, and traders, which activities have brought dangerous clashes between different nations within our time, as in the cases of Egypt, Morocco, Tripoli, the Transvaal, Persia, Mexico, China, and the Balkans. I wish to emphasize the fact that the conduct of powerful commercial nations in grabbing colonies and concessions and in assuming protectorates, usually by force, threats, bribery, or other unfair means, is almost invariably prompted by motives of trade conquest and commercial gain, and when so prompted should fall for treatment under point No. 3.

Innumerable instances might be cited in which commercial nations in the past have striven to reach the goal of commercial supremacy, either by fair means or foul. Commercial power means political power, and, as a rule, military power as well. Commercial control over one nation by another means political control.

Since the wars of earlier periods, when racial or tribal antagonisms, religious controversies, and personal rivalries or ambitions among kings and other autocratic rulers constituted their chief origin and underlying causes, it is a historic fact that most wars of recent generations owe their origin in at least substantial measure to the irritation, bitterness, jealousy, and strife arising from economic controversies. Dr. F. W. Taussig expresses the true condition when he recently said:

> It is strange that trade between nations should play so large a part in fomenting war and warlike spirit.

It is undoubtedly true that trade relations will bring nations closer together or drive them further apart than any other, accordingly as those trade relations are fair or unfair.

Mr. Chairman, the history of international commerce and finance presents many classes and innumerable varieties of illegitimate, unfair, unequal, and hurtful acts, methods, and policies which are wholly unjustifiable from the standpoint of right and fair dealing. We have seen practiced with impunity all forms of tariff discrimination and retaliation, preferential right of entry of ports, violations of the "open door," discriminating embargoes or restrictions, seizure of patents, copyrights, trade-marks, trade brands, wrongful interference with trade routes, unfair utilization of bounties, bonuses, subsidies, drawbacks, and rebates, the economic and financial violation of the territory of small, uncivilized, or backward nations, tonnage and shipping discriminations, economic alliances, trade concessions, and other preferences by special agreements.

Shall all these and numerous other vicious, unjust, and war-breeding methods and practices again be revived and made a part of our future international financial and commercial activities, or shall the nations by mutual agreement establish a fair and just international commercial and financial code which will insure, as nearly as may be possible, fair dealing? It is true that prior to the outbreak of the war the world presented a network of commercial treaties, but unfortunately those treaties did no contain either the terms or the foundations for a general commercial policy calculated to appeal to the fairmindedness and intelligence of all nations. Their scope was narrow and their objects fell far short of the real necessities. These treaties themselves contained in many instances features of rank discrimination and retaliation and were in no broad sense designed as a code of commercial ethics. Most of these commercial treaties only embraced the following subjects: (a) Most favored nation clause; (b) Liberty to trade and travel; (c) Passports; (d) Nationality of vessels; (e) Tonnage dues; (f) No shipping discriminations; (g) Port regulations; (h) Coastwise trade; (i) Deserters from ships; (j) Shipwrecks; (k) Blockade, embargo, contraband, and other war measures; (l) Patents, trade-marks, copyrights, and designs; (m) Consular officers. The few special treaties in addition to these afforded no improvement to the general situation I have described. The result has been that no redress for any injuries or complaints arising from the various acts and methods already referred to could be had except by arbitration mutually agreed to now and then, or by an appeal to the slow, uncertain, and wholly unsatisfactory agencies which diplomacy has offered.

The war, however, has broken the mass of commercial treaties formerly existing between the belligerent countries, and besides several nations are now proposing to abrogate these treaties existing with allied or neutral countries, with a view to the establishment of national trade policies calculated to promote greater material development. This is undoubtedly a stage at which every commercial nation might well begin with a clean slate.

Nearly a year ago the French Government gave notice that it would abrogate all conventional arrangements with other countries relating to economic relations. The British Chancellor of the Exchequer also announced that his Government would abandon all commercial treaties providing for the most favored nation treatment. There will naturally be a readjustment of tariffs everywhere, in the light of after-war conditions. This general rearrangement of tariffs will offer a strong incentive to the renewal of tariff-wars. Every nation will be disposed to adopt all the accustomed devices and methods calculated to give each some commercial advantage through preference or other means not justifiable except upon the theory that other countries are doing likewise. Many nations have already prepared to protect themselves against undue discrimination either by means of punitive surtaxes or retaliation in kind or prohibition of commercial intercourse. It is of paramount importance, therefore, from every viewpoint, that the present peace congress should incorporate, or cause to be prescribed, certain prohibitions by which both individuals and nations shall be governed in their international financial and commercial activities, thereby eliminating as many of the unfair, hurtful, and trouble-making practices and methods to which the world has been accustomed as it may be possible to agree upon. President Wilson, in a speech on September 27, 1918, said:

Fourth, and more specifically, there can be no special selfish economic combinations within the league and no employment of any form of boycott or exclusion except as the power of economic penalty by exclusion from the markets of the world may be vested in the league of nations itself as a means of discipline and control.

Mr. Chairman, I desire briefly to refer in some detail to the classes of trade practices and conduct which, in my judgment, should be abandoned or curbed to the maximum extent. Let us first glance at the discriminations and retaliations to be found in the operation of tariffs. Such provisions are not only designed to stimulate the trade of the country adopting them, but oftentimes are intended to restrain unfairly the trade of another country. There are too many methods and phases of tariff discrimination to enumerate. Hon. W. S. Culbertson, who is an authority on international tariff relations, divides these discriminations into two classes and describes them as follows:

In the first place, there are those which may be removed by nations bargaining among themselves. These discriminations appear in a variety of forms. Often they are found openly in surtaxes. Sometimes they are concealed in tariff classifications where, under the guise of equality of treatment, tariff rates are made high on goods which are peculiarly the products of a disliked country and low on the goods which are the peculiar products of a friendly people. Sometimes they may exist in the administration of the customs regulations or in the enforcement of inspection and sanitary laws. Not infrequently they are found in tariff systems of nations which have adopted discriminatory tariff rates for the very purpose of providing a basis for bargaining with other nations for concessions. Such are the general and the maximum tariff schedules of certain European countries.

The second class of tariff discriminations includes those which can not be removed by nations bargaining among themselves, such as preferential tariffs or national reciprocity systems, which are expressions of the settled policies of peoples toward their colonies or toward other nations.

Some tariffs contain penalties to enforce equality of treatment by other nations, while other tariffs contain concession provisions. Section 2 of our tariff act of 1909 illustrates the penalty method. The German tariff presents the concession method and consists of a general and "conventional" tariff, the former fixed by the legislative and the latter by the executive department. The lower rates are extended to those entitled to most-favored-nation treatment. The French tariff contains maximum and minimum provisions, with the purpose that the minimum rates are used in securing concessions. What is known as colonial preference exists between England and her colonies. This, of course, operates as a substantial discrimination against other nations. Preferential relations to a certain extent exist between the United States and Cuba and also with Brazil. Other nations would term these arrangements discriminations against them. Most tariff laws contain provisions either intended to prevent discriminations or to secure concessions. Section 3 of the tariff act of 1890 authorized the President to proclaim certain penalty duties in prescribed cases. The tariff act of 1897 provided for three kinds of reciprocal arrangements. England, while receiving preference from her colonies, has granted none in return, mainly on account of the nature of her tariff. A number of official announcements have been made recently, however, to the effect that preference should hereafter be accorded to the products and manufactures of the British overseas dominions in respect to any customs duties imposed on imports into the United Kingdom. The United States has free trade with the Philippines, but other countries exporting to the Philippines pay tariff duties.

Tariffs, it is seen, have been so constructed as not only to deal with all phases of the import situation but with export conditions as well. Exports may thereby be encouraged either through reciprocal tariff concessions or by threats of retaliation to prevent discriminations. Most countries have practiced both methods. Some concrete illustrations of tariff discriminations against the United States in the past are shown by the action of Germany just prior to 1910 in withholding from this country certain tariff concessions given to various other countries of Europe in return for equivalent concessions made by them. Germany excluded American pork for a time under arbitrary regulations of her customs administration, the requirement of which was that American pork should be subjected to a microscopic inspection. Austria also pursued this viciously discriminating practice, while pork from other nations was admitted into Austria and Germany upon the certificate of the government inspector in the exporting country. France for some time gave tariff concessions to other nations for certain manufactured products which were denied the United States, such as agricultural and other implements, tools, and machinery. Italy, through customs regulations, prevented the admission of American pharmaceutical and medicinal preparations during a considerable period, while not so discriminating against like articles from other countries. Belgium at one time practiced a tariff discrimination against the crude and lubricating mineral oils of the United States.

Canada has really had three tariff schedules—general, intermediate, and British preferential. The British preferential rates are extended only to the United Kingdom, New Zealand, and South Africa, as I recall. For a number of years France and Canada had a special commercial agreement under which France secured the minimum rates, and in addition a small list of special rates applying to peculiarly French products. Under the operation of the most-favored-nation clause other countries secured these minimum rates, but in several important respects they were withheld from the United States. The negotiations between the United States and Canada on this subject in 1910 grew highly interesting. A satisfactory adjustment was effected, however, on the last day of the time prescribed for dealing with the matter under the maximum and minimum provisions in our tariff law, although Canada did not yield on every point. Hon. W. S. Fielding, the minister of finance in Canada, in a communication to the President touching the seriousness of the situation, among other things, said:

A tariff conflict between the two countries would undoubtedly be a matter of the gravest concern for both, involving widespread disturbances of trade, heavy loss to citizens of both countries, and the creation of much friction at a time when the cultivation of happier relations is most desirable.

The general situation for a time was that not only England but other countries competing with the United States were shipping products similar to ours into Canada at tariff rates substantially below those imposed on like products from the United States.

Mr. Chairman, the principal commercial nations of Europe have applied the most-favored-nation doctrine to their commerce and navigation. This provision as practiced in Europe requires each nation to accord to the other as the party of the second part treatment which is or shall be accorded in a like matter to that nation most favored by it in another treaty. The United States has thus far declined to adopt this doctrine in its unconditional form, and therefore does not extend such treatment where it has been given for a special consideration not given by the nation asking for it. Germany at one time threatened retaliation on England and retaliated on Canada because under Germany's treaty terms with England, embracing the most-favored-nation treatment, Canada declined to extend to her the so-called colonial preference advantages given to the mother country. Germany later yielded through fear of French trade advantages. At the conclusion of the Franco-Prussian War in 1870 Germany forcibly wrote into the treaty of peace the most-favored-nation doctrine in its unconditional form, and France was unable to abrogate this treaty until 1914, when its termination was effected by the declaration of war.

It is generally agreed that the adoption of the most-favored-nation clause in its entirety by all commercial nations would remove virtually all kinds of discrimination in international trade. One of the most vital questions, therefore, which the trading nations of the world have confronting them at this stage is that of determining whether this most-favored-nation doctrine shall be made universally applicable to as full an extent as they may decide to be practicable in the future. My investigations thus far lead to the conclusion that the comparatively small advantages gained here and there by the different nations from its nonobservance would be much more than overcome by the numerous benefits and blessings, both commercial and political, which its general operation would secure. A closer observance of this principle rather than a disposition to depart from it in the future is decidedly the wiser course.

The policy or doctrine of "colonial preference" in this respect becomes one most difficult of satisfactory settlement. This doctrine permits a mother country to give preference to colonial products in her markets, and vice versa. The practice is exemplified in the case of Great Britain and such colonies as Canada, New Zealand, and South Africa, and Germany, France, Italy, and Belgium and their respective colonies. Most of the colonial possessions of the various important nations are measurably undeveloped and contain large amounts of raw materials. Some authorities contend that the mother countries can not justly and fairly insist on the privilege of virtually monopolizing the trade and raw materials of such an immense portion of the earth as their colonies at present comprise. Holland, for instance, has refused any preference in her colonies for her home products. The contention just stated is specially urged with respect to autonomous or self-governing colonies. The question, however, as to whether the policy of the "open door" should be applied to dependent colonies, subject to such nondiscriminating tariffs as their revenue situation might suggest, or whether preferential tariff relations with the mother country should be generally retained, would still be a problem. Canada and Australia, for instance, have seemed inclined virtually to take their place among the nations to the extent of fixing their economic policies. According to the London Spectator, colonial preferential tariffs "have nearly always been arrived at not by lowering the colonial duties on British imports, but by raising the duties on foreign imports. In other words, the Dominions have hitherto followed the policy of domestic protection even against the mother country and against one another, while increasing the scale of protection against foreign countries."

It is clear that any preferential tariff advantages given mother countries by their colonies are to that extent in violation of the most-favored-nation principle, a principle which I believe all commercial nations will now agree should be made as universally operative as possible. It must be conceded, on the other hand, that by reason of political, sentimental, and other special relations existing in many cases between colonies and mother countries, plausible grounds for such limited or nominal preference as would be calculated to reflect and evidence such relations can be shown. Naturally the facts relating to the manner of acquirement of the various colonies of the world, their retention by the mother countries, the amounts expended on them, the degree of care and aid given them, and special relationships are widely different. Some colonies have been acquired by fair and others by foul means. Some colonies have simply been exploited by the country acquiring them, without any effort to aid in their development in any way. Other colonies have been the beneficiaries of substantial expenditures and constant cooperation in other important respects on the part of the mother country. My present impression with respect to the variety of economic and political conditions which the colonies present is that in the case of autonomous or self-governing colonies the most-favored-nation principle should apply to the fullest extent possible to agree upon. This would mean either the abandonment or very considerable liberalization toward the minimum of preferential tariffs and other differential treatment heretofore in operation. As to backward, uncivilized, and more or less dependent colonies, I am of opinion that such international policy as would make their respective interests paramount at all times and would at the same time restrain any monopoly of their trade and raw materials on the part of any one nation, or collections of nations acting jointly to that end, would be wise. No nation has a right to indulge in the habit of procuring vast areas as colonies under the questionable methods usually adopted and then insist on retaining a monopoly of both raw materials and the trade that follows. The real question, after all, is as to what extent should the general benefits accruing to all commercial nations from the widest operation of the most-favored-nation principle be subordinated to the claims of mother countries for preferential advantages from their colonies for the reasons stated. It is true, I repeat, that the mother countries and not their colonies are the chief gainers under this system of preference. Canada, for illustration, imposes a higher tariff against the United States than against England in order to obstruct imports from the United States for the benefit of greater English imports, and in so doing she is obliged to pay substantially higher prices for American products.

While the United States has suffered from tariff discriminations in many instances and in many ways during past years, still the volume and nature of its foreign trade and its general and special reciprocal trade arrangements have had the effect, as a rule, of securing the chief benefits of favored-nation treatment.

Mr. Chairman, economic alliances between nations are important to consider. In June, 1916, an economic conference of the allies was held in Paris, at which two sets of recommendations were made—one for the period of the war and the other for the period of reconstruction and an indefinite period after the war. I have not the time to explain them in detail. The recommendation for the war period, however, proposed a policy of strict commercial and economic exclusion from the central powers in every respect. The second recommendation contained all the elements and essentials to be found in a close economic alliance, both offensive and defensive. It not only prescribed rules and methods to insure fair and friendly trade relations between the allied nations with respect to the interchange of products, but contained suitable provisions as to trade routes, transportation, and a fair distribution of raw materials. Considerable speculation and uneasiness arose as to the effect of this hard and fast economic alliance on neutral countries. Mr. Asquith on August 2, 1916, stated in the House of Commons that the recommendations or resolutions of the Paris conference "were in no sense aimed at neutrals." The general idea of the Paris conference was to establish a common economic policy, to promote the mutual trade relations of the allied nations, and to assure their independence, both as to sources of supply and as regards their financial, commercial, and maritime organizations.

An economic conference of officials of the central powers was held during the same year for the purpose of establishing an economic alliance among themselves. A central Europe commercial union between Germany, Austria-Hungary, and Turkey has been reported as the plan and purpose of this meeting. The pretext was that it was to avoid economic isolation, but the real object seemed to be the carrying out of the original plans and purposes to establish and develop a "Mittel Europa" in all its economic, political, and military phases, so long pictured in the dreams of the ruling class of Germany. Bulgaria was also to be included in this economic unit, which was to be self-containing, self-supporting, and independent of other countries.

For some time after these two economic conferences were held the press was filled with reports of the proposed "war after the war," meaning the economic war of extermination which the opposition associations of nations in the European war threatened to wage against each other after the conclusion of peace. Neutral countries were in no sense parties to the action of these two conferences, either at or since that time. These two incidents now appear to have been more in the nature of threats offered against each other by the opposing nations at war. Lord Bryce in October, 1916, expressed the prevailing idea of all conservative, sound-thinking persons, as follows:

> Such a trade war would prolong, would embitter afresh, those hatreds that ought to be allowed to die; and it assumes a continuance of those very things from which we expect our victory to deliver us once for all.

I assume the peace terms will abrogate these two sets of resolutions emanating from the rival economic conferences I have referred to. A conference of Sweden, Norway, and Denmark was held on March 9, 1916, for the purpose of establishing a Scandinavian economic union. The prime minister of Norway, later referring to the purpose of this conference, said: "Every effort should be made to safeguard the independence of the Scandinavian countries in the economic struggle which will follow the war." The second session of this conference was held on September 24, at which it was agreed that the three Governments should closely collaborate with respect to the commercial policies of each and that they should continue this practice following the war. They also agreed to a full exchange of information regarding all phases of their commerce, to protect their mutual commercial interests, and to maintain closer cooperation during and after the war with a view to safeguarding their common interests. One or two other alliances of a commercial character, such as the Russo-Japanese alliance of July 3, 1916, have also been undertaken. My opinion is that economic alliances established here and there by certain groups of commercial nations are calculated to arouse suspicion, hostility, retaliation, and ultimately economic war. Such policy, save under special conditions which would be generally recognized as justifiable, I believe to be unwise, unsound, and in the end productive of far more harm than good, even to the nations party to the same.

Mr. Chairman, the views I am undertaking to express relative to the establishment of fair trade relations generally are only intended to apply to normal peace times that are to follow, and after each allied nation which has suffered industrial losses and setbacks has had a chance to restore conditions to a satisfactory basis and is then given a fair start with other competitors in the race for trade and commerce. It is assumed that whatever general definition of fair trade the peace congress may draft or authorize to be drafted, such qualifications as will prevent the central powers from securing any advantage over such allied nations as Belgium and France until they have effected a physical and industrial reconstruction will be prescribed.

Another class of commercial practices and methods which have been the source of much unfairness and the cause of much retaliation and consequent ill feeling relates to subsidies, bonuses, drawbacks, rebates, etc. These policies are most generally utilized for the encouragement of export business. Dr.

Taussig, one of the leading economic authorities of the country, refers to this phase of foreign trade as follows:

The four devices for promoting export trade considered in the preceding discussion are, first, export bounties; second, special transportation rates on export traffic; third, specially reduced prices on commodities sold for export; and finally, lower duties on American goods in foreign countries, secured by negotiation or treaty. * * * Not only are such devices dubious, sometimes even clearly bad, but they are constant causes of misunderstanding, suspicion, recrimination, and international friction.

It was through the employment of a combination of these methods that Germany was able to supplant the electrical industry in England and the dyestuff industry in the United States and other countries. Germany prior to the war pursued commercial policies which embraced almost every conceivable unfair and hurtful trade device in connection with her efforts to develop foreign commerce. An able economist and business man has recently described the German policy as follows:

German banks, steamship lines, manufacturers, merchants, consular agents, Government spies, and other agencies, all acting together under close direction of the German Government, with the German Army and Navy ready in the background, have in the past acted with a common purpose of driving other countries out of foreign markets by means which went far beyond legitimate commercial practices. We need not be afraid of German industry so long as it is content to compete in the world's market by means of quality and cheapness of goods. But if the whole economic and governmental organization of Germany is to act as a unit, pooling their resources, seeking to offset losses through price cutting in one industry by gains made in another—if practices of this sort on the part of Germany have to be met in the future America, England, France, and other countries will have to take steps to meet them.

The practice of "dumping" consistently and systematically pursued, wherein a given industry subsidized or aided by one or more of the export devices I have described, undersells a foreign competitor in his home market with a view of destroying his industry, was a favorite German method. At this point I desire to quote the utterance of a leading writer and publicist, as follows:

If now, at the final peace negotiations the German style of economics is to dominate, the settlement will degenerate into a race for position "and the devil take the hindmost." If the allies should repudiate their own ideas, namely, the ideas of international reciprocity in trade relations and of the open door and each should merely seek to secure all it can of territory, colonies, trade concessions, exclusive ports, coaling stations, canals, railway routes, and discriminatory tariffs, the peace table will turn into a gambler's table, at which they will simply deal out the cards for the next great game of war, and, as often happens after a war, the ideas and ideals of the conquered will have made conquest over those of the conquerors.

Mr. Chairman, it will be noted that the objectionable trade practices which I am undertaking to discuss are only those which directly or immediately affect other nations unfairly in international finance and commerce, and in no respect relate to domestic trade and finance which every country should be free to conduct as it may see fit. I have not the time to illustrate discriminations in shipping or other transportation, or trade routes, many of which, however, are familiar to business people. Many firms in this country, undertaking to develop foreign businesses, have seen their trade-marks, trade brands, and patents wrongfully appropriated by citizens or tradesmen in such foreign countries without any opportunity for redress. This practice of theft has been prevalent in many foreign localities to the severe loss and detriment of honest exporters here and elsewhere. A general international agreement binding each nation by law to prohibit such conduct and to furnish a tribunal for prompt legal redress when these injuries are attempted is both urgent and feasible.

I now come to another class of conduct which relates to the economic penetration of uncivilized, backward, and weaker countries by methods of force, fraud, or threats in some cases, and of a subtle and insidious nature in others. While the motive in most every case is commercial or economic gain to the exclusion or detriment of other nations, the methods are often widely different. Trade and raw materials—and preferably a monopoly of both—are nearly always the objective. One favorite device for accomplishing this end is through the agency of so-called "loans and concessions." Trade acquired by an honest, unconditional loan would not be subject to criticism; but when loans are made to the Governments—or to those assuming to constitute the Governments—of weak or backward countries, or to provinces within them, only for the primary purpose of securing concessions of vast value to the great injury of the borrower and to the exclusion of the just rights of other trading nations, the viciousness of the transaction reveals itself. There are innumerable instances of this character to be found in the so-called financing of Morocco by France and Germany; of Turkey by France, Germany, and England; and of China by Japan and the rival powers. These loans carry concessions relating to strategic privileges, coaling stations, authority over arsenals, preferential right of entry into ports, tonnage rebates, control of railroads or rights of way for trade or transportation routes, mining privileges, exclusive-trade territory, the privilege of supervising the expenditures from the loan, and even the option of violating the sovereignty of these weak and backward countries. The concessions are political, military, and industrial. Within the past few years Japan is reported to have made 21 loans to alleged Chinese officials or to Chinese firms, aggregating more than $100,000,000, under such restrictions and for such vast concessions as I have described, and for others in addition. These only constitute a brief chapter in her reported encroachments on China in the past. It is not my purpose to discuss the problem now before the peace congress as to how weak and helpless countries are to be dealt with, either in a political or military way. I am only dealing with hurtful and unjustifiable commercial methods and practices. A proper remedy undoubtedly requires international action and supervision, with the "open door" as the underlying policy.

Mr. Chairman, another practice of the stronger nations relating to the virtual seizure of the lands of the weaker and less civilized countries for the primary purpose of commercial exploitation falls, at least to a partial extent, within the range of my discussion. This character of trade conquest is generally supported by armed cruisers and battleships. The acquisition of German Southwest Africa illustrates this class of international commercial depredations. A German merchant established a trading post in this territory and later ceded it to the German Government. The Government thereupon pretended to effect "treaties" with the natives for territory embracing 322,000 square miles and at once sent an army there to maintain German "rights." German traders soon after the year 1886 pushed their way into the Pacific islands, and, of course, promptly demanded protection by the home Government. German battleships were soon on the scene, with the final result that Germany acquired an area of 100,000 square miles in the Pacific islands which German armies and war vessels have been guarding from that day. The result in each instance cited has been a complete monopoly of the valuable raw materials and the trade of these localities by Germany. Force, stealth, and bribery have often been found in these territorial acquisitions. These helpless localities have first been placed under commercial tribute, and this has been followed by political and military domination. By similar methods Germany plundered parts of Poland, the Ukraine, and other small or defenseless countries.

It still causes one to shudder to recall how commercial nations, bantering, jockeying, and threatening each other in the course of strenuous trade conquests, have so often approached the very verge of a general war. Different terms have been used to define the various degrees or steps pursued by the strong nation in its efforts to secure new territory. The terms "controlling influence," "spheres of influence," "protectorate," and "colonies" mark the successive steps from the beginning of the encroachment until the designing country secures its prey. Gen. Marchand, with his army at Fashoda, as a "peaceable" protest against British occupation; the German Kaiser on his yacht in Tangier Bay, accompanied by a battle cruiser, challenging further French encroachments about Morocco, constitute two typical instances of clashes bordering on actual and imminent war which the world has been accustomed to witness in connection with the terrific struggle of different nations for commercial supremacy. The verdict of history, in my judgment, will be that Germany finally did go to war to gain greater control over markets for her home products and over larger sources of raw materials she needed for manufacture at home.

There is such a wealth of aggravated cases and incidents illustrating in almost innumerable ways the objectionable, dangerous, and unfair trade practices which I have attempted to point out that the temptation to enter into further details is strong, but I feel that I have in some measure presented the chief evils and dangers arising under past practices and policies in international trade and finance. It makes one almost despair of the future peace of the world to contemplate a resumption of these deplorable and war-breeding policies. Every intelligent citizen in every country should feel keenly the great lesson of experience and lend his influence in support of a reformation of these international practices. A learned writer has recently spoken concerning economic contests as follows:

Throughout the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries the struggle continued, and the commercial rivalry for new trade routes and new sources of supply and new markets led to a succession of wars, which culminated in the final great struggle between England and Napoleon.

It is needless to add that a number of serious wars of similar origin have since occurred, including our present world war.

Mr. Chairman, I do not contend that all hurtful, dangerous, and unfair trade practices in international commerce can be abolished by common agreement among the nations. I do believe, however, that it would be most wise and feasible at this propitious time for the governments of the various commercial nations to enter into an agreement defining what their most enlightened joint judgment would suggest with respect to the term "unfair trade," and eliminating and abandoning by mutual consent the principal and more vicious devices, acts, and conduct I have described.

Such action would undoubtedly have the effect of greatly minimizing such activities and doubtless would result in the complete abandonment of most of them. A method of international arbitration, which has already been successfully tried out in a small way between the Argentine Republic and the United States, would solve most controversies arising among traders or business men. Either an international organization constituted for the purpose of investigating and deciding when a given act or acts are a violation of "fair trade" as defined, together with agencies provided by other nations to retaliate if necessary, as suggested by President Wilson, or an efficient arbitration tribunal would afford a contributing remedy. There should be some permanent workable agency in any event. Others more desirable might be worked out. In any event the world can not hope to embark upon an era of permanent peace unless it first makes up its mind thus to secure the abandonment of some of the principal underlying causes of most wars of the past.

EXHIBIT A.

[64th Cong., 1st sess., House of Representatives, Feb. 16, 1916.]

Mr. HULL of Tennessee introduced the following joint resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means and ordered to be printed:

"Resolved, etc., That the President be requested to propose to the governments of all commercial nations that, at the close of the present European war, an international trade conference shall be held in the city of Washington, D. C., for the purpose of establishing a permanent international trade-agreement congress, the function and duty of such congress to comprise the consideration of all international trade methods, practices, and policies, which in their effects are reasonably calculated to create dangerous and destructive commercial controversies or bitter economic wars; and to formulate treaty agreements with respect thereto, designed to eliminate, prevent, and avoid the injurious results and dangerous possibilities of economic warfare, and to promote fair and friendly trade relations among all nations of the world."

EXHIBIT B.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., February 16, 1916.

MY DEAR SIR: I herewith inclose copy of proposed House joint resolution, with request that you will do me the courtesy and kindness to examine same and indicate (in confidence, if you prefer) your views as to the policy which the resolution proposes, and also, in the event you should approve its policy, your view as to the wisdom of offering the resolution in Congress at the present time.

Having in mind the generally accepted fact that the chief underlying cause of the present European war is accounted for in the strenuous trade conquests and bitter trade rivalry being conducted prior to the outbreak of the war, and also observing that leading officials and manufacturing associations of Germany and Austria are daily discussing and approving plans for a customs union under which the central powers would have one fiscal system and policy, and observing further that the so-called allies are constantly discussing and propagating a plan for an economic union—each of the foregoing unions intended to wage hostile commercial war at the close of the present European war—it occurred to me that a proposal from the United States announced at this time that an international trade-treaty congress should convene at the termination of the present war for the purposes set out in the resolution would strengthen the position of this country and would make an excellent impression among neutral countries, and doubtless among many of the countries at war. Furthermore, it would seem that some such action on the part of the United States would, above all other considerations, be very important and necessary out of consideration for its own commercial welfare and peaceable development in the future.

I had in mind in connection with the proposed work of the international trade-treaty conference such subjects, among others, as the following, although they are crudely set out:

(a) The permanent preservation of the principle of unconditional most-favored-nation treatment.

(b) The discontinuance of trade retaliation in all forms.

(c) Undue discrimination by a nation or group of nations against another nation or its products.

(d) A complete agreement and understanding with respect to the maritime rights of noncontraband commerce.

(e) Suitable action with respect to the procurement by one or more nations of trade routes by unfair means or unfair interference with trade routes.

(f) Action prohibiting a powerful nation from forcing trade upon a weak country.

(g) An agreement to the effect that no country shall subsidize a domestic industry for the avowed purpose of enabling it to systematically undersell a rival industry of another country and destroy it.

(h) A general understanding that no government will directly aid a domestic industry to destroy by any unfair method a trade rival in another country.

(i) To prohibit the boycotting of the commerce of one nation by another nation.

(j) To secure the equal application of export duties wherever in effect.

(k) To secure nondiscrimination with respect to entry to the ports of other countries.

(l) As to colonies and a mother country, to either discontinue or to adopt a broader and more liberal operation of preferential tariffs and other kinds of differential treatment.

(m) To devise and adopt, if possible, a reasonable system of commercial arbitration covering dealings between traders of different countries.

(n) To devise treaties with respect to such other matters relating to international trade, finance, industry, and transportation as would be deemed reasonably acceptable to the various commercial nations of the world.

Very respectfully, CORDELL HULL.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, this bill to be candid should be entitled "An act to authorize the laying of a tax upon the bread of the American people." That is what it really will amount to in the end.

In section 14 of the act of August 10, 1917, "the food-control law," it was provided:

Thereupon the Government of the United States hereby guarantees every producer of wheat produced within the United States that, upon compliance by him with the regulations prescribed, he shall receive for any wheat produced in reliance upon this guaranty within the period, not exceeding 18 months, prescribed in the notice a price not less than the guaranteed price therefor as fixed pursuant to this section.

The President was authorized by Congress to fix a minimum price on wheat by proclamation, and we guaranteed that the wheat producers should receive that price. The purpose of the bill under discussion is to take care of that situation. Its purpose is to make good to the wheat producers the price of $2.26 fixed by the President as the minimum wheat price.

Of course, by the law referred to we pledged the faith of the Government to the wheat growers. We bound the Government to make good on the guarantee. It turns out that we made a bad trade, but of course we must keep our pledged word. Nobody objects to that. Having bound ourselves to the wheat growers to see that they receive a certain minimum price per bushel, we must redeem that obligation. Nobody objects to that. We are both morally and legally bound, and I do not believe that any opposition would be found in the House against a redemption of our promise if a straight proposal to do so was presented. Unfortunately no such measure is presented in this bill.

If all that was intended by the bill was merely that the Government of the United States should make good its plighted word to the wheat growers the price that was promised, then all that the bill should have carried is an appropriation from the Treasury to pay the loss and providing for a means whereby the loss could be ascertained. But we find that this bill is vastly more than that. It provides for a wheat administration, which is clearly intended to control the price of wheat and to manipulate the wheat market. Under this bill the Government agent who may be charged with administering it may monopolize the wheat supply of the United States, may forbid imports from other countries, and may put any price on wheat that he sees proper.

No man can study this bill and come honestly to any other conclusion than that if the administrator who has it in charge should decide to do so, he may just as well put the price of wheat at $5 per bushel as at $1 per bushel, or whatever he may decide on.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman evidently has not read the bill.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The gentleman has allotted me a few minutes and now proposes to take that by disputing my fundamental proposition.

Mr. LEVER. I am disputing his facts.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. If the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] would yield me a little more time, I would demonstrate that either he has not read the bill understandingly or that he has not stated his views with candor to the membership of this House.

What is all this machinery in this bill for? Why, it is for the purpose of enabling the wheat administrator to put whatever price he wants to upon the bread of this country. That is what it is for.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] stated in opening discussion on the bill that such a measure must be based upon one of two fundamental ideas, each hostile to the other. One that the expense of the guaranty should be borne out of the Treasury, just as other Government expenses are paid, and the other that this burden should be passed on to the people—to the consumers of bread in this country.

If he had had in view merely the first of those propositions he would not have brought a bill in here cumbered with all this machinery of price fixing, forbidding all imports, and providing for the manipulation of markets. So that the conclusion is irresistible that by clothing the administrative official with all this power and machinery for manipulating markets there is behind it a purpose either to put all of this guaranty upon the shoulders of the consumers of bread, or to put a large part of it upon their shoulders. That conclusion, as I say, is absolutely irresistible.

Now then, what the bill really means is that we are going to lay a tax upon the consumers of bread in order to make good to the wheat producers what we will lose by this guaranty. That is what it means. It is just merely a way of saying to the child that reaches out its hand for a piece of bread: "You may take this bread, tolled by whatever it costs the Government to keep the price of wheat up to the guaranteed price." That is a fact that we must all face.

I do not approve of such a system of taxation. I do not approve of paying the loss that the Government has sustained by levying a per capita tax—for that is what this kind of a tax means. It is a per capita tax, not a tax laid upon the people in proportion to their ability to pay it, not a tax laid upon the property of the country, not a tax to be paid out of wealth; but, on the other hand, is to be paid out of poverty—a tax to be paid by the men of large families, a tax to be paid by the poor. I want to say to you, gentlemen, that when this measure is passed, and we find that the price of wheat and flour is manipulated, and bread is kept up in price to its war level, the responsibility can not be passed on by you to any administrative officer, but you must step up like men and say, "I did it; I did my part to make the people of the United States pay per capita the loss the Government has sustained."

By reason of the guaranty we have entered into we must sustain a loss.

Perhaps we will sustain a billion dollars of loss. That loss, in all fairness, according to all sound principles of taxation, ought to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, just as any other expense of the Government is paid, just as other costs of Government ought to be paid. There is no more reason for passing this loss on to the consumers of bread than in passing any other war loss on to the consumer. It ought to be paid out of the General Treasury, a Treasury replenished by taxes laid, upon an equitable basis, upon the property of the country, upon the people who are able to pay. But instead of that we have a bill here disguised with exceeding art; but, thank God, no art can suffice to mask such a purpose as it has behind it. It is concealed and camouflaged with exceeding artfulness, but its purpose is clear after all, and that fell purpose is to lay upon the shoulders of the people of this country, per capita, in proportion as they eat bread, the payment of this loss that the Government has sustained by reason of this venture.

I refuse, my friends, to indorse any such principle. I refuse to wring out of the noses of the poor of America the money necessary to make good the wheat guaranty. I insist that it shall be paid, but, honestly and fairly, it shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States. I refuse to vote to toll the bread of the children of America in order to make good this guaranty.

I am not willing to carry upon my conscience the burden of a vote for this measure. I am unwilling to besmirch my record as a friend to the poor and oppressed by a vote which will inevitably increase the price of our daily bread. I will not make myself liable to have the gaunt fingers of suffering women and children pointed at me as one who has aided in forcing them to pay war prices for bread in time of peace.

I do not know what the official who will be appointed to administer this measure may do. He may perchance be lenient toward the suffering. However, this bill does not compel him to leniency. It puts it in his power to require that the people of the United States pay an unreasonable price for bread during the next two years. This is more power than I am willing to give to any man. It is unnecessary power. The people of the United States are entitled to eat bread at its cost in the markets of the world, free from an arbitrary price increase.

It is immoral and unjust that the burden of the Government's guaranty should be shifted in any part to the cost of bread. It is an abuse of governmental authority to so shift it. It will be to practice a fraud on the people. If we are to pay a tax on bread, then let us make it a stamp tax, so that every head of a family, when he goes to buy a sack of flour, may see there upon it a stamp which shows exactly what the Government is extorting from him.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has again expired.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER], a member of the Committee on Agriculture.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I must confess I am very much surprised at the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] when he insists that this money is to be gotten absolutely out of the consumers of the country and out of the poor people of the country, and concludes his speech by declaring that the appropriation ought to be made out of the Treasury of the United States, declaring that he would favor its being paid out of the Treasury of the United States in order that it might fall upon all alike, and that every taxpayer throughout the United States might bear his proportionate part of the loss, if there should be a loss, resulting from the enforcement of the law upon the statute books.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] called the attention of the gentleman from Alabama to the fact that he must not have read the bill, or he would not insist upon any such criticism as that. He insisted that he had read it carefully and said that the gentleman from South Carolina must not have read it, or if he had read it carefully he was not candid in his statement to the House when he made his speech this morning. Now, let us see who is correct. Section 8 of the bill specifically provides for this appropriation out of the Treasury of the United States. Here is the provision in the bill:

That for carrying out the aforesaid guaranties and otherwise for the purposes of this act, there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be available during the time this act is in effect, the sum of $1,000,000,000.

And section 11 provides—

That the provisions of this act shall cease to be in effect whenever the President shall find that the emergency growing out of the war with Germany has passed and that the further execution of the provisions of this act is no longer necessary for its purposes, the date of which termination shall be ascertained and proclaimed by the President; but the date when this act shall cease to be in effect shall not be later than October 15, 1920.

So the bill provides in so many words for the appropriation, and for the total appropriation, out of the Treasury of the United States—the very place that the gentleman from Alabama says it ought to come from. Then he says, further, that by reason of the machinery and the camouflage that was ingeniously devised and placed in this bill—calculated to mislead people, but not sufficient to mislead him—the director or administrator of this law, or the one who would have charge of the enforcement of it, could provide for a price for wheat of $5 per bushel when the bill itself provides on its face that it shall not be sold for more than the guaranteed price of $2.26 per bushel. So evidently the gentleman from South Carolina was correct when he said that the gentleman from Alabama had not read the bill, or if he had he had not read it carefully.

Now, gentlemen, the theory of the bill, of course, is that by reason of an extraordinary production of wheat in the United States there may be a loss; that the price of wheat may go below the guaranteed price of $2.26 a bushel. If the price should not go below $2.26, there would be no loss. If it goes below that price and we suffer loss, it will be because of the fact that we did pass a law in this Congress fixing a guaranteed minimum price of wheat at not less than $2, and authorizing the President of the United States by proclamation to fix the price that should be paid for it in the future. Under that the President of the United States, on February 21, 1918, issued a proclamation fixing the guaranteed price for the 1918 wheat crop. That proclamation is as follows:

FIXING GUARANTEED PRICES FOR 1918 WHEAT CROP.

(February 21, 1918.)

Whereas under and by virtue of an act of Congress entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved by the President on the 10th day of August, 1917, it is provided among other things as follows:

"SEC. 14. That whenever the President shall find that an emergency exists requiring stimulation of the production of wheat and that it is essential that the producers of wheat, produced within the United States, shall have the benefits of the guaranty provided for in this section, he is authorized from time to time, seasonably and as far in advance of seeding time as practicable, to determine and fix and to give public notice of what, under specified conditions, is a reasonable guaranteed price for wheat, in order to assure such producers a reasonable profit. The President shall thereupon fix such guaranteed price for each of the official grain standards for wheat as established under the United States grain standards act approved August 11, 1916. The President shall from time to time establish and promulgate such regulations as he shall deem wise in connection with such guaranteed prices, and in particular governing conditions of delivery and payment and differences in price for the several standard grades in the principal primary markets of the United States, adopting No. 1 northern spring or its equivalent at the principal interior primary markets as the basis. Thereupon the Government of the United States hereby guarantees every producer of wheat produced within the United States that, upon compliance by him with the regulations prescribed, he shall receive for any wheat produced in reliance upon this guaranty within the period, not exceeding 18 months, prescribed in the notice, a price not less than the guaranteed price therefor as fixed pursuant to this section. In such regulations the President shall prescribe the terms and conditions upon which any such producer shall be entitled to the benefits of such guaranty. The guaranteed prices for the several standard grades of wheat for the crop of 1918 shall be based upon No. 1 northern spring or its equivalent at not less than $2 per bushel at the principal interior primary markets. This guaranty shall not be dependent upon the action of the President under the first part of this section, but is hereby made absolute and shall be binding until May 1, 1919."

Now, therefore, I, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, by virtue of the powers conferred upon me by said act of Congress, and especially by section 14 thereof, do hereby find that an emergency exists requiring stimulation of the production of wheat, and that it is essential that the producers of wheat produced within the United States shall have the benefits of the guaranty provided for in said section; and, in order to make effective the guaranty by Congress for the crop of 1918 and to assure such producers a reasonable profit, I do hereby determine and fix and give public notice of reasonable guaranteed prices for No. 1 northern spring wheat and its equivalents at the respective principal primary markets as follows, to wit:

Chicago, Ill., $2.20 per bushel;
Omaha, Nebr., $2.15 per bushel;
Kansas City, Mo., $2.15 per bushel;
St. Louis, Mo., $2.18 per bushel;
Minneapolis, Minn., $2.17 per bushel;
Duluth, Minn., $2.17 per bushel;
New York, N. Y., $2.28 per bushel;
Philadelphia, Pa., $2.27 per bushel;
Baltimore, Md., $2.27 per bushel;
Newport News, Va., $2.27 per bushel;
Charleston, S. C., $2.27 per bushel;
Savannah, Ga., $2.27 per bushel;
Portland, Oreg., $2.05 per bushel;
Seattle, Wash., $2.05 per bushel;
San Francisco, Cal., $2.10 per bushel;
Los Angeles, Cal., $2.10 per bushel;
Galveston, Tex., $2.20 per bushel;
New Orleans, La., $2.20 per bushel;
Salt Lake City, Utah, $2 per bushel;
Great Falls, Mont., $2 per bushel;
Spokane, Wash., $2 per bushel.
Pocatello, Idaho, $2 per bushel;
Fort Worth, Tex., $2.09 per bushel;
Oklahoma City, Okla., $2.05 per bushel;
Wichita, Kans., $2.08 per bushel; and that the guaranteed price for the other grades established under the United States grain standards act approved August 11, 1916, based on said price for No. 1 northern spring wheat at the respective principal primary markets of the United States above mentioned, will assure the producers of wheat produced within the United States a reasonable profit; the guaranteed prices in the principal primary markets above mentioned being fixed by adopting No. 1 northern spring wheat or its equivalent at the principal interior markets as the basis.

For the purposes of such guaranty only, I hereby fix the guaranteed prices at the respective principal primary markets above mentioned for the following grades of wheat, to wit: No. 1 northern spring, No. 1 hard winter, No. 1 red winter, No. 1 durum, No. 1 hard white. The guaranteed prices at the respective principal primary markets aforesaid of all other grades of wheat established under the United States grain standards act approved August 11, 1916, shall be based on the above guaranteed prices and bear just relation thereto.

The sums thus determined and fixed are guaranteed by the Government of the United States at the respective principal primary markets of the United States above mentioned to every producer of wheat of any grade so established under the United States grain standards act upon the condition that said wheat is harvested in the United States during the year 1918 and offered for sale before the 1st day of June, 1919, to such agent or employee of the United States, or other person as may be hereafter designated, at any one of the above-mentioned cities, which are, for the purposes of this act, hereby declared to be the principal primary markets of the United States, and provided that such producer complies with all regulations which may be hereafter promulgated in regard to said guaranty by the President of the United States. * * *

He issued that pursuant to section 14 of the act of August 10, 1917, which authorized him to issue that proclamation, and he quoted that section in this proclamation.

Then, on September 2, 1918, he issued a proclamation fixing the guaranteed price for the 1919 wheat crop. That proclamation is as follows:

FIXING GUARANTEED PRICES FOR 1919 WHEAT CROP.

(September 2, 1918.)

Whereas, under and by virtue of an act of Congress entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved by the President on the 10th day of August, 1917, it is provided, among other things, as follows:

"SEC. 14. That whenever the President shall find that an emergency exists requiring stimulation of the production of wheat and that it is essential that the producers of wheat, produced within the United States, shall have the benefits of the guaranty provided for in this section, he is authorized, from time to time, seasonably and as far in advance of seeding time as practicable, to determine and fix and to give public notice of what, under specified conditions, is a reasonable guaranteed price for wheat, in order to assure such producers a reasonable profit. The President shall thereupon fix such guaranteed price for each of the official grain standards for wheat as established under the United States grain-standards act approved August 11, 1916. The President shall from time to time establish and promulgate such regulations as he shall deem wise in connection with such guaranteed prices, and in particular governing conditions of delivery and payment; and differences in price for the several standard grades in the principal primary markets of the United States adopting No. 1 northern spring or its equivalent at the principal interior primary markets as the basis. Thereupon the Government of the United States hereby guarantees every producer of wheat produced within the United States that, upon compliance by him with the regulations prescribed, he shall receive for any wheat produced in reliance upon this guarantee within the period, not exceeding 18 months, prescribed in the notice, a price not less than the guaranteed price therefor as fixed pursuant to this section. In such regulations the President shall prescribe the terms and conditions upon which any such producer shall be entitled to the benefits of such guaranty."

Now, therefore, I, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, by virtue of the powers conferred upon me by said act of Congress, and especially by section 14 thereof, do hereby find that an emergency exists requiring stimulation of the production of wheat, and that it is essential that the producers of wheat produced within the United States shall have the benefits of the guarantee provided for in said section; and, in order to make effective the guarantee by Congress for the crop of 1919 and to assure such producers a reasonable profit, I do hereby determine and fix, and give public notice of reasonable guaranteed prices for No. 1 northern spring wheat and its equivalents at the respective principal primary markets as follows, to wit:

New York, N. Y., $2.39½ per bushel.
Philadelphia, Pa., $2.39 per bushel.
Baltimore, Md., $2.38¾ per bushel.
Newport News, Va., $2.38¾ per bushel.
Duluth, Minn., $2.22½ per bushel.
Minneapolis, Minn., $2.21½ per bushel.
Chicago, Ill., $2.26 per bushel.
St. Louis, Mo., $2.24 per bushel.
Kansas City, Mo., $2.18 per bushel.
Omaha, Nebr., $2.18 per bushel.
New Orleans, La., $2.28 per bushel.
Galveston, Tex., $2.28 per bushel.
Tacoma, Wash., $2.20 per bushel.
Seattle, Wash., $2.20 per bushel.
Portland, Oreg., $2.20 per bushel.
Astoria, Oreg., $2.20 per bushel.
San Francisco, Cal., $2.20 per bushel.
Los Angeles, Cal., $2.20 per bushel.
Salt Lake City, Utah, $2 per bushel.
Great Falls, Mont., $2 per bushel.
Pocatello, Idaho, $2 per bushel.
Spokane, Wash., $2 per bushel.

and that the guaranteed price for the other grades established under the United States grain-standards act approved August 11, 1916, based on said price for No. 1 northern spring wheat at the respective principal primary markets of the United States above mentioned, will assure the producers of wheat produced within the United States a reasonable profit; the guaranteed prices in the principal primary markets above mentioned being fixed by adopting No. 1 northern spring wheat, or its equivalents at the principal interior markets, as the basis.

For the purposes of such guaranty only, I hereby fix the guaranteed prices at the respective principal primary markets above mentioned for the following grades of wheat, to wit: No. 1 northern spring, No. 1 hard winter, No. 1 red winter, No. 1 durum, No. 1 hard white. The guaranteed prices at the respective principal primary markets aforesaid of all other grades of wheat established under the United States grain-standards act approved August 11, 1916, shall be based on the above guaranteed prices and bear just relation thereto.

The sums thus determined and fixed are guaranteed by the Government of the United States at the respective principal primary markets of the United States above mentioned, to every producer of wheat of any grade so established under the United States grain-standards act, upon the condition that said wheat is harvested in the United States during the year 1919, and offered for sale before the 1st day of June, 1920, to such agent or employee of the United States, or other person as may be hereafter designated, at any one of the above-mentioned cities, which are hereby declared to be the principal primary markets of the United States, and provided that such producer complies with all regulations which may be hereafter promulgated in regard to said guaranty by the President of the United States. * * *

These proclamations issued by the President pursuant to the law of August 10, 1917, made an absolute contract with the wheat producers to pay them not less than $2.26 per bushel.

Now, what seems to trouble some of the Members is in reference to payment for the wheat that shall be planted in the spring of this year—spring wheat. The proclamation is not conditional in any sense of the word, but is sweeping in its provisions, and provides absolutely and unconditionally for the price of wheat for the crop of the year 1919. It provides that it shall be paid for at the rate of not less than $2.26 a bushel if it is harvested in the year 1919 and delivered prior to June 1, 1920. Therefore it fixes the price for the whole 1919 crop, the first proclamation fixing the price for the crop of 1918 and the second proclamation fixing the price for the crop of 1919, including not only winter wheat but also spring wheat harvested in the year 1919.

Therefore, my friends, we find ourselves in the situation of having made a specific, unequivocal, and unconditional contract with the wheat growers of the United States of America fixing the price that they should receive for their wheat, and the President of the United States under solemn proclamation and under seal of the United States of America, attested by the Secretary of State, guaranteed to those people that price which we authorized him by act of Congress to fix. Therefore it is as conclusive a contract and as binding a contract as could be made between two individuals in reference to any business transaction in the world. It is as binding on the Government as a bond. Having made the contract, there is but one way to be honest, and that is to fulfill the contract by meeting the requirements of it absolutely, and going to the fullest extent that it requires in order to carry it out, and not seeking at any time nor under any circumstances to deviate from the letter or spirit of the contract thus made under the statute as it is written. [Applause.] If we should take any other course it would be a repudiation upon the part of the Government of the United States of a contract made with its citizens to encourage them in the production of wheat which we so much needed. We know that when this law was passed there was a shortage of wheat, and therefore it was necessary to stimulate the wheat growers of the country in order to get them to produce the wheat which was required to sustain our own people, to feed our boys in the Army and in the Navy of the United States who were fighting our battles, and feed our allies across the sea and their boys in their armies and navies who were fighting not only their battles but fighting our battles as well. That was the reason the statute was passed. [Applause.] And to show you that it did stimulate the production of wheat I call attention to the hearings, page 220, where Mr. Barnes stated as to the wheat crop of the world. His statement was as follows:

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Barnes, what is the average world's supply of wheat?

Mr. BARNES. Well, I should say that the world's wheat crop has ranged in the past few years from a total of 3,000,000,000 to 4,000,000,000 bushels, roughly.

Mr. CANDLER. What is the average production in America? How much do we produce?

Mr. BARNES Our average crop will work out about 620,000,000 or 630,000,000.

Mr. CANDLER. The largest crop, I think, that we produced was in 1915, was it not?

Mr. BARNES 1915; yes.

Mr. CANDLER. It ran over 1,000,000,000 bushels that year, but the average amount produced in this country is what, did you say?

Mr. BARNES. Around 630,000,000.

Mr. CANDLER. This whole proceeding here is to take care of what is thought will be a very large increase upon the production in this country over any year heretofore.

Mr. BARNES. Let me correct my figures. The average crop in this country is about 740,000,000.

Mr. HAUGEN For how many years?

Mr. BARNES. Ten years.

The CHAIRMAN. I thought that your figure was incorrect.

Mr. CANDLER. What was the average price of wheat prior to the war in this country—three years prior to the war?

Mr. BARNES. Well, the average farm price in 1918 was $2.06; in 1917, $2.05; in 1916, $1.44; in 1915, 98 cents; in 1914, 99 cents; in 1913, 79 cents; and in 1912, 85 cents.

Mr. CANDLER. So our guaranteed price of wheat in this country under the Government guarantee has been above what the average price was during all the preceding years?

Mr. BARNES. Oh, yes.

The price fixed in the law was $2, which was a little under the 1917 price, but the price fixed by the President was a little above that price, thus furnishing encouragement and stimulation. Having thus encouraged the farmers to plant the wheat, we must keep the contract and not repudiate it because the war has come to an end. It is a part of our war expenses and we should be thankful the war is over and cheerfully pay our necessary war expenses. [Applause.]

I am supporting this and standing by the contract, just like I would have done had the Government guaranteed the price of cotton and similar conditions had arisen in reference to that product as has arisen in reference to wheat. The cotton growers opposed the fixing of the price of cotton, and it was not fixed. Conditions in the South at the present time as to cotton are very serious. Now, we will carry out our contract with the wheat farmers, and I hope some action may be taken to relieve the situation as to cotton and to help the cotton producers. They are not now asking the Government to fix the price of cotton or to buy the product, but they do ask that they be given an open and free market, so they can in a world's market get what their cotton is intrinsically and really worth. They do ask that unjust and illegal speculation in cotton be stopped, and if it takes the abolition of the cotton exchanges to accomplish that, then let them be abolished. If the exchanges will not abide by the law and see to the delivery of what is really sold, if they will not deal fairly and honestly and suppress the gambling in cotton on the exchanges, then let them pay the penalty and go out of business. Let us have fair and honest dealing in real cotton, so as it may sell at its value, not affected by sales of imaginary cotton never intended to be delivered. Cotton has secured the balance of trade to our country for more than 30 years. It is the product that always brings the gold across the seas to us. It is furnishing to-day a goodly portion of the food and raiment of the world. It is bandaging the wounds of our disabled and wounded soldiers. It is sewing together the garments of mankind. We want to increase its market, extend its blessings, and enlarge its use by having the chance to sell it at all times in all the markets of the world. I hope the day may soon come when that can be done. [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I do not see why gentlemen complain when Members of Congress who represent consumers exclusively ask questions about an important bill like this, because it is evident that if the consumer obtains his flour at the world price the Treasury of the United States will pay the difference between the guaranteed price in the United States and the world price, no matter how low it may go. Inasmuch as the money to pay that difference all comes from taxation, which must be obtained from the producer as well as the consumer, it seems to be a very fair question to raise at this time. I may discuss it a little more fully when we come to take up the bill under the five-minute rule. But that the bill is a perfect one I think no one will contend except those who are blindly in its favor.

Section 2 of the bill confers upon the President—and that means upon Mr. Hoover or whoever he may appoint to act in his behalf—some very extraordinary powers. They are blanket powers, and may be enforced by a dollar-a-year man who has a very large interest in matters affected by this legislation. I question whether section 2 ought to be passed in the form in which it is written.

Section 6, which relates to the admission of exports——

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. In section 3 I notice that the President is authorized to purchase "at not less than the guaranteed price," and the general impression throughout the country is that the guaranteed price is a maximum and not a minimum price. Under section 23 the President is authorized to buy or contract for the purchase of wheat at not less than the guaranteed price. In other words, the Food Administrator may raise the price to five or ten dollars.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But the gentlemen of the committee dispute that statement.

Mr. ANDERSON. Let me say to the gentleman——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I decline to have a controversy in my time.

Mr. ANDERSON. I did not want to raise any controversy; I want to say that I think the gentleman from New York is right.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am glad to have one gentleman on the committee admit that. I had been advised that the gentleman from New York was wrong; but the gentleman from Minnesota says he is right.

Mr. LONDON. I want to say that it is the first time that a Republican has admitted that I am right.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Well, there are some Democrats who do not always agree with the gentleman. But section 6 relates to exports. I have been wondering as I read the section whether it would not be possible for a speculator in wheat to buy Canadian or Argentine wheat, bring it into the United States at a price far below the guaranteed price and unload it on the American market at the higher price. I question whether that situation is amply protected. I question whether that is what the American wheat grower would want to have written in the bill without a better understanding.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. If the gentleman will yield, we have a provision in the bill that prohibits wheat coming into this country.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It leaves it discretionary with the President, but I question whether it is sufficiently adequate. Section 11 is the crucial section of the bill, but it goes a step beyond the bond. We all grant that Congress is just as responsible as anyone else. We gave the President authority to fix the price of wheat. We gave him authority to give a guaranty to the producer of wheat—to one-sixth of the farming population of the United States for whom my friend who criticized the consumer a little while ago, Mr. STEENERSON of Minnesota, so often contends.

But the bond the President gave was to run, so far as the sale of wheat was concerned, until the 1st of June, 1920. That is to say, he was to take wheat at the fixed price offered for sale before the 1st day of June, 1920. That is the bond, and I am ready to live up to the bond. But I asked the gentleman from South Carolina, the chairman of the committee, the reason for extending the time, as brought in in the bill, until December 31, 1920, and amended by the committee to October 15, 1920, but he had no time to answer.

Mr. LEVER. I will answer now.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Very well.

Mr. LEVER. My interpretation of the act is that there is no authority in the act to extend the time for the bringing in of wheat—they must bring it in by the 1st of June, 1920. The other extension of time—October 15—is for selling and getting rid of the crop.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The date when the act ceases to be in effect is not later than December 31, 1920, which, I think, the committee has amended to October 15, 1920.

Mr. LEVER. That does not affect the guaranty.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I mention it to show that the bill is not a perfect bill and is not one in accordance with the bond, whether it was a good bargain or a bad bargain.

Mr. RUBEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I regret that I can not yield unless I can get three or four minutes from the other side.

Mr. LEVER. I can not possibly yield any time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on this subject in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There are complaints coming up from some of our constituents in regard to this enormous proposition—the taking of a billion dollars out of the Treasury of the United States to bolster up a contract to one group of the people of the United States. It is a mighty serious thing. All the people have to pay for it. The consumers will have to pay a higher price for bread, and that price is apparently going to be higher. I append one letter indicating the drift. It comes from Joseph F. Hasskarl, assistant director of wharves, docks, and ferries at Philadelphia:

PHILADELPHIA, February 20, 1919.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: In my circle of acquaintances I meet many people and hear their views concerning all kinds of subjects. As there seems to be a unanimity of opinion and a feeling of grave apprehension as to the future, I think it is a duty to bring to your attention some of the often-expressed views and opinions that I have recently heard, and which, in most instances, coincide with my own views:

1. General alarm and apprehension is felt by the thinking people at the extravagance and waste by the Government, which has unnecessarily increased the expenditures of this country during the past two years.

2. If these methods are permitted to continue much longer, bankruptcy and bolshevism will surely follow, and the vast majority of our people suffer in consequence.

3. The taxation now imposed is a very heavy burden upon our people, and the thought is frequently and freely expressed that better planning and greater care must be exercised in the future.

4. Agreements such as apparently were entered into by Mr. Herbert Hoover to purchase all wheat grown in this country at the rate of $2.26 per bushel up to July 1, 1920, looks like a very poor business arrangement for all excepting the farmers, especially in view of the fact that the greater portion of the wheat the country is to purchase at that high price has not been planted as yet, consequently the farmer has not incurred any expense whatever connected with the same, and I fail to see why we should be called upon to pay such an exorbitant price for wheat, when the same is being delivered in England from Argentina and Australia at the rate of 95 cents per bushel, and no doubt we could also buy it much under Mr. Hoover's contract figures if permitted to enter the world's open markets for the same.

5. The very high price for wheat under the present arrangement also operates greatly to the disadvantage of the country, inasmuch as farmers will now undoubtedly plant all the spring wheat they possibly can, whereas formerly they mixed their crops by planting corn, oats, rye, hay, and other products which were used as food in growing stock, such as cattle, sheep, hogs, poultry, etc. As a result all kinds of meat must necessarily continue to be scarce and prices high.

6. In view of the high cost of living under these arrangements, it becomes almost impossible to reduce wages and the cost of materials; so, directly and indirectly, fixing wheat at such a high price is operating against the best interests of this country in many ways and will ultimately interfere with the business expansion that should now take place and thus prevents capital and labor from becoming as active as they otherwise would.

7. These conditions are rapidly leading to a spirit of dissatisfaction and bolshevism that is becoming more widespread and threatening every day; therein lies the danger to this entire country, and it is for that reason I am taking the liberty of bringing this matter to your attention.

Having had leave to extend my remarks, I want to refer to the freight question which was raised a little while ago by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. YOUNG] and have read in my time a letter from the president of the Insurance Co. of North America, in answer to a statement issued by Mr. Hurley, president of the Shipping Board, with regard to shipping.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE INSURANCE CO. OF NORTH AMERICA,
Philadelphia, February 20, 1919.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MOORE: Inclosed I hand you copy of article appearing in the New York Herald yesterday, which explains itself.

Referring to the charges made in this article, I desire to reply to the charges made by Mr. Hurley, as follows:

The charge that the American marine insurance companies are dominated by British influence is untrue; that they are discriminating against American shipping is also untrue; as is the charge that the American underwriters are endeavoring to cripple American merchant shipping in favor of their British rivals.

These charges, in fact, amount to a libel against American marine underwriters, who have been 100 per cent patriotic during the war, who have carried marine insurance during that time largely at a loss (their profit being made from war insurance and fire insurance), and have subscribed largely to Government bonds, and whose employees have very generally volunteered in the United States Army and Navy without waiting for the provost marshal to come for them.

These charges probably arose from the fact that many of the wooden ships constructed by the United States Shipping Board, against the advice of marine experts, have proved, as was anticipated, unsuitable for the transportation of cargoes overseas, and consequently the Shipping Board find it difficult to insure them, or the cargoes to be transported by them, anywhere in the world.

Some of the steel steamships constructed by the Shipping Board have also been found to be defective, principally in the matter of defective riveting.

Apparently the charge made by Mr. Hurley is an attempt to unload upon the shoulders of American underwriters responsibility for the failure of the shipbuilding policy persisted in by the Government in defiance of expert advice.

Anybody knows that green timber shrinks. Therefore, to build a ship out of green timber is the height of folly, because in the ordinary course of nature timbers and plankings are bound to shrink, rendering frequent calking necessary, and ultimately rendering the ship unseaworthy.

The Government was well advised of this fact, but persisted in constructing wooden tonnage, for reasons, no doubt, as well known to you as to anyone else.

All the time these ships were being constructed our surveyors were refused access to any Government yards, although request was made for this privilege.

American underwriters, as you know, are anxious to afford and do afford every facility for the transaction of American commerce.

They can and do quote as low rates on American tonnage as they do on British or other foreign tonnage, provided the American ship is the equal of the foreign ship.

If the Shipping Board will give us good ships, they will get good rates on them. There is ample capacity in the American insurance market to take care of American business, with occasional exceptions, to prove the rule.

As to the proposal, on behalf of Mr. Hurley and Senator FLETCHER, to create an insurance department for the Government to protect American commerce, it is not needed; in so far as it renders the Treasury Department of the United States responsible for insurance on wooden or poorly constructed vessels it would be welcomed by American underwriters as taking a burden off their shoulders; but as a citizen I would like to point out that not even the United States can keep a leaky or otherwise unseaworthy ship afloat at sea, and to attempt to do so is merely the equivalent of sending good money after bad.

Very truly, yours,

BENJAMIN RUSH, President.

I shall include in my remarks the statement made by Mr. Hurley, and in that connection I desire to say that it is interesting to note that the Shipping Board has recently announced that it would mark off $1,000,000,000 of expenditures appropriated by Congress.

[Article appearing in New York Herald Wednesday, Feb. 19, 1919.]

HURLEY CHARGES OCEAN INSURANCE DISCRIMINATION—DECLARES COMPANIES DOMINATED BY BRITISH OVERCHARGE FOR AMERICAN VESSELS.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Tuesday.

Admission that merchant-marine insurance concerns, most of which are dominated by British influence, are discriminating against American shipping was made to-day by Edward N. Hurley, chairman of the Shipping Board. Senator DUNCAN U. FLETCHER, of Florida, issued a statement advocating the establishing of Government form of insurance to meet the situation.

The discrimination against American shipping by British marine insurance concerns is regarded as one of the most serious menaces against American shipping. The American shipper ships his goods from an inland point, assuming a certain fixed rate of insurance. At New York he is told that if the goods are shipped in American bottoms the rate will be considerably higher than if shipped in British bottoms.

Inasmuch as the price which he has fixed on his goods is predicated on the insurance rate which he anticipated, his answer is usually to await the arrival of a British vessel.

The classification of vessels is the province of the British Lloyd's, with the result that this classification is used as the excuse for placing a higher rate on American carried cargoes.

The method suggested by Senator FLETCHER, chairman of the Senate Committee on Commerce, is to establish a system similar to the War Risk Bureau, which insured cargoes against destruction from submarines or other war menaces.

"I am strongly in favor," said Senator FLETCHER, "of the immediate establishment of an insurance plan whereby the Government will be enabled to insure its merchant ships and their cargoes.

"It is essential that this be done in order to protect ourselves against the exorbitant rates exacted by the marine insurance companies, most of whom are dominated by British insurance agents."

The War Risk Bureau, which formerly insured cargoes subject to war hazards has ceased to function. Private companies have been insuring American vessels, but the rates are invariably higher than those charged to British bottoms.

The whole situation is regarded as a deliberately intended method of crippling American merchant shipping in favor of British rivals, and so long as the British control the insurance situation there is apparently no help for what is a serious handicap. So serious is it that without some method of meeting it, it is not believed American merchant shipping can compete with its rivals.

Senator FLETCHER'S recommendation is expected to take the form of congressional action soon.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS].

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, on August 10, 1917, while the country was laboring under very abnormal war conditions, the Congress passed a wheat guaranty act. There were only five votes against the bill, therefore I have a right to assume that it was the best judgment of the entire Congress at that time to do the thing they did do. The bill was passed. It became the law. It assured the American farmer for that year's crop that he would receive at least $2 a bushel, without a maximum, but, as is often the case in legislation, the minimum became the maximum. Section 14 of that food act, carrying the wheat-price regulation of August 10, 1917, carried a provision that if in the judgment of the President he saw fit to issue a proclamation continuing that guaranty he might do so. Accordingly, and pursuant to the authority then given, in September, 1918, while the war was still on, before the signing of the armistice, he did issue a proclamation in terms clear and emphatic that in order to stimulate wheat production the Government would pay the American farmer at the scheduled places mentioned in the schedule a price ranging from $2 to $2.26 per bushel for his wheat, according to the market, the carriage, and so forth. That was a solemn proposal on the part of the Federal Government pursuant to authority this Congress gave the President. The American farmer answered that proposal, and instead of planting the normal acreage of about 63,000,000 acres, he planted 75,000,000 acres, 12,000,000 acres more than the normal crop. This completed the contract; this rendered it a binding bargain; this left our duty very plain. Therefore I assume the question of whether or not we should this day appropriate a sum sufficient to make it good is scarcely open to discussion, and I shall not spend any time on it.

The normal crop in bushels for a series of prewar years ranged about 750,000,000 bushels per year. We have reason to assume that we will have a crop of 1,250,000,000 next year. That will so increase the production that undoubtedly the price of wheat will fall below this guaranty. The thought I should like to leave with the Congress and the farmer is that last year we apparently placed a burden on the farmer which was not placed on other classes, but this year the Congress is doing the honorable and decent thing of doing precisely what they agreed to do, and thereby they are making up the deficit and the loss that he sustained last year. Our duty seems plain, and there should be no controversy or haggling about it. There will be those who will oppose but it will be those who are unwilling to keep their contract. It will be from those who are unwilling to keep faith with the farmer.

I do not quite understand why the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] feel so aggrieved over this bill. I take it that they are aggrieved as to the details more than as to the substance of the bill. True, they both represent city districts, but even so, I am perfectly sure their constituents would not desire their Government to fail to do a specific thing they promised to do.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I am sure the gentleman will observe I can not yield. I do not refuse out of discourtesy, but I have a very few minutes. There are some six and a half million farmers in the country, and only about 1,000,000 of those raise wheat. The duty devolves on one-sixth of the American farmers not alone to feed themselves but to feed the rest of the country, not alone the country but in this world war to feed the world. We are the greatest wheat-producing country in all the world. They did their full part, and they ought to have full and ungrudging credit for it. They felt they were being regulated and others were not, and in this they were partially correct. There were many abuses and much extortion practiced by reason of the war. Neither time nor foresight with war raging could cure them all. What I do say here and now, I am glad that Congress is to-day making this appropriation, so that the farmer can recoup at least part of his loss of last year. War conditions were abnormal; they are always abnormal. Prices are abnormal, and they are always abnormal under war conditions. We have to do abnormal things. It is one of the heartaches of war that all rules and safeguards are in abeyance. Men were drafted into the military service; that was abnormal. We tax the people with as much as 80 per cent of their earnings; that is abnormal. But it all seemed necessary then. The appropriation of $1,000,000,000 out of the Treasury of the United States at this time is to those unacquainted with our obligation an abnormal thing to do. The appropriation of $1,000,000,000 for a revolving fund to keep up this wheat price of $2.26 per bushel is a very unusual thing—a thing which Members of Congress would refuse to do except for the abnormal conditions that have prevailed during the past year. Abnormal conditions must be met by the Congress in an intelligent way. You can not hew to old beaten paths when old beaten paths have become obscured by war. You can not follow the lines of least resistance when greater resistance is required. A strong government, if it is long to be strong, must meet abnormal conditions and deal with them intelligently. We did our duty then as we saw it. We must do it now when there can be no question about it. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] said that this should be entitled a bill "taxing bread." I think I have a right to deny that, although I am not on this committee, because I read in the pending bill an absolute outright appropriation out of the Treasury of the United States of $1,000,000,000. In section 8 I find this language:

SEC. 8. That for carrying out the aforesaid guaranties and otherwise for the purposes of this act there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be available during the time this act is in effect, the sum of $1,000,000,000.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Is not that merely a revolving fund and is it not entirely consistent with the purposes of this bill that the entire fund be kept intact and be found in the Treasury at the end of this term?

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, no; the gentleman borrows trouble—strains conditions to achieve his point. I prefer to keep my contract and not quibble about petty details.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Does the bill provide that as much as one dollar of that money shall be lost in this operation?

Mr. FERRIS. I do not agree with the gentleman. I have read the bill hurriedly, but the chairman is more able than I to make answer to these questions. I undertake to say that the billion dollars is an appropriation out of the Treasury to make good a solemn contract that this Congress made, a solemn contract that the President made, and I do not think it ought to be misunderstood or misstated to the effect that we are around trying to levy tributes on the toilers of the country. If the amount is not needed to make good our contract, of course it will be returned to the Treasury, as it should be; but in any event it is not to come out of the toilers. I would not add to their burdens. I represent a great agricultural section. I live out there on the prairies of the West, where we not only feed ourselves but we feed all the rest of you, and not only do that but feed this country and the other countries; and I say to you that during last year while this wheat regulation was going on the farmer was held down as few others were. You answer that by saying that the price of wheat was high. It was high, but few things were normal in price.

I myself have sold wheat when a young farmer boy for 35 and 40 and 50 cents a bushel, and I have bought shoes at 90 cents a pair, overalls at 50 cents apiece, and jumpers at 40 cents apiece. I have bought hats at $1 apiece. Everything now is clear out of proportion. We then could buy a double set of leather harness for $25 and now you have to pay $100, and so the conditions have become so abnormal that while the farmer got $2 for his wheat, or approximately so, it was not an abnormal price and it was not in keeping with the profits made by men in other businesses. But whether it was or not it was one of the very few things that were put under the law, and I congratulate the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and his entire committee for doing promptly and justly what Congress had promised to do. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY].

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, I have always been and I still am against price fixing by the Government, but this administration having entered upon the policy of price fixing and having made thereunder certain promises, agreements, and guaranties, I am for keeping the faith and shall vote that the Government shall make good its guaranty.

The farmer has not been helped by price fixing. The farmer will not be helped by this bill; others will. The farmers in my State and in my district will not be helped, for while we grew wheat last season for the first time in many years we have only grown enough to feed ourselves without exporting any. We have grown potatoes, our great staple crop, in great abundance, which we can not sell because of the increased freight rates. The coming season we can not plant and sell them at a profit because 3,000 miles of Canada borders the United States, and we are unprotected. The war protected us for the time being, but the war is now over, and now, under free trade, Canada will flood our markets with all farm products. An ex-President, the author of that un-American legislation, reciprocity with Canada in the same kind of products that grew in the United States, is now touring this country in favor of the President's league of nations, a league which has not been approved by this Nation or any other nation on the earth. It is distinctly the President's league of nations.

Mr. BAER. A league of notions.

Mr. HERSEY. A league of notions is right. I want to commend to the House the following editorial in the Washington Post of this morning entitled "Dangerous delay in making peace":

DANGEROUS DELAY IN MAKING PEACE.

The delay in making formal peace is extremely harmful in many ways. It works to the disadvantage and peril of the allies and to the advantage of the enemy. Everyone recognizes the fact that far-reaching and complicated problems confront the peace conference, and there is a disposition to be patient while the conference is carefully considering these problems with a view to settling them properly and once for all. The populations of allied nations are becoming restive, nevertheless, because they are convinced that secure peace with Germany is not being made as speedily as it might be. The peoples believe that this delay, which seems to be unnecessarily prolonged, is working hardship and loss to individuals, perplexity to communities, and irritation to armies and nations.

In the single matter of demobilization the delay in making peace is piling up trouble for each of the allied Governments. The soldier boys are loyal to the core, and so long as there is fighting to be done there will be no grumbling. But when they are held in camp week after week while the Paris conference labors with questions which are not strictly a part of the program of settling this present war, the boys become impatient, and their relatives are likely to become troublesome.

Not an American soldier should be brought back from France while this Nation is at war against Germany and while the peace terms are undecided, for there is danger of disputes and Hun treachery, which would surely lead to hostilities if the Huns discovered that the allies had unduly weakened their forces. The strong hand of brute force must be held over the skulking Huns until peace terms have been imposed upon them. When Germany has been brought to terms the American soldiers must be brought home, every one of them. If an American Army should be kept in Europe pending the debate on the league of nations, after it is clearly seen that peace can and should be made with Germany, a situation will be created which might well alarm the Government, for its position would not be supported by the American people. Already there is a rapid drift of sentiment toward bringing the boys home without further waiting for peace adjustments.

The twilight zone in which Americans are now living is most unwholesome. They know it is a state of technical war and practical peace. Technicality rules to the exclusion of common sense in many matters. There is a clamp upon free speech which does not harmonize with peace, and yet there are traitors and enemies who are misusing free speech to make war on the flag. This is a dangerous condition, tending to split Americans apart when they are at heart ardently desirous of the same thing, namely, true liberty. Some honest Americans have been made indignant by the suppression of free speech, while others have been made furious by enemy propagandists masquerading as martyrs to free speech.

In the business world the no-peace-no-war conditions are bad. The Government has relaxed its grip in some quarters and holds it in others. War prices prevail without war activity. Peace demands can not be met because peace conditions have not been established. All industries and all communities and all commodities are more or less firmly linked together. No one industry can "go it alone," however optimistic it may be or however badly its products may be needed. The only relief that the home Government can give is the creation of a medium for aiding industry and labor to ascertain what prices should prevail. That will do some good; but while the home Government is doing this the Paris peace conference is delaying peace in this and every country, and thereby adversely affecting industry and commerce throughout the world. So far as this situation is unavoidable all Americans are willing and able to accept the delay; but it is difficult to convince them that it is unavoidable when the only matter actually agreed upon by the peace conference is the preliminary text of a proposed league of nations to preserve a peace that has not yet been made, and regarding which there must be considerable doubt if the making of it is so tedious and so difficult.

If this so-called league of nations as set forth in the 26 articles approved by the President is accepted and indorsed by the Senate, then the majority of the foreign nations will see to it that the United States will submit to world free trade, unrestricted immigration, the abolishment of the Monroe doctrine, the change of our Constitution to meet the wants and desires of Europe, Asia, and Africa, and a permanent "entangling alliance" with every people under the sun. The Government of Washington and Lincoln is imperiled by a future peace propaganda promoted and spread abroad throughout the land by a lot of theorists and idealists, who are moved by the most pure and patriotic motives, but who do not distinguish between a league of peace, which we all indorse, and a league of nations that will entangle us in all the politics, schemes, plots, and revolutions of the rest of the world.

The people who are lovers of peace and against any future wars do not understand the President's league of nations; they approve, of course, the idea without any knowledge of its practical workings. When the plain people come to know, as they will in due time, how this Republic, with only one vote, has by the provisions of this league surrendered its independence, sovereignty, and liberty to a majority whose every interest is to exploit this Government, capture our trade, and use us to finance their projects and fight their battles, they will reject it.

In Springfield, Mass., is published a farm paper called the New England Homestead, which circulates largely through New England among the farmers and in their homes, and the editor, an honest patriot, with the best of intentions, has issued a supplement which he is sowing all over New England to-day. I have a copy here from him, on which he has written:

Mr. HERSEY: Hope you favor league of nations. I believe your constituents and our New England people generally favor it overwhelmingly.

HERBERT MYRICK.

And then this editor publishes in big headlines and display type the following:

NEW ENGLAND TAKES THE LEAD—WELCOMES PRESIDENT WILSON'S RETURN IN BEHALF OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS—EVERY MAN, WOMAN, AND CHILD IN OUR SIX STATES URGED TO WRITE THE PRESIDENT A LETTER THAT WILL AWAIT HIS ARRIVAL AT BOSTON NEXT TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 25—UNIVERSAL POPULAR SUPPORT PLEDGED TO THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS—OUR FARMERS START A MOVEMENT THAT MEANS ITS SUCCESS.

Do you wish your own folks, your local community, your State, and Nation to enjoy the blessings of freedom? If so, champion the league of nations!

Would you yourself and those following you be free from the horrors of future wars worse in every respect than the cataclysm of the past four years? Then advocate the league of nations!

Do you want a new era right here in New England that shall enable the people gradually to work out a new civilization founded upon righteousness to country and town? If so, insist upon the league of nations.

Make up your mind to use your influence in its behalf until the league of nations is created, and then to back it up with the public opinion upon which its efficiency depends.

Talk up the matter with everyone you can until they are as enthusiastically for the league as yourself.

Advocate it by letters to friends, public men, local papers, or other publications.

Every church, club, union, or other organization should adopt resolutions favoring the league.

Do it now. Don't delay. Every moment counts. Final action will be taken at Paris in a few months. It will be based largely upon the public opinion expressed by your folks this week and next.

NEW ENGLAND'S LEADERSHIP IN WORLD CRISIS.

One of the most signal honors ever received by New England will be the arrival at Boston February 25 of the President of the United States direct from the peace conference, and his address giving to the American people a first-hand official statement of the proposed league of nations.

Boston and New England are preparing to observe fitly this unique occasion. Never again in all history will New England have the chance to do so much for the world, for America, and for herself as by making President Wilson's visit the means for the exhibition of New England leadership that shall go far to insure success for an efficient league of nations.

Every church service this Sunday, February 23, should by votes of all present adopt a similar resolution. Minister and priest may properly preach upon this topic. Make it a league of nations Sunday—for the golden rule among nations as between men.

Every gathering of people between now and February 24, inclusive, should discuss the subject and adopt resolutions—schools, clubs, unions, granges, chambers of commerce, lodges, etc. Where feasible a special meeting of the organization should be called for action.

A MILLION PERSONAL LETTERS.

Above all, and more important than all else, let each person in New England—man or woman, boy or girl—write a short personal letter to the President at Boston welcoming him to New England and pledging support for the league idea. Address the envelope, "President Wilson, Boston, Mass." Begin the letter informally, "Dear Mr. President." Each letter may be signed by all the members of the writer's family who may be at home, from grandparents down to baby, with age after each name to show its genuineness.

All votes, resolutions, letters, etc., should be mailed in time to reach President Wilson at Boston in the morning of February 25, suggestions for such as printed herewith.

KEEN INTEREST.

Time is so short and action so imperative. The New England Homestead submitted these suggestions early in the week to the press, to organizations, and to public authorities.

Replies up to the hour of going to press with this edition indicate that a whole-souled outpouring of New England sentiment in favor of the league of nations will be the most unique greeting that awaits President Wilson's arrival in Boston. It will attract profound attention at home and abroad. Such leadership by New England will be followed favorably by Congress, throughout America, and by the world.

The President is to be in Boston on the 24th. He is to have a great reception. He is going to speak to the people of Boston, a morning paper says, not to explain the league of nations but upon the idea of a world peace which everybody approves. He tells the Senate not to discuss his league of nations until he can meet the members of the Foreign Affairs Committee at a White House dinner and explain to them in confidence this league of nations, which the people do not understand, and in the meantime the people everywhere are called upon to express their approval of something that the President alone can explain, and he will only give this information to a few under the pledge of secrecy.

This is the kind of propaganda that is being spread and disseminated all over this country to-day in favor of a league of nations. The meaning of its articles is not now to be made public by the President, and which the people of this Nation do not understand, but the boy or girl, as well as the baby, are all expected to write a letter to the President saying, "We favor the league of nations that you are bringing from Europe to America."

The time has come when this Congress should carefully study this so-called league of nations and adopt it if it retains our Constitution, our form of Government and Americanism upon this continent. If it does not, we should reject it; and in the meantime we should insist on a treaty of peace and not delay it by proposing a future league of nations to preserve a peace that has not yet been made after three long months. [Applause.]

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, let me inquire as to how the time stands. I have lost track of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina has used an hour and 44 minutes and the gentleman from Iowa an hour and 48 minutes.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON].

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to request leave to revise and extend my remarks and to insert therein an extract from a speech delivered by J. S. Black in the Milligan case.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, I would like also to extend my remarks by inserting in the RECORD correspondence between HENRY CABOT LODGE and myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman also asks unanimous consent to insert in his remarks certain correspondence indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The correspondence is as follows:

SEPTEMBER 12, 1919.

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In your speech of the 23d ultimo you are reported to have said: "We have set aside, for the time being, the Constitution." I know it would afford much comfort and consolation to many Members of the Senate and House to be able to agree with this statement, and I am therefore taking the liberty to ask you just when, how, and in what manner this was done. Thanking you for the courtesy of a reply at your earliest convenience, I remain,

Yours, very truly,

(Signed) WILLIAM GORDON.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
September 13, 1918.

Hon. WILLIAM GORDON,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. GORDON: I said in my speech "We have set aside for the time being the Constitution," which I believe to be an exact statement of the truth. I have never heard anyone dispute the fact that both in legislation and administration we have transcended the limitations of the Constitution as universally observed and admitted in the normal times of peace. This has been done under the war power of the Constitution as to the extent of which there is much honest difference of opinion, but there can be no doubt of the general proposition that under the war power we have gone beyond the recognized limits of the Constitution in time of peace. It may be properly said that acting under the war power we have set the Constitution aside constitutionally, but we have none the less set it aside. If the Senate or House suspends a rule for the time being, they set it aside. I did not say we had violated the Constitution, nor had taken unconstitutional action. I said that we had set the Constitution aside for the time being. That is exactly what we have done, and if we had not done it we could not have passed many of the war measures for all of which I believe I voted.

Very truly, yours,

H. C. LODGE.

SEPTEMBER 16, 1918.

Hon. H. C. LODGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have your letter of the 13th instant repeating the statement made in your speech, "We have set aside, for the time being, the Constitution," and then you add that we have done this "constitutionally" without citing any provision in the Constitution under which it was done. Instead of answering my inquiry you suggest others which are quite as impossible to answer. You and I and every other Senator and Representative have taken a solemn oath to "support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter, so help me God." If, in time of war, when the people need and require the limitations and guaranties of a written constitution more than at any other time, Congress may "set it aside," then it is nothing more than another "scrap of paper" and our oath of office is the same thing. In Ex parte Milligan, Seventy-first United States, page 120, the Supreme Court of the United States placed the seal of judicial condemnation upon this heresy in language too clear to be misunderstood, in the following language: "The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men at all times and under all circumstances. No doctrine involving more pernicious consequences was ever invented by the wit of man than that any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of government. Such a doctrine leads directly to anarchy or despotism, but the theory of necessity on which it is based is false, for the Government within the Constitution has all the powers granted to it which are necessary to preserve its existence, as has been happily proved by the result of the great effort to throw off its just authority." May I again request that you answer the questions propounded in my first letter or retract publicly what I believe to be a dangerous heresy?

Yours, truly, WILLIAM GORDON.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to invite the attention of the House to a subject which has been generally discussed in the past year or two and which is generally known and referred to as military necessity in time of war.

MILITARY NECESSITY AND THE DUTY OF PUBLIC OFFICIALS IN TIME OF WAR.

A state of war, declared or recognized to exist, by joint resolution of the Congress of the United States adds enormously to the burdens and responsibilities of Senators and Representatives, but does not relieve them from any official obligation. So many errors and mistakes, the kinds that are worse than crimes, are prevalent that they ought to be corrected.

Shortly after our declaration of war it was proposed to enact into law a measure to muzzle the press and stifle free speech.

The constitutional inhibition, "Congress shall pass no law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press," was invoked against it. We were old that "we are at war and the Constitution is suspended." This idea did not originate among ignorant men, nor was it confined to the least intelligent Members of Congress.

Leaders in both branches boldly advanced it as an excuse for some of their votes without calling forth a public protest from anyone.

No one has undertaken to say just how, when, by what authority, or in what manner this has been done, and Members of Congress thereby released from the obligation assumed by their oath of office. It was such a "comforting" suggestion to many Members whose consciences pricked them because of votes they had cast that they eagerly seized upon it as an excuse for official misconduct which could not be defended in any other way.

Last summer, in a man hunt in a search for those who were unlawfully evading military service imposed by the draft law, many thousands of innocent men were arrested and imprisoned upon orders from the War Department until they were able to prove their innocence of crime or otherwise convince their captors that they ought not to be longer detained.

These arrests were made without any warrant or authority of law, and the instruments used were local policemen, United States soldiers, and private citizens.

The Attorney General of the United States, while approving these unlawful arrests, says that the use of soldiers and civilians as instruments was unlawful.

Just how regular policemen can be used to make unlawful arrests without violating the Constitution and laws of the country the Attorney General does not explain, but he leaves the public to infer that the use of police officers in some mysterious way consecrates and renders lawful these unlawful assaults.

The prohibition in the Constitution against unlawful seizure of the bodies of our citizens and against the issue of warrants for arrests, except upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation particularly describing the persons to be seized, renders the arrests made by these policemen quite as unlawful and much more humiliating and outrageous than those made by soldiers and civilians.

All were equally unlawful, but when a citizen is taken into custody by a uniformed police officer there always exists an added presumption that he is guilty of crime, which would not obtain if the unlawful arrest were made by a citizen or even by a soldier. The excuse given for this lawless raid upon thousands of law-abiding citizens is that throughout the United States there were many thousands of men between the ages of 21 and 31 who were unlawfully evading military service, and thereby injuring the morale of the men in our armies—that is, military necessity. Every crime against humanity, international law, and in violation of its treaties committed by the military authorities of Germany since July, 1914, Germany has tried to justify on the ground of military necessity.

One of the worst consequences of war is the spirit of lawlessness it breeds, not only among the body of the people, but among those clothed with official authority who are pledged by the most solemn oath to obey and enforce the laws and defend and protect the rights of the citizen as well.

Willful disregard of the constitutional and lawful rights of the people as a whole, and of those of the individual citizen, when practiced, permitted, and indulged by high public officials, furnishes an incentive to lawlessness and crime which, if permitted to continue unrebuked, will result in making crime and criminals not only tolerable but respectable in the eyes of the average citizen. This will inevitably lead to such civic decadence and disregard for law as will ultimately destroy this Republic.

We were told by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], in the debate on the revenue bill, when some of its provisions were challenged as in conflict with the Constitution: "The Constitution is being defended by the American soldiers over on the old Hindenburg line," and he added further that the people were fretful and dissatisfied because of excessive taxes and not willing that subjects of taxation, which had always been recognized as exempt by the courts, even in time of war, should now be allowed to escape.

He assured Members of the House that they were not called upon to give any consideration to questions of conflict between the measure they were passing and the organic law of the Republic, which all had taken a solemn oath to "support and defend against all enemies, foreign and domestic." The disposition on the part of those in high official position to disregard the prerogative of Congress was further illustrated by the recent address of the President of the United States to the United States Senate in support of a joint resolution then pending therein providing for woman suffrage by action of the Congress and the legislatures of the several States upon the ground that the same is a "war measure." Because States like New Jersey and Ohio have rejected woman suffrage by a vote of their people on propositions to amend their State constitutions, it is now proposed to force it upon them by the votes of Congress and the legislatures of the other States. It may be to that extent called a "war measure," but it certainly is not designed to make war upon the public enemy but upon certain States the people of which have refused to amend their constitutions in respect of the suffrage upon the demand of outsiders.

The contention that "military" or "State" necessity in time of war will justify or excuse Congress in enacting legislation in violation of the Constitution is naturally and logically followed by the contention that because the President is Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy he should be permitted to determine the "military necessity" of legislation by Congress; this clearly amounts to an entire abandonment by Congress of its constitutional function and a repudiation by the Members of their oath of office. These wild and lawless fallacies were distinctly repudiated by the Supreme Court of the United States in the well-known case of Ex parte Milligan, Seventy-first United States, page 120, United States Supreme Court Reports, in which the court said:

"The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men at all times and under all circumstances. No doctrine involving more pernicious consequences was ever invented by the wit of man than that any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of government. Such a doctrine leads directly to anarchy or despotism, but the theory of necessity on which it is based is false, for the Government within the Constitution has all the powers granted to it which are necessary to preserve its existence, as has been happily proved by the result of the great effort to throw off its just authority."

Here we have the seal of judicial condemnation placed upon this dangerous heresy by the highest court in the land, in a case in which the precise question was presented for determination.

Three private citizens of Indiana who were not in the Army or Navy were arrested during the Civil War upon the order of Gen. Hovey, who had charge of the military district which included that State; the men were charged with disloyalty and were taken before a military commission, tried, and sentenced to be hung; they sued out a writ of habeas corpus in the United States circuit court, alleging that the military commission was without jurisdiction to try them for the offense charged or any other. It was contended that because the country was at war the constitutional provision which provided that persons not in the Army or Navy could only be tried for crime by a civil court and jury was suspended, and the court answered that contention in the negative and in the language I have quoted.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. What war was that?

Mr. GORDON. The Civil War.

The leading counsel for the relators in this famous case was Judge Jeremiah S. Black, who, after a general discussion of the history of the case and of the origin and reasons for jury trial in criminal cases, together with the constitutional provisions securing the same to all citizens, said:

"There is another quasi-political argument—necessity. If the law was violated because it could not be obeyed, that might be an excuse. But no absolute compulsion is pretended here. These commissioners acted, at most, under what they regarded as a moral necessity. The choice was left them to obey the law or disobey it. The disobedience was only necessary as means to an end which they thought desirable; and now they assert that though these means are unlawful and wrong, they are made right, because without them the object could not be accomplished; in other words, the end justifies the means. There you have a rule of conduct denounced by all law, human and divine, as being pernicious in policy and false in morals. See how it applies to this case. Here were three men whom it was desirable to remove out of this world, but there was no proof on which any court would take their lives; therefore it was necessary, and, being necessary, it was right and proper, to create an illegal tribunal which would put them to death without proof. By the same mode of reasoning you can prove it equally right to poison them in their food or stab them in their sleep.

"Nothing that the worst men ever propounded has produced so much oppression, misgovernment, and suffering as this pretense of State necessity. A great authority calls it 'the tyrant's devilish plea'; and the common honesty of all mankind has branded it with everlasting infamy.

"Of course, it is mere absurdity to say that these relators were necessarily deprived of their right to a fair and legal trial, for the record shows that a court of competent jurisdiction was sitting at the very time and in the same town, where justice would have been done without sale, denial, or delay. But concede, for the argument's sake, that a trial by jury was wholly impossible; admit that there was an absolute, overwhelming, imperious necessity operating so as literally to compel every act which the commissioners did, would that give their sentence of death the validity and force of a legal judgment pronounced by an ordained and established court? The question answers itself. This trial was a violation of law, and no necessity could be more than a mere excuse for those who committed it. If the commissioners were on trial for murder or conspiracy to murder, they might plead necessity if the fact were true, just as they would plead insanity or anything else to show that their guilt was not willful. But we are now considering the legal effect of their decision, and that depends on their legal authority to make it. They had no such authority; they usurped a jurisdiction which the law not only did not give them but expressly forbade them to exercise, and it follows that their act is void, whatever may have been the real or supposed excuse for it.

"If these commissioners, instead of aiming at the life and liberty of the relators, had attempted to deprive them of their property by a sentence of confiscation, would any court in Christendom declare that such a sentence divested the title? Or would a person claiming under the sentence make his right any better by showing that the illegal assumption of jurisdiction was accompanied by some excuse which might save the commissioners from a criminal prosecution?

"Let me illustrate still further. Suppose you, the judges of this court, to be surrounded in the hall where you are sitting by a body of armed insurgents, and compelled by main force to pronounce sentence of death upon the President of the United States for some act of his upon which you have no legal authority to adjudicate. There would be a valid sentence if necessity alone could create jurisdiction. But could the President be legally executed under it? No; the compulsion under which you acted would be a good defense for you against an impeachment or an indictment for murder, but it would add nothing to the validity of a judgment which the law forbade you to give.

"That a necessity for violating the law is nothing more than a mere excuse to the perpetrator, and does not in any legal sense change the quality of the act itself in its operation upon other parties, is a proposition too plain on original principles to need the aid of authority. I do not see how any man of common sense is to stand up and dispute it. But there is decisive authority upon the point. In 1815, at New Orleans, Gen. Jackson took upon himself the command of every person in the city, suspended the functions of all the civil authorities, and made his own will for a time the only rule of conduct. It was believed to be absolutely necessary. Judges, officers of the city corporation, and members of the State legislature insisted on it as the only way to save the 'booty and beauty' of the place from the unspeakable outrages committed at Badajos and St. Sebastian by the very same troops then marching to the attack. Jackson used the power thus taken by him moderately, sparingly, benignly, and only for the purpose of preventing mutiny in his camp. A single mutineer was restrained by a short confinement, and another was sent 4 miles up the river. But after he had saved the city and the danger was all over he stood before the court to be tried by the law; his conduct was decided to be illegal by the same judge who had declared it to be necessary, and he paid the penalty without a murmur. The Supreme Court of Louisiana, in Johnson v. Duncan, decided that everything done during the siege in pursuance of martial rule, but in conflict with the law of the land, was void and of none effect, without reference to the circumstances which made it necessary. Long afterwards the fine imposed upon Jackson was refunded, because his friends, while they admitted him to have violated the law, insisted that the necessity which drove him to it ought to have saved him from the punishment due only to a willful offender.

"The learned counsel on the other side will not assert that there was war at Indianapolis in 1864, for they have read Coke's Institute, and Judge Grier's opinion in the prize cases, and, of course, they know it to be a settled rule that war can not be said to exist where the civil courts are open. They will not set up the absurd plea of necessity, for they are well aware that it would not be true in point of fact. They will hardly take the ground that any kind of necessity could give legal validity to that which the law forbids.

"This, therefore, must be their position: That although there was no war at the place where this commission sat, and no actual necessity for it, yet if there was a war anywhere else, to which the United States were a party, the technical effect of such war was to take the jurisdiction away from the civil courts and transfer it to Army officers.

"Gen. BUTLER. We do not take that position.

"Mr. BLACK. Then they can take no ground at all, for nothing else is left. I do not wonder to see them recoil from their own doctrine when its nakedness is held up to their eyes. But they must stand upon that or give up their cause. They may not state their proposition precisely as I state it; that is too plain a way of putting it. But, in substance, it is their doctrine—has been the doctrine of the Attorney General's office ever since the advent of the present incumbent—and is the doctrine of their brief printed and filed in this case. What else can they say? They will admit that the Constitution is not altogether without a meaning; that at a time of universal peace it imposes some kind of obligation upon those who swear to support it. If no war existed, they would not deny the exclusive jurisdiction of the civil courts in criminal cases. How, then, did the military get jurisdiction in Indiana?

"All men who hold the Attorney General's opinion to be true, answer the question I have put by saying that military jurisdiction comes from the mere existence of war; and it comes in Indiana only as the legal result of a war which is going on in Mississippi, Tennessee, or South Carolina. The Constitution is repealed, or its operation suspended, in one State because there is war in another. The courts are open, the organization of society is intact, the judges are on the bench, and their process is not impeded, but their jurisdiction is gone. Why? Because, say our opponents, war exists, and the silent, legal, technical operation of that fact is to deprive all American citizens of their right to a fair trial.

"That class of jurists and statesmen who hold that the trial by jury is lost to the citizen during the existence of war carry out their doctrine theoretically and practically to its ultimate consequences. The right of trial by jury being gone, all other rights are gone with it; therefore a man may be arrested without an accusation and kept in prison during the pleasure of his captors; his papers may be searched without a warrant; his property may be confiscated behind his back, and he has no earthly means of redress. Nay, an attempt to get a just remedy is construed as a new crime. He dare not even complain, for the right of free speech is gone with the rest of his rights. If you sanction that doctrine, what is to be the consequence? I do not speak of what is past and gone; but in the case of a future war what results will follow from your decision indorsing the Attorney General's views? They are very obvious. At the instant when the war begins, our whole system of legal government will tumble into ruin, and if we are not all robbed, and kidnapped, and hanged, and drawn, and quartered, we will owe our immunity, not to the Constitution and laws, but to the mere mercy or policy of those persons who may then happen to control the organized physical force of the country.

"This certainly puts us in a most precarious condition; we must have war about half the time, do what we may to avoid it. The President or Congress can wantonly provoke a war whenever it suits the purpose of either to do so, and they can keep it going as long as they please, even after the actual conflict of arms is over. When peace woos them they can ignore her existence, and thus they can make war a chronic condition of the country and the slavery of the people perpetual. Nay, we are at the mercy of any foreign potentate who may envy us the possession of those liberties which we boast of so much; he can shatter our Constitution without striking a single blow or bringing a gun to bear upon us. A simple declaration of hostilities is more terrible to us than an army with banners.

"To me this seems the wildest delusion that ever took possession of a human brain. If there be one principle of political ethics more universally acknowledged than another, it is that war, and especially civil war, can be justified only when it is undertaken to vindicate and uphold the legal and constitutional rights of the people, not to trample them down. He who carries on a system of wholesale slaughter for any other purpose must stand without excuse before God or man. In a time of war, more than at any other time, public liberty is in the hands of the public officers. And she is there in double trust; first, as they are citizens and therefore bound to defend her by the common obligation of all citizens; and, next, as they are her special guardians—

> "Who should against her murderers shut the door,
> Nor bare the knife themselves.

"The opposing argument, when turned into plain English, means this, and this only: That when the Constitution is attacked upon one side its official guardians may assail it upon the other; when rebellion strikes it in the face they may take advantage of the blindness produced by the blow to sneak behind it and stab it in the back.

"The convention when it framed the Constitution, and the people when they adopted it, could have had no thought like that. If they had supposed that it would operate only while perfect peace continued, they certainly would have given us some other rule to go by in time of war; they would not have left us to wander about in a howling wilderness of anarchy without a lamp to our feet or a guide to our path. Another thing proves their actual intent still more strikingly. They required that every man in any kind of public employment, State or National, civil or military, should swear, without reserve or qualification, that he would support the Constitution. Surely our ancestors had too much regard for the moral and religious welfare of their posterity to impose upon them an oath like that if they intended and expected it to be broken half the time. The oath of an officer to support the Constitution is as simple as that of a witness to tell the truth in a court of justice. What would you think of a witness who should attempt to justify perjury upon the ground that he had testified when civil war was raging and he thought that by swearing to a lie he might promote some public or private object connected with the strife?

"No, no; the great men who made this country what it is—the heroes who won her independence and the statesmen who settled her institutions—had no such notions in their minds. Washington deserved the lofty praise bestowed upon him by the President of Congress when he resigned his commission—that he had always regarded the rights of the civil authority through all changes and through all disasters. When his duty as President afterward required him to arm the public force to suppress a rebellion in western Pennsylvania he never thought that the Constitution was abolished, by virtue of that fact, in New Jersey or Maryland or Virginia. It would have been a dangerous experiment for an adviser of his at that time, or at any time, to propose that he should deny a citizen his right to be tried by a jury and substitute in place of it a trial before a tribunal composed of men elected by himself from among his own creatures and dependents. You can well imagine how that great heart would have swelled with indignation at the bare thought of such an insulting outrage upon the liberty and law of his country.

"In the War of 1812 the man emphatically called the Father of the Constitution was the supreme Executive Magistrate. Talk of perilous times! There was the severest trial this Union ever saw. That was no half-organized rebellion on the one side of the conflict to be crushed by the hostile millions and unbounded resources of the other. The existence of the Nation was threatened by the most formidable military and naval power then upon the face of the earth. Every town upon the northern frontier, upon the Atlantic seaboard, and upon the Gulf coast was in daily and hourly danger. The enemy had penetrated the heart of Ohio. New York, Pennsylvania, and Virginia were all of them threatened from the west as well as the east. This Capitol was taken, and burned, and pillaged, and every member of the Federal administration was a fugitive before the invading army. Meanwhile, party spirit was breaking out into actual treason all over New England. Four of those States refused to furnish a man or a dollar even for their own defense. Their public authorities were plotting the dismemberment of the Union, and individuals among them were burning blue lights up on the coast as a signal to the enemy's ships. But in all this storm of disaster, with foreign war in his front and domestic treason on his flank, Madison gave out no sign that he would aid Old England and New England to break up this Government of laws. On the contrary, he and all his supporters, though compassed round with darkness and with danger, stood faithfully between the Constitution and its enemies—

> "To shield it, and save it, or perish there, too.

"The framers of the Constitution and all their contemporaries died and were buried; their children succeeded them and continued on the stage of public affairs until they, too—

> "Lived out their lease of life, and paid their breath
> To time and mortal custom:

and a third generation was already far on its way to the grave before this monstrous doctrine was conceived or thought of that public officials all over the country might disregard their oaths whenever a war or a rebellion was commenced.

"Our friends on the other side are quite conscious that when they deny the binding obligation of the Constitution they must put some other system of law in its place. Their brief gives notice that while the Constitution and the acts of Congress and Magna Charta and the common law and all the rules of natural justice shall remain under foot they will try American citizens according to the law of nations! But the law of nations takes no notice of the subject. If that system did contain a special provision that a Government might hang one of its own citizens without judge or jury, it would still be competent for the American people to say, as they have said, that no such thing should ever be done here. That is my answer to the law of nations.

"But then they tell us that the laws of war must be treated as paramount. Here they become mysterious. Do they mean that code of public law which defines the duties of two belligerent parties to one another and regulates the intercourse of neutrals with both? If yes, then it is simply a recurrence to the law of nations, which has nothing on earth to do with the subject. Do they mean that portion of our municipal code which defines our duties to the Government in war as well as in peace? Then they are speaking of the Constitution and laws, which declare in plain words that the Government owes every citizen a fair legal trial as much as the citizen owes obedience to the Government. They are in search of an argument under difficulties. When they appeal to international law, it is silent, and when they interrogate the law of the land the answer is an unequivocal contradiction of their whole theory.

"The Attorney General tells us that all persons whom he and his associates choose to denounce for giving aid to the rebellion are to be treated as being themselves a part of the rebellion—they are public enemies—and therefore they may be punished without being found guilty by a competent court or a jury. This convenient rule would outlaw every citizen the moment he is charged with a political offense. But political offenders are precisely the class of persons who most need the protection of a court and jury, for the prosecutions against them are most likely to be unfounded both in fact and in law. Whether innocent or guilty, to accuse is to convict them before the ignorant and bigoted men who generally sit in military courts. But this court decided in the prize cases that all who live in the enemy's territory are public enemies, without regard to their personal sentiments or conduct; and the converse of the proposition is equally true—that all who reside inside of our own territory are to be treated as under the protection of the law. If they help the enemy, they are criminals, but they can not be punished without legal conviction.

"You have heard much—and you will hear more very soon—concerning the natural and inherent right of the Government to defend itself without regard to law. This is wholly fallacious. In a despotism the autocrat is unrestricted in the means he may use for the defense of his authority against the opposition of his own subjects or others; and that is precisely what makes him a despot. But in a limited monarchy the prince must confine himself to a legal defense of his government. If he goes beyond that and commits aggressions on the rights of the people, he breaks the social compact, releases his subjects from all their obligations to him, renders himself liable to be hurled from his throne and dragged to the block or driven into exile. This principle was sternly enforced in the cases of Charles I and James II, and we have it announced on the highest official authority here that the Queen of England can not ring a little bell on her table and cause a man by her arbitrary order to be arrested under any pretense whatever. If that be true there, how much more true must it be here, where we have no personal sovereign and where our only government is the Constitution and laws. A violation of law, on pretense of saving such a government as ours, is not self-preservation but suicide.

"Salus populi suprema est lex. Observe it is not salus regis; the safety of the people, not the safety of the ruler, is the supreme law. When those who hold the authority of the Government in their hands behave in such manner as to put the liberties and rights of the people in jeopardy, the people may rise against them and overthrow them without regard to that law which requires obedience to them. The maxim is revolutionary, and expresses simply the right to resist tyranny without regard to prescribed forms. It can never be used to stretch the powers of government against the people.

"If this Government of ours has no power to defend itself without violating our own laws, it carries the seeds of destruction in its own bosom; it is a poor, weak, blind, staggering thing, and the sooner it tumbles over the better. But it has a most efficient legal mode of protecting itself against all possible danger. It is clothed from head to foot in a complete panoply of defensive armor. What are the perils which may threaten its existence? I am not able at this moment to think of more than these which I am about to mention: Foreign invasion, domestic insurrection, mutiny in the Army and Navy, corruption in the civil administration, and last, but not least, criminal violations of its laws committed by individuals among the body of the people. Have we not a legal mode of defense against all these? Yes; military force repels invasion and suppresses insurrection; you preserve discipline in the Army and Navy by means of courts-martial; you preserve the purity of the civil adminstration by impeaching dishonest magistrates; and crimes are prevented and punished by the regular judicial authorities. You are not merely compelled to use these weapons against your enemies because the yand they only are justified by the law; you ought to use them because they are more efficient than any other and less liable to be abused.

"There is another view of the subject which settles all controversy about it. No human being in this country ca . exercise any kind of public authority which is not conferred by law; and under the United States it must be given by the express words of a written statute. Whatever is not so given is withheld, and the exercise of it is positively prohibited. Courts-martial in the Army and Navy are authorized; they are legal institutions; their jurisdiction is limited and their whole code of procedure is regulated by act of Congress. Upon the civil courts all the jurisdiction they have or can have is bestowed by law, and if one of them goes beyond what is written its action is ultra vires and void. But a military commission is not a court-martial and it is not a civil court. It is not governed by the law which is made for either, and has no law of its own. Within the last five years we have seen for the first time self-constituted tribunals not only assuming power which the law did not give them but thrusting aside the regular courts to which the power was exclusively given.

"What is the consequence? This terrible authority is wholly undefined and its exercise is without any legal control. Undelegated power is always unlimited. The field that lies outside of the Constitution and laws has no boundary. Thierry, the French historian of England, says that when the crown and scepter were offered to Cromwell he hesitated for several days and answered: 'Do not make me a king, for then my hands will be tied up by the laws which define the duties of that office, but make me protector of the commonwealth, and I can do what I please; no statute restraining and limiting the royal prerogative will apply to me.' So these commissions have no legal origin and no legal name by which they are known among the children of men, no law applies to them, and they exercise all power for the paradoxical reason that none belongs to them rightfully.

"Ask the Attorney General what rules apply to military commissions in the exercise of their assumed authority over civilians. Come, Mr. Attorney, 'gird up thy loins now like a man; I will demand of thee and thou shalt declare unto me if thou hast understanding.' How is a military commission organized? What shall be the number and rank of its members? What offenses come within its jurisdiction? What is its code of procedure? How shall witnesses be compelled to attend it? Is it perjury for a witness to swear falsely? What is the function of the judge advocate? Does he tell the members how they must find or does he only persuade them to convict? Is he the agent of the Government, to command them what evidence they shall admit and what sentence they shall pronounce, or does he always carry his point, right or wrong, by the mere force of eloquence and ingenuity? What is the nature of their punishment? May they confiscate property and levy fines as well as imprison and kill? In addition to strangling their victim, may they also deny him the last consolations of religion and refuse his family the melancholy privilege of giving him a decent grave?

"To none of these questions can the Attorney General make a reply, for there is no law on the subject. He will not attempt to 'darken counsel by words without knowledge,' and therefore, like Job, he can only lay his hand upon his mouth and keep silence.

"The power exercised through those military commissions is not only unregulated by law but it is incapable of being so regulated. What is it that you claim, Mr. Attorney? I will give you a definition the correctness of which you will not attempt to gainsay. You assert the right of the executive government, without the intervention of the judiciary, to capture, imprison, and kill any person to whom that government or its paid dependents may choose to impute an offense. This, in its very essence, is despotic and lawless. It is never claimed or tolerated except by those governments which deny the restraints of all law. It has been exercised by the great and small oppressors of mankind ever since the days of Nimrod. It operates in different ways; the tools it uses are not always the same; it hides its hideous features under many disguises; it assumes every variety of form:

> "It can change shapes with Proteus for advantages,
> And set the murderous Machiavel to school.

"But in all its mutations of outward appearance it is still identical in principle, object, and origin. It is always the same great engine of despotism which Hamilton described it to be.

"Under the old French monarchy the favorite fashion of it was a lettre de cachet, signed by the king, and this would consign the party to a loathsome dungeon until he died, forgotten by all the world. An imperial ukase will answer the same purpose in Russia. The most faithful subject of that amiable autocracy may lie down in the evening to dream of his future prosperity and before daybreak he will find himself between two dragoons on his way to the mines of Siberia. In Turkey the verbal order of the Sultan or any of his powerful favorites will cause a man to be tied up in a sack and cast into the Bosphorus. Nero accused Peter and Paul of spreading a 'pestilent superstition,' which they called the Gospel. He heard their defense in person and sent them to the cross. Afterward he tried the whole Christian church in one body on a charge of setting fire to the city, and he convicted them, though he knew not only that they were innocent but that he himself had committed the crime. The judgment was followed by instant execution; he let loose the Prætorian guards upon men, women, and children to drown, butcher, and burn them. Herod saw fit, for good political reasons closely affecting the permanence of his reign in Judea, to punish certain possible traitors in Bethlehem by anticipation. This required the death of all the children in that city under 2 years of age. He issued his 'general order,' and his provost marshal carried it out with so much alacrity and zeal that in one day the whole land was filled with mourning and lamentation.

"Macbeth understood the whole philosophy of the subject. He was an unlimited monarch. His power to punish for any offense or for no offense at all was as broad as that which the Attorney General claims for himself and his brother officers under the United States. But he was more cautious how he used it. He had a dangerous rival, from whom he apprehended the most serious peril to the 'life of his government.' The necessity to get rid of him was plain enough, but he could not afford to shock the moral sense of the world by pleading political necessity for a murder. He must—

"Mask the business from the common eye.

"Accordingly he sent for two enterprising gentlemen, whom he took into his service upon liberal pay—'made love to their assistance'—and got them to deal with the accused party. He acted as his own judge advocate. He made a most elegant and stirring speech to persuade his agents that Banquo was their oppressor and had 'held them so under fortune' that he ought to die for that alone. When they agreed that he was their enemy, then said the king:

"So is he mine, and though I could
With barefaced power sweep him from my sight
And bid my will avouch it; yet I must not,
For certain friends, who are both his and mine,
Whose loves I may not drop.

"For these, and 'many weighty reasons' besides, he thought it best to commit the execution of his design to a subordinate agency. The commission thus organized in Banquo's case sat upon him that very night, at a convenient place beside the road where it was known he would be traveling; and they did precisely what the Attorney General says the military officers may do in this country—they took and killed him because their employer, at the head of the government, wanted it done and paid them for doing it out of the public treasury.

"But of all the persons that ever wielded this kind of power, the one who went most directly to the purpose and object of it was Lola Montez. She reduced it to the elementary principle. In 1848, when she was minister and mistress to the King of Bavaria, she dictated all the measures of the Government. The times were troublesome. All over Germany the spirit of rebellion was rising; everywhere the people wanted to see a first-class revolution, like that which had just exploded in France. Many persons in Bavaria disliked to be governed so absolutely by a lady of the character which Lola Montez bore, and some of them were rash enough to say so. Of course, that was treason, and she went about to punish it in the simplest of all possible ways. She bought herself a pack of English bulldogs, trained to tear the flesh and mangle the limbs and lap the life-blood, and with these dogs at her heels she marched up and down the streets of Munich with a most majestic tread and with a sense of power which any judge advocate in America might envy. When she saw any person whom she chose to denounce for 'thwarting the Government' or 'using disloyal language' her obedient followers needed but a sign to make them spring at the throat of their victim. It gives me unspeakable pleasure to tell you the sequel. The people rose in their strength, smashed down the whole machinery of oppression, and drove out into uttermost shame king, strumpet, dogs, and all. From that time to this neither man, woman, nor beast has dared to worry or kill the people of Bavaria.

"All these are but so many different ways of using the arbitrary power to punish. The variety is merely in the means which a tyrannical government takes to destroy those whom it is bound to protect. Everywhere it is but another construction, on the same principle, of that remorseless machine by which despotism wreaks its vengeance on those who offend it. In a civilized country it nearly always uses the military force, because that is the sharpest and surest, as well as the best-looking, instrument that can be found for such a purpose. But in none of its forms can it be introduced into this country; we have no room for it; the ground here is all preoccupied by legal and free institutions.

"Between the officers who have a power like this and the people who are liable to become its victims there can be no relation except that of master and slave. The master may be kind, and the slave may be contented in his bondage; but the man who can take your life or restrain your liberty or despoil you of your property at his discretion, either with his own hands or by means of a hired overseer, owns you, and he can force you to serve him. All you are and all you have, including your wives and children, are his property.

"If my learned and very good friend, the Attorney General, had this right of domination over me I should not be very much frightened, for I should expect him to use it as moderately as any man in all the world; but still I should feel the necessity of being very discreet. He might change in a short time. The thirst for blood is an appetite which grows by what it feeds upon. We can not know him by present appearances. Robespierre resigned a country judgeship in early life because he was too tender-hearted to pronounce sentence of death upon a convicted criminal. Caligula passed for a most amiable young gentleman before he was clothed with the imperial purple and for about eight months afterwards. It was Trajan, I think, who said that absolute power would convert any man into a wild beast, whatever was the original benevolence of his nature. If you decide that the Attorney General holds in his own hands or shares with others the power of life and death over us all, I mean to be very cautious in my intercourse with him; and I warn you, the judges whom I am now addressing, to do likewise. Trust not to the gentleness and kindness which have always marked his behavior heretofore. Keep your distance; be careful how you approach him; for you know not at what moment or by what a trifle you may rouse the sleeping tiger. Remember the injunction of Scripture: 'Go not near to the man who hath power to kill; and if thou come unto him, see that thou make no fault, lest he take away thy life presently; for thou goest among snares and walkest upon the battlements of the city.'

"The right of the executive government to kill and imprison citizens for political offenses has not been practically claimed in this country, except in cases where commissioned officers of the Army were the instruments used. Why should it be confined to them? Why should not naval officers be permitted to share in it? What is the reason that common soldiers and seamen are excluded from all participation in the business? No law has bestowed the right upon Army officers more than upon other persons. If men are to be hung up without that legal trial which the Constitution guarantees to them, why not employ commissions of clergymen, merchants, manufacturers, horse dealers, butchers, or drovers to do it? It will not be pretended that military men are better qualified to decide questions of fact or law than other classes of people, for it is known, on the contrary, that they are, as a general rule, least of all fitted to perform the duties that belong to a judge.

"The Attorney General thinks that a proceeding which takes away the lives of citizens without a constitutional trial is a most merciful dispensation. His idea of humanity as well as law is embodied in the bureau of military justice, with all its dark and bloody machinery. For that strange opinion he gives this curious reason, that the duty of the commander in chief is to kill, and unless he has this bureau and these commissions he must 'butcher' indiscriminately, without mercy or justice. I admit that if the commander in chief or any other officer of the Government has the power of an Asiatic king to butcher the people at pleasure he ought to have somebody to aid him in selecting his victims, as well as to do the rough work of strangling and shooting. But if my learned friend will only condescend to cast an eye upon the Constitution, he will see at once that all the executive and military officers are completely relieved by the provision that the life of a citizen shall not be taken at all until after legal conviction by a court and jury.

"You can not help but see that military commissions, if suffered to go on, will be used for most pernicious purposes. I have criticized none of their past proceedings nor made any allusion to their history in the last five years. But what can be the meaning of this effort to maintain them among us? Certainly not to punish actual guilt. All the ends of true justice are attained by the prompt, speedy, impartial trial which the courts are bound to give. Is there any danger that crime will be winked upon by the judges? Does anybody pretend that courts and juries have less ability to decide upon facts and law than the men who sit in military tribunals? The counsel in this cause will not insult you by even hinting such an opinion. What righteous or just purpose, then, can they serve? None whatever.

"But, while they are utterly powerless to do even a shadow of good, they will be omnipotent to trample upon innocence, to gag the truth, to silence patriotism, and crush the liberties of the country. They will always be organized to convict, and the conviction will follow the accusation as surely as night follows the day. The Government, of course, will accuse none before such a commission except those whom it predetermines to ruin and destroy. The accuser can choose the judges, and will certainly select those who are known to be the most ignorant, the most unprincipled, and the most ready to do whatever may please the power which gives them pay, promotion, and plunder. The willing witness can be found as easily as the superserviceable judge. The treacherous spy and the base informer—those loathsome wretches who do their lying by the job—will stock such a market with abundant perjury, for the authorities that employ them will be bound to protect as well as reward them. A corrupt and tyrannical government with such an engine at its command will shock the world with the enormity of its crimes. Plied, as it may be, by the arts of a malignant priesthood and urged on by the madness of a raving crowd, it will be worse than the popish plot or the French Revolution— it will be a combination of both, with Fouquier-Tinville on the bench and Titus Oates in the witness box. You can save us from this horrible fate. You alone can 'deliver us from the body of this death.' To that fearful extent is the destiny of this Nation in your hands."

In this argument Judge Black lays bare many of the rotten arguments that have been made since this war started. The idea that the Constitution is suspended in time of war carried to its logical conclusion will justify every unlawful act that the Kaiser and the military authorities of Germany have committed since this war commenced, and the men who are clamoring now for the arrest and execution of the Kaiser for violating international law are the very ones who claim that the officials of the United States Government are not bound by their own Constitution, which every official from the President down to a constable is required to take an oath to support, and which Members of Congress especially take an oath to support and protect and defend against all enemies, foreign and domestic.

And it does seem to me gentlemen, realizing the logic of their own argument and where it leads—to the reign of anarchy, tyranny, and lawlessness, exactly as the Supreme Court has said—should refrain from presenting that old threadbare argument that public officals are released from the obligations of their oath of office whenever the country gets into a war. [Applause.]

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROWE] five minutes.

Mr. ROWE. Mr. Chairman, we have not heard very much to-day from men representing districts in our large cities. I think just one has spoken during the afternoon, and I asked two gentlemen who were listening to him as to which side of the question he was on, and they said that they had not found out.

Now, in our districts in the big cities are the consumers, or a large proportion of the consumers, of wheat. We have heard so far from all the farming districts that produce wheat, and we ought to have something said by those who represent the large cities.

We must first consider this question that is before us in the light of the history which is involved. In 1917 we were short of food in this country, and especially short of bread. The price of flour had gone up. It was liable to reach $17, or even $20, a barrel, when a bill was passed by this House permitting the President of the United States to fix the price of wheat, not only for that year, but the year that was to follow. The President fixed that price, and we have been living since under the regulation made by the law passed by this House authorizing the President to fix the price of wheat.

The price of flour to consumers in this country has been reasonable considering the conditions. All of the families of the Nation, because of the act we passed, have, during the past year, been greatly benefited and saved much money. England did not permit its inhabitants to pay the full price of the wheat flour. The nation itself bought wheat and sold it to the consumers for less than it paid for it. We are not in debt for the past, but we are now about to pass a law which may impose upon our Nation a debt in the near future. I like this law, however; first, because it carries out the obligation of the Nation. [Applause.] I believe that the Nation which we legislate for should be as honest as we expect its citizens to be, and that if it has made a contract it should stand by that contract, even if it stands to lose. All the Members representing large cities are getting telegrams these days and many letters appealing to them not to fix the price of wheat, but to allow it to fall as the market would cause it to fall; to allow it to seek its own level. Now, I hold that this bill aids in its seeking its level, because the country, under the bill, while it must stand by its bargain and pay $2.26 a bushel for the wheat, can sell it at any price which the normal conditions warrant, even $1.26 or any other price. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BESHLIN].

Mr. BESHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BESHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to talk on the price of wheat but on a subject which perhaps is just as important.

Those opposing a league of nations overlook the fact that for the purpose of maintaining liberty and democracy and upholding the sanctity of treaties and the principles of international law there existed to all intents and purposes such an organization between the United States and her allies in the recent war against Germany and her allies.

They united upon an international policy, placed their armies and navies under single commands, and generally pooled all their supplies of food, munitions and credits. If such unity of policy, command, and purpose had existed in the summer of 1914, is it reasonable to suppose that Germany would have provoked a struggle that has drenched the world in blood? The fact that this unity of policy and command brought the war to a successful and glorious end, and thereby saved the world from the domination of Prussian militarism, is the strongest argument that can be advanced for the formation of a strong league of nations, whose powers and limitations shall be fixed and determined by the duly authorized representatives, not only of the nations opposed to the Teutonic powers in the war, but by neutrals who may desire to become members thereof.

Notwithstanding the proposal contained in a resolution introduced in another branch of this Congress "that any project for a general league of nations, or for any sweeping change in the ancient laws of the sea, as hitherto recognized as international law and violated by the Teutonic powers, should be postponed for separate consideration not alone by the victorious belligerents but by all the nations, if and when at some future time general conferences on those subjects might be deemed useful," I am of the opinion that the peace treaty can not be made without a league of nations. The peace treaty, when finally concluded, will be a pact of at least five nations, and will be signed by their duly accredited representatives.

No time should be lost in the formation of a strong league of nations, because the nations involved, as well as the neutral peoples of the world, stand aghast at the terrible losses in life, limb, and treasure caused by this great war. Now, the matter of averting future wars, with the recollections of its cost and suffering fresh and vividly in mind, is an all-absorbing topic, and the minds of the peace commissioners and of their respective peoples are open and ready to consider more intensely than heretofore or hereafter ways and means to the much-desired end.

AUTOCRACY DISCREDITED.

The kaiser, emperor, and king "business" is unpopular now. Many, as the result of this war, have quit their unstable jobs, knowing that their people, who have heretofore been denied a part in governmental affairs, will now demand what they have long been struggling to obtain.

Numerous republics, possibly from 8 to 12, will be set up in Europe. For some time they will be unstable, and the deposed rulers will seek to "come back," and they will unless a strong league of free nations stands in their way. Some of these governments may be overthrown, but following the example of the United States in Cuba, it will be the duty of the league to set them up again, and maybe a second time, until they at last become secure upon the firm foundations of free government.

These smaller nations not only will need help in the art of self-government, but will require also the means of sustaining their people through access to the markets of the world, as suggested by President Wilson in his message to Congress December 4, 1917:

Our entrance into the war has not altered our attitude toward the settlement that must come when it is over. When I said in January that the nations of the world were entitled not only to free pathways upon the sea, but also to assured and unmolested access to those pathways I was thinking, and I am thinking now, not of the smaller and weaker nations alone, which need our countenance and support, but also of the great and powerful nations, and of our present enemies, as well as our present associates in the war.

The idea of a league of nations is not new. It has been discussed for centuries. The nations represented at the Congress of Vienna more than 100 years ago, as well as those who formed the Holy Alliance at Paris on September 26, 1815, were doubtless of the opinion that such organizations were created, as disclosed by the articles agreed to.

The following recital of the Holy Alliance agreement, namely—

ARTICLE 1. Conformably to the words of the Holy Scriptures, which command all men to consider each other as brethren, the three contracting monarchs will remain united by the bonds of a true and indissoluble fraternity; and considering each other as fellow countrymen, they will, on all occasions and in all places, lend each other aid and assistance; and regarding themselves toward their subjects and armies as fathers of families, they will lead them in the same spirit of fraternity with which they are animated to protect religion, peace, and justice.

ART. 2. In consequence the sole principle in force, either between the said Governments or between their subjects, shall be that of doing each other reciprocal service, of testifying by unalterable good will the mutual affection which ought to animate them, of considering themselves all as members of one and the same Christian nation; for the three allied princes look on themselves as merely delegated by Providence to govern three branches of one family, namely, Austria, Prussia, and Russia. * * *

demonstrates that while it was a league formed ostensibly for conserving religion, justice, and peace, it nevertheless was purposely created for repressing popular tendencies toward constitutional government by autocratic rulers, namely, Francis I of Austria, Frederick William III of Prussia, and Alexander I of Russia. This league was subsequently joined in by all the other sovereigns of Europe except the Pope and the King of England.

The main purpose of such congresses and alliances was to make the world safe not for democracy but for autocracy, and for this reason they were failures.

If the attempts heretofore made to secure and promote the peace of the world had been made by the chosen representatives of free peoples instead of by mere agents of autocracies, then, indeed, we might be concerned over the outcome of the present effort.

One of the declarations adopted by the League to Enforce Peace reads as follows: "Make the world safe by the defeat of German militarism" and "Keep the world safe by a league of nations."

The first part of this declaration has been accomplished. It now remains to keep the peace of the world by a league.

The framing and subsequent adoption of the Constitution of the United Sattes marked an important step in the progress of constitutional government in this country. By its adoption civilization took another step forward. The text of the league of nations has been given to the world. Taking into consideration the issues involved, may we not truly say that the Declaration of Independence and other epochal documents are secondary to the draft of the league, because these various declarations concerned only one people, while the constitution of the proposed league affects many nations.

In writing to Patrick Henry after the Constitution of the United States had been framed Washington expressed his opinion of the convention's labors:

I wish the Constitution had been more perfect, but I sincerely believe that it is the best that could be obtained at this time.

Those who have participated in the framing of the constitution of the proposed league might properly say in like manner that it is the best that could be obtained at this time.

AMENDMENT TO LEAGUE PLANS.

As the Constitution of the United States has been amended from time to time to meet changing conditions, so it will be found necessary to amend the proposed constitution of the league in such manner as experience will demonstrate. Those opposed to the entire principle of the league, however, see no virtue in any of its provisions. Such course, however, shows no progress, and they would leave the forces that make for war where they were in 1914, ready and anxious to start another and perhaps a more fearful strife, if it were possible, on the slightest pretext. To these let me say that they are out of harmony with what is in the hearts of men and women everywhere who have suffered from the effects of war.

It has been said that "President Wilson's triumph at Paris is the more remarkable because he has had to struggle not only against all the elements of reaction in Europe, but against the most reckless and most shocking American propaganda that was ever directed against an administration engaged in foreign negotiations. This partisan propaganda took the form of a deliberate and calculated attempt to wreck the peace conference merely to discredit the President at home."

The shame of it all, because his success would be the Nation's success, his failure would mean the loss not only to America but to all of our allies of much of the fruits of victory.

Former President Taft, to whom much credit is due in the organization of the League to Enforce Peace, and who, since its purposes were announced, in speaking of the constitution of the league of nations, says:

"It is a real league. It has clinching and cinching provisions. It imposes on all the great powers and all others who enter the league a solemn covenant not to begin war until the differences have been submitted either to arbitration and award or to the executive council of the league as a concillating body. The parties covenant to obey the award if the executive council unanimously recommend a compromise; and if the party against whom it is made refuses to comply with the recommendation, the other party covenants not to go to war. Then the council may take steps to secure compliance. If a party breaks its covenant in these regards and goes to war, a complete boycott of the recalcitrant is required of all members of the league. The breach of covenant is an act of war against all the other members of the league. The executive council is then to recommend what military forces each member of the league should furnish to protect the covenants of the league. The members are to share the loss arising to any member of the league by reason of the boycott. The boycott is to prevent commerce not only between the outlaw nation and its citizens and the members of the league and their citizens, but is to be extended to prevent commerce of the outlaw and its citizens with nonmembers of the league. It is to be a complete isolation."

Article 5 provides for a permanent secretariat at a place to be agreed upon, which shall constitute the seat of the league. Article 2 provides for meetings of the body of delegates at stated intervals and from time to time as occasion may require, and article 3 for the executive council and its meetings from time to time as occasion may require, and at least once a year. We therefore see that a permanent court is provided and its meetings fixed as definitely as can be determined in advance, so that differences may be referred for hearing and determination.

Article 12, which read as follows—

The high contracting parties agree that should disputes arise between them which can not be adjusted by the ordinary processes of diplomacy, they will in no case resort to war without previously submitting the question and matters involved either to arbitration or to inquiry by the executive council and until three months after the award by the arbitrators or a recommendation by the executive council; and that they will not even then resort to war as against a member of the league which complies with the award of the arbitrators or the recommendation of the executive council. In any case under this article the award of the arbitrators shall be made within a reasonable time, and the recommendation of the executive council shall be made within six months after the submission of the dispute, contains the provisions requiring submission of disputes to arbitration or to inquiry in the manner indicated.

In the limits of my remarks on this subject it is impossible to discuss all of the provisions of this plan. Suffice it to say, however, that it does present a comprehensive platform for the maintenance of the peace of the world.

OBJECTIONS BY THOSE OPPOSING LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

The following are some of the objections made by those opposing the United States entering the proposed league of nations, namely, (1) that it creates a supersovereignty and will therefore take from the Congress the power to declare war and the power to raise an army and navy, which are powers specifically given to Congress by the Constitution; (2) a departure from the advice of Washington concerning permanent alliances and the warning of Jefferson against entangling alliances; (3) the abandonment of the Monroe doctrine; (4) the adoption of repression against smaller or weaker nations; and (5) that such a league is idealistic, or, in other words, impractical.

Under the Constitution Congress is given the power to declare war and to prosecute it when declared. This is one of the powers delegated by the States to the Federal Government. Section 2 of Article II gives the President "power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur." While Congress has power to declare war, the President and two-thirds of the Members present of one branch of the body can make treaties of peace, thereby terminating the struggle which both branches of Congress authorized. The question therefore arises, If the President and two-thirds of the Senators present can conclude treaties of peace, why can not the same authority, namely, the President and two-thirds of the Senators present, make a treaty or pact which will, so far as possible, remove the possibility of war?

The league is not a supersovereign, but an association of nations which, it is planned, will give to us and other nations the sovereignty we can properly have, namely, a sovereignty regulated by international law and standards of right and justice, and consistent with the same sovereignty of other countries. The main purpose of the league, of course, is to make the possibility of war remote by requiring peaceful methods to be resorted to for the settlement of international disputes. If individual murder or homicide is a crime, how can collective murder or homicide committed or directed by a State be anything less than a crime? If a crime committed by an individual is the concern of every other citizen of the State—and we believe it is, and we have provided the means to apprehend and punish the criminal—why is not the crime committed by a nation the concern of all the nations? The act of Germany in provoking the recent war is the answer. In days long since passed away individual honor required the one whose honor was called in question to avenge his private wrong by taking the life, if he could, of the offender. Society has disapproved the custom; now let the family of nations place the seal of disapproval upon the acts of the individual State which that State itself has disapproved in the conduct of its citizens.

The advice of Washington and Jefferson was timely and proper when given. We had just emerged from the struggle for our independence, and could not afford to enter any permanent or entangling alliances, for the very reason that trouble would have arisen as the European alliances changed. At that time we enjoyed splendid isolation, the 3,000 miles of water affording a reasonably safe defense against all foreign enemies. The ocean has sunk to a lake, and in the near future it will have sunk to a river. Means of communication and attack from without are such that we can not escape world contact if we would. We are now resourceful and powerful, and should no longer shirk our full duty in helping to establish and maintain the peace of the world.

The Monroe doctrine was proclaimed not only to prevent colonization of the Western Hemisphere by European powers but indirectly thereby to strengthen the position of the United States, because colonization not only would have destroyed weak and helpless Central and South American countries, but their very occupation by European powers would have menaced the safety of our own Government. When the Monroe doctrine was originally published in Europe it met with approval from liberal statesmen, who, in the language of the day, hailed it as "shedding joy, exultation, and gratitude over all free men in Europe."

The reactionary Metternich, who hated constitutions, maintained it was a natural consequence of the establishment of free States, and that great calamities would be brought upon Europe by the establishment of these vast Republics in the New World. Bismarck, whose word is not now regarded as of much weight, since the overthrow of the policy of "blood and iron," regarded it as a piece of "international impertinence."

A recent writer asks this question: "If the Monroe doctrine is a sound principle and has been vindicated by the experience of a hundred years in this hemisphere, why not extend it to the rest of the world?" He then adds: "That task is a little too large for the United States alone to undertake, so it is proposed to organize a league of nations for the purpose of securing to weaker States the right of self-determination and self-development."

Article 10 of the proposed league, which reads as follows—

> The high contracting parties undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all States members of the league. In case of any such aggression or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression, the executive council shall advise upon the means by which the obligation shall be fulfilled, covers the Monroe doctrine and extends it to the world, which is in accord with the suggestions contained in an address by President Wilson to the Senate on January 23, 1917:

> I am proposing, as it were, that the nations should with one accord adopt the doctrine of President Monroe as the doctrine of the world; that no nation should seek to extend its policy over any other nation or people, but that every people should be left free to determine its own policy, its own way of development, unhindered, unthreatened, unafraid, the little along with the great and powerful.

To those who oppose a league of nations as a means of settling disputes between nations, it is perhaps pertinent to ask, "What better plan can you submit?" If you have no plan or scheme, why oppose the one which not only the best thought and study of the leading minds in our own country have proposed, but which is indorsed by the representatives of the various nations at the peace conference?

Physical force has generally been resorted to in the settlement of international disputes. As a result of this war, the supreme sacrifice of thousands of the flower of America's young manhood now sleeping their last sleep in the soil of France, as well as millions of their fellow men, backed by their bereft ones at home, demand an answer. They will not accept mere talk as a means to the desired end. Neither will mere criticism of those seeking a different solution be accepted. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that a new day has dawned and that we shall soon see the fruition of our hopes.

The extension of the principles upon which our Government is founded and our efforts with those of other free and liberty-loving peoples in behalf of those emerging from the grasp of autocratic powers will not operate to repress liberty, but, on the contrary, will aid them in securing free government and thereafter maintaining it.

This war has witnessed a rebirth of democracy. A democratic association of democratic nations is the ideal the world is striving to obtain. This idea was splendidly expressed by the President in one of his Fourth of July addresses:

> If I did not believe that the moral judgment would be the last judgment, the final judgment, in the minds of men as well as at the tribunal of God, I could not believe in popular government. But I do believe these things, and therefore I earnestly believe in the democracy not only of America but of every awakened people that wishes and intends to govern and control its own affairs.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, we have under consideration H. R. 15796, entitled: "A bill to enable the President to carry out the price guaranties made to producers of wheat of the crops of 1918 and 1919 and to protect the United States against undue enhancement of its liabilities thereunder."

At the beginning of my remarks I wish to correct an erroneous impression that prevails to a certain extent. There is an impression among some people that the Government control of wheat prices, beginning with the 1917 crop, has been highly profitable to the wheat producers. Such has not been the case. It was the European war which made high prices of wheat. It was not the food-control act nor the action of the President thereunder which made wheat raising profitable. Wheat was higher before the passage of this act and before the price fixing thereunder than it has ever been since. Prior to the passage of the food-control act the farmers in my State were being paid around $3 a bushel for their wheat. It is altogether probable that had it not been for the passage of this act wheat would have gone much higher than $3 per bushel. It was the consumers who were benefited by the fixing of prices on the wheat crops harvested in 1917 and 1918. Through the price fixing for the years 1917 and 1918 the wheat producers of the United States probably lost from $800,000,000 to $1,000,000,000. So impressed was I with this injustice to the wheat producers of 1917 that I introduced a bill to compensate them for this loss. If, therefore, it shall turn out that the wheat producers of 1919 shall profit by reason of the guaranties of the Government, the profit will not more than compensate them for their losses in 1917 and 1918.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. I will be glad to yield to my colleague.

Mr. SLOAN. I desire to inquire if the gentleman is for this legislation or not. I understand, with a number of the gentlemen who have spoken on this bill coming from the cities, after their speeches have been delivered, there has been an inquiry on the part of the House as to which side they are on, whether they were supporting this legislation or not, and I would like to hear in this first speech that I have heard from the gentleman on farming matters, or on wheat, on which side he stands, so that we may wait and hear the rest of his speech or depart.

Mr. MORGAN. I will say to the gentleman from Nebraska that I regard the ironical remarks involved in his question as a great compliment. I certainly have no apologies to offer for the frequency with which I may have spoken upon legislation affecting agriculture. neither do I desire to offer any excuse for the interest which I have manifested on the legislation pertaining to the price of wheat, relating back to the introduction of the "food-control bill," early in 1917. But I know the gentleman's remarks are made in the most friendly spirit, because he himself frequently takes the time of the House in championing the rights of farmers. Answering the gentleman's question directly, I will say that I am in favor of this legislation.

Mr. HASTINGS. Our friend from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] is a great humorist.

Mr. MORGAN. I will concede that he is great in every way.

CONVENIENCE OF THE FARMERS.

Before entering upon a general discussion of this bill I desire to call attention to what I regard as an important omission in the bill. I have carefully examined H. R. 15796, and I find There is no provision which fixes the place where the provide for the reasonable convenience of the wheat producers. There is no provision which fixes the place where the producer is to deliver his wheat, or the time at which he should deliver it, or when he shall be paid therefor. The President will no doubt, without the instruction of Congress, have full regard for the rights and convenience of the farmers. This, however, does not excuse Congress from doing its duty. Prior to the time the bill reported by the committee was introduced I prepared and introduced a bill on this subject. It is H. R. 15770. In section 3 of that bill I endeavored to protect the wheat producers by placing in the law a provision which permitted them to deliver their wheat at such time or times as suited their convenience, that allowed them to deliver their wheat at the usual market places and which required the Government to pay them in full for the wheat at the time it was delivered. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, at the proper time I propose to offer the following amendment to the bill:

That the President is hereby authorized and directed to arrange with some grain dealer, miller, elevator, or operator thereof, or with some person, corporation, or agency, at each and every local grain market in the United States, so as to provide for the reasonable convenience of wheat producers in the delivery of their wheat, to receive, purchase, and pay for the wheat delivered by each and every wheat producer for the crop years of 1918 and 1919, at the price or prices guaranteed, and said payment shall be made in full on the delivery of said wheat to any grain dealer, miller, elevator, or operator thereof, or to any person, corporation, or agency authorized to receive, purchase, and pay for the same as aforesaid.

Unless a provision similar to this is placed in the law farmers may be inconvenienced, discommoded, and possibly put to financial loss.

TWO PLANS PROPOSED.

Two plans have been proposed for the Government in carrying out its guaranties. One is that the Government shall release control of the wheat market, remove all restrictions and limitations on trade, and permit the dealers, millers, and elevators to buy the wheat from the farmers in the ordinary manner as in normal peace times. In this case the Government would provide some method of paying to the farmer the difference between the guaranteed price and the price which the dealers paid him for his wheat. The other method proposed is for the Government to continue its monopoly in the wheat market, control dealers, millers, and elevators through a license system; and endeavor to market the wheat crop of 1919, both for export and domestic trade, at the guaranteed price. It seems clear to me that the latter course should be pursued. The guaranteed price should be regarded as the market price. So far as we can legitimately we should regard the guaranteed price as the world price. Until we have marketed the 1919 wheat crop and made good our guaranty to the wheat producers, it should be the policy of this Government to maintain the guaranteed price at home and abroad. I am opposed to trying to maintain two prices. I am opposed to selling at one price at home and another price abroad. I am opposed to selling to our own consumers at a higher price than we sell to foreign consumers. And I think we should sell to foreign consumers, so far as is practicable, at a price that will net us the same return we receive from our home consumers.

With the understanding that it shall be the general policy of the Government to maintain the guaranteed price of wheat, and that the wheat sold abroad shall not be disposed of at prices lower than those paid by our home consumers, I am in favor of giving the President power, through any agency or agencies he may create, to maintain the guaranties to wheat producers, with discretionary power to meet conditions as they may arise.

WHY MAINTAIN THE GUARANTEED PRICE.

There are many reasons why the Government should endeavor to maintain the guaranteed price of wheat as the market price.

1. The guaranteed price is the price fixed by the Government, after due consideration, with the full knowledge of the uncertainty of the future. It was fixed under the authority of law and has the approval of both the legislative and the executive departments of the Government. In fixing this price the Government took into consideration the rights and interests of both consumers and producers. The price was intended to stand until the 1919 wheat crop was disposed of. To undertake now to have two or more prices for wheat, one for the producers and one for the consumers, or one for the domestic trade and another for export trade, or to have the prices changing from month to month, or from week to week, or from day to day, would cause confusion, dissatisfaction, complaint, and utter demoralization in the wheat business.

2. Wages, trade, and business have adjusted themselves to the guaranteed price of wheat. The price of wheat has not varied materially since August, 1917. Considering the high scale of wages which have been paid, the increase in salaries and the profits which have been made in trade, commerce, and in all kinds of business enterprises, the price of wheat has not been exorbitant to consumers. Readjustment will be gradual. The reconstruction period will cover years. There will be little change within the next 12 months.

3. To pay wheat producers one price and sell the wheat to consumers at another and lower price would mean extraordinary loss to the Government and enormous appropriations out of the Treasury, to be made good by taxation which eventually must be paid by the masses of the people. Low-priced wheat to consumers for the 1919 crop means increased taxation on the same consumers. What will it profit the consumers to have a reduction in the price of bread but a corresponding increase in Federal taxation. It may be said that the rich pay the taxes. But the business interests of the country have no profits except what they take from the people. So that directly or indirectly the masses of the people pay the taxes which supplies the Treasury with the funds necessary to meet all the demands upon it.

4. It would be difficult for the Government to sell wheat for export at a higher price than it is sold for domestic purpose. If we pursue a policy which means low price of wheat at home, it carries with it a policy which means a low price of wheat abroad. It is to the advantage of foreign governments to buy our surplus products, including wheat, at the lowest price possible. On the other hand, it is to the advantage of this country to sell its surplus products at the highest price possible, or at least at a price that will be profitable to the producers, and will not entail loss to our National Treasury or to the producers of the country. Assuming that we will have from the 1919 crop a surplus of from 200,000,000 to 400,000,000 bushels of wheat to be disposed of in foreign markets, we should adopt a policy which will enable us to sell that wheat at a price which will save our Treasury from loss and will give our country and our people all the benefits and advantages which come from profitable international trade.

5. The allies—Great Britain, France, and Italy—ought not to expect us to sell them our surplus of the 1919 wheat crop at a price less than the guaranteed price. We made this guaranty as much for their benefit as for our own. It was made for a cause in which we were all equally interested. Its object and purpose was world-wide in the interest of humanity. The allies needed our food as much as they needed our men. Throughout this country the cry went forth, "Food will win the war." In the spirit of this call, and in response to the appeal of Great Britain, France, and Italy, the United States made its guaranties to the wheat producers of this Nation. We had no selfish purpose in making this guaranty. There is, therefore, a strong moral obligation upon these great nations to aid this Government in carrying out that guaranty. To my mind it would almost be an act of bad faith on the part of the Governments of Great Britain, France, and Italy to ask us to sell to them any portion of our surplus of the 1919 wheat crop at less than the price guaranteed to the producers.

6. There is a tendency to overestimate the monetary gain that would come to the average family through any possible reduction that might be made in the price of wheat. Bread is said to be the "staff of life," but the cost of bread does not constitute a very large per cent of the annual expenditure of the average family. It is well to bear in mind that a reduction in the price of wheat paid to producers would not mean the same reduction in the price of bread. Under normal business conditions, with a free and open market, and with dealers, millers, elevators, bakers, retailers, and distributors all left free to fix their own earnings, charges, and profits the price which the consumer pays for bread seldom reflects correctly the price of wheat. It is altogether probable that for the next year the consumers of this country would be fully as well off under the Government's fixed price of wheat as they would be in the hands of speculators.

7. Another thing should be taken into consideration. The cost of producing wheat in the United States is greater than it is in countries like Australia, Argentina, and India, which furnish a considerable part of the surplus wheat for the world market. If it is simply a question of who can sell wheat at the lowest price with a profit to the producers we are beaten before we start. The amount of wheat which we sell on the world market in competition with these countries will not be increased, so far as the price affects our sales, unless we offer wheat at a lower price than is offered by competing countries. It is wiser for us, having a surplus of wheat to dispose of through export sales, to maintain a fair price for the wheat products of our country rather than to adopt a policy which must inevitably mean a depression in the price of our wheat both at home and abroad.

8. There is no disposition on the part of Congress to make a rapid or abrupt reduction in wages or in the innumerable articles of commerce which are the product of wages. Organized labor, through its official head, declares that wages shall not come down. It would certainly be unwise for our Government to inaugurate any policy which had for its object a reduction of wages. On the same grounds, the Government should not deliberately adopt a policy that has for its object an abrupt, sweeping revolutionary reduction in the price of wheat. The farmer would not complain in bringing down the price of wheat if other things are reduced accordingly. Low prices and low wages always mean hard times. Good prices and good wages always mean prosperity. I am in favor of passing the good things clear around the table. I want the farmer to have his share.

WORLD PRICE.

In the discussion of this question, there has been a good deal said about what would be the so-called "world price" for the 1919 wheat crop. It is asserted that consumers in this country should buy our wheat at the world price. In ordinary times, when all things are normal and when the forces of trade, commerce, finance, and transportation have full, unrestricted, and natural play, there is perhaps such a thing as a world price level for wheat. To-day there is no such thing. During the time of the marketing of the 1919 wheat crop in no legitimate sense will there be any world price for wheat. There are many reasons for this. Some of these are as follows:

1. Many of the wheat-producing countries have established through governmental authority a price on the 1919 wheat crop. Among these may be mentioned the following: United States, $2.26 per bushel; Australia, 95 cents; Roumania, $1.61; Great Britain, minimum price, $1.64; Brazil, $2.16; Switzerland, $3.18; Holland, $3.30; France, $3.84; Norway, $4.09; Italy, soft wheat, $3.96; and hard wheat, $4.44.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MORGAN. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. How does the price fixed in the countries the gentleman has enumerated compare with the price fixed by the United States?

Mr. MORGAN. In the European countries prices are much higher. Even in Australia, considering the price of freight, it compares favorably and reasonably with our price. Our price is not excessive.

The fact that many Governments have fixed the price of wheat will in itself be a force that will prevent the law of supply and demand from having its normal influence on the price of wheat.

2. Transportation facilities for the exportation of wheat and other cereals are not now normal and will not be normal during the period that the 1919 crop will be marketed. This is another force that will work against the law of supply and demand. With a restricted, uncertain, variable, and inadequate shipping tonnage for the transportation of wheat there can be no natural, normal, trustworthy world price level for wheat.

3. The financial world is not normal and will not be during the period in which the 1919 wheat crop will be marketed. World finances, national and international, are in a most disturbed and unnatural condition. The situation is unparalleled in history. The enormous debts incurred through the prosecution of the war present the most difficult financial problems which have ever confronted the nations of the world. We may be and should be optimistic. We should feel that a solution will be provided without financial cataclysms. The demand for our wheat abroad may be greater than the ability to pay. The people of many European countries are hungry, but they are poor. Under these conditions, the law of supply and demand will not work naturally.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. I thank the gentleman for having yielded to me before. Is there an open price for wheat on the market at Liverpool now; and if so, what is it?

Mr. MORGAN. There is no open price, as that term is ordinarily understood.

Mr. SLOAN. Is there anywhere in the world an open price in the great markets on wheat?

Mr. MORGAN. I think not. There is but one thing to do, and that is to do just what this bill provides; to put the power of buying our wheat and selling our wheat into the hands of a governmental agency, and to depend on that agency to do what is reasonable and fair to the purchasers and consumers and to trade and commerce.

4. The next year will be the beginning of the reconstruction period throughout all those countries which have been engaged in war. National energies, including every business calling and profession of life, will be affected by the processes of reorganization, reconstruction, readjustment, and revivification of the affairs of practically all the great nations of the world. Under such conditions the law of supply and demand and the laws of trade, commerce, and business will not function as they did in normal peace times.

5. But there is another reason why there can be no legitimate, trustworthy world price for wheat during the marketing of the 1919 crop. Countries which have a surplus of wheat to sell for export must sell mainly through concentrated buying agencies, largely under governmental control. So long as that condition exists there is no free competition in the sale or purchase of wheat. So long as we must sell our surplus wheat to concentrated buying agencies we must forget that there ever was such a thing as the law of supply and demand, which fixed the world price of wheat, and confront the concentrated buying agency with a concentrated selling agency. We must take advantage of every proper and legitimate means to compel the concentrated buying agencies to purchase our surplus wheat at a just, fair, and reasonable price, and we should assume to start on that such a price is represented by our guaranteed price.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman advocate making this a permanent policy of the Government?

Mr. MORGAN. No; I am not advocating that.

Mr. WALSH. I know the gentleman is very familiar with all farming problems and has on many occasions demonstrated that to the House. Will the gentleman state what is the emergency that requires this tremendous appropriation?

Mr. MORGAN. Well, I say this: If the Government conducts this business as I think it should, it will endeavor to maintain the guaranteed price of $2.26 on wheat at home and abroad, so far as conditions will justify it, and at the end of the transaction we will have used very little of the money appropriated out of the Treasury of the United States. Most of this will be turned back. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent at the outset to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota objects.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I desire, in the five minutes allotted to me, to again remind you of the necessity of repealing the espionage law.

War destroys respect for human life. It suspends the decalogue. Every form of brutality and cruelty is justified on the theory of war necessity. Just now a wave of dark reaction is sweeping throughout the world, a reaction that amounts almost to a state of insanity, to a veritable nightmare. It resembles very much the state of mind of Europe after the collapse of the French Revolution. I believe it was after the restoration of one of the Bourbons that an order was issued prohibiting professors in French universities from wearing pointed beards, on the ground that Van Dyke beards were fashionable during the revolution and were therefore suggestive of a spirit of sedition.

The Bourbon conducted war against a beard, which to him was emblematic of revolution. Legislative bodies are beginning a war against emblems, a war against words, a war against symbols, a war against a supposed something which they call bolshevism and which they are quite unable to define. All that is necessary in order to dispose of a man is to say that he is advocating bolshevism. I understand that a Senator of the United States has recently compared the proposed government of the league of nations to a Bolsheviki Soviet, and I can readily see how a protectionist and a free trader engaging in an old-fashioned debate on protection and free trade will call each other Bolsheviki in the very near future. [Laughter.]

During the war we enacted one of the most infamous acts of legislation, the most oppressive, not only in the history of this country, but in the history of modern times. The espionage laws of old Russia and of old Prussia were less severe than our espionage law. Supposedly legislating against spying, this Congress has conferred upon every constable the right to suppress the written and the spoken word.

Now, in war time people are insane, but there is no earthly excuse for retaining the espionage law to-day.

It should be repealed immediately. The Democrats should learn something from the lesson of the last campaign, if they are capable of learning anything at all. During the last election the people for the first time in the history of this country refused to support an administration during a war.

Everything pointed a few days before election to a successful termination of the war. Turkey, Bulgaria, and Austria-Hungary had collapsed. It should have been apparent to the most superficial observer that victory was near. Nevertheless, the people defeated the Democratic Congress. While there were many reasons for it, the principal reason was the use within the country of coercive and undemocratic methods, methods violative of the most elementary rights of the people.

It is to the credit of the American people that no political party can sponsor an alien and sedition law and survive.

Of course, in substituting Democrats by Republicans the people but jumped from the frying pay into the fire, but there was evidently some relief in the very process of jumping.

The espionage law should be immediately repealed and its victims liberated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. LONDON. I ask leave to extend my remarks along this line.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. The gentleman objected the other day to the request of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LONDON. I know; I put my objection on record; but then I left the room and the gentleman from Ohio got his leave.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I withdraw my objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] that I have only one more speech.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty-nine minutes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] 10 minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I do not care by what name you call it, whether Bolshevism, anarchy, red flag, or anything else, if it is against organized government I am opposed to it. I do not believe anyone in time of war has a right to take up arms against his country or to argue against it or to try to defeat its purpose when it is undertaking to save its very existence. If Bolshevism is against organized government, as it is in Russia, and in favor of everything that goes to tear down civilization, then I am opposed to it. We have the best Government on earth, and it is the duty of all good citizens to maintain and support it.

But I have obtained a little time in order to say something about wheat. There is no question but that the fixing of the price of the farmers' wheat at $2.26 a bushel was done for the purpose of bringing down the price of wheat at the time the price was fixed, and it absolutely did bring down the price of wheat. At the time the price was fixed at $2.20, in the first instance, wheat was selling as high as $3.40 a bushel in that same month. While that was an abnormal price, and not the uniform price that month, still it did sell as high as $3.40 in the month that the President was authorized to fix the price at $2.20 a bushel. I herewith incorporate the law authorizing the President to fix the price.

SEC. 14. That whenever the President shall find that an emergency exists requiring stimulation of the production of wheat and that it is essential that the producers of wheat, produced within the United States, shall have the benefits of the guaranty provided for in this section, he is authorized, from time to time, seasonably and as far in advance of seeding time as practicable, to determine and fix and to give public notice of what, under specified conditions, is a reasonable guaranteed price for wheat, in order to assure such producers a reasonable profit. The President shall thereupon fix such guaranteed price for each of the official grain standards for wheat as established under the United States grain standards act, approved August 11, 1916. The President shall from time to time establish and promulgate such regulations as he shall deem wise in connection with such guaranteed prices, and in particular governing conditions of delivery and payment, and differences in price for the several standard grades in the principal primary markets of the United States, adopting No. 1 northern spring or its equivalent at the principal interior primary markets as the basis. Thereupon the Government of the United States hereby guarantees every producer of wheat produced within the United States that, upon compliance by him with the regulations prescribed, he shall receive for any wheat produced in reliance upon this guaranty within the period, not exceeding 18 months, prescribed in the notice, a price not less than the guaranteed price therefor as fixed pursuant to this section. In such regulations the President shall prescribe the terms and conditions upon which any such producer shall be entitled to the benefits of such guaranty. The guaranteed prices for the several standard grades of wheat for the crop of 1918 shall be based upon No. 1 northern spring or its equivalent at not less than $2 per bushel at the principal interior primary markets. This guaranty shall not be dependent upon the action of the President under the first part of this section, but is hereby made absolute, and shall be binding until May 1, 1919. When the President finds that the importation into the United States of any wheat produced outside of the United States materially enhances or is likely materially to enhance the liabilities of the United States under guaranties of prices therefor made pursuant to this section, and ascertains what rate of duty, added to the then existing rate of duty on wheat and to the value of wheat at the time of importation, would be sufficient to bring the price thereof at which imported up to the price fixed therefor pursuant to the foregoing provisions of this section, he shall proclaim such facts, and thereafter there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon wheat when imported in addition to the then existing rate of duty, the rate of duty so ascertained; but in no case shall any such rate of duty be fixed at an amount which will effect a reduction of the rate of duty upon wheat under any then existing tariff law of the United States. For the purpose of making any guaranteed price effective under this section, or whenever he deems it essential in order to protect the Government of the United States against material enhancement of its liabilities arising out of any guaranty under this section, the President is authorized also, in his discretion, to purchase any wheat for which a guaranteed price shall be fixed under this section, and to hold, transport, or store it, or to sell, dispose of, and deliver the same to any citizen of the United States or to any Government engaged in war with any country with which the Government of the United States is or may be at war or to use the same as supplies for any department or agency of the Government of the United States. Any moneys received by the United States from or in connection with the sale or disposal of wheat under this section may, in the discretion of the President, be used as a revolving fund for further carrying out the purposes of this section. Any balance of such moneys not used as part of such revolving fund shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. Then as I understand what the gentleman is saying so well, in reality the price as fixed in 1917 was fixed in the interest of the consumers and not of the producers of wheat. Is that the gentleman's idea?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think the price was fixed in order to bring the price down. I do not think the consumer's interest was the whole thing which was taken into consideration.

Mr. MORGAN. Is it not a fact that the consumers really got the benefit of it?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The consumers got the benefit of it; yes.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Does not the gentleman think at that time the larger part of the wheat was consumed abroad instead of at home?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think the home market consumed more wheat than the foreign market.

Mr. RAGSDALE. During the war?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. RAGSDALE. What per cent was consumed abroad and what per cent at home?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think we consumed approximately 500,000,000 bushels at home, and that we shipped abroad only about 250,000,000 bushels. That is as I understand it, but the figures must be revised to be correct.

Something was said here about the interest of the consumer. I had the privilege of stepping into the committee room for a few minutes when the hearings were in progress, when they were taking testimony upon the provisions of this bill, and I think there was not a farmer present. Of the whole 24 witnesses who were sworn before the committee there was not an actual farmer brought in to testify. I think the producer is as much interested as anyone else, that his side should be fairly presented, and that those interested in the production of wheat should have been allowed to present their views to this committee.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. Was it not the original purpose in fixing the price of wheat to aid the consumer rather than the producer? And is it not a fact that the wheat producers of the United States never asked to have the price of wheat fixed, but would rather have left it in the open market during the whole war period?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am very certain that they would sooner have left it to the law of supply and demand, and when the price was fixed I understand there was not a farmer consulted in relation to fixing that price at $2.20 in the first instance.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman made the statement just now that no producers came before the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I made that statement.

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman did not mean to leave the impression that any of them were prevented from going before the committee?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Oh, no. They did not come. I want to call attention to a circular letter that was sent to me by the "Farmers' National Council," a special union of the leading farm organizations of the country to assist in carrying into effect the farmers' program of national and international reconstruction, adopted at the farmers' national conference on reconstruction, Washington, D. C., January 7, 8, and 9, 1919. I see that it has among its membership officers of the State granges of Washington, Idaho, Maine, Nebraska, Colorado, Oklahoma, and Oregon, besides a number of other farm organizations. This letter is dated February 14, 1919, and has just come to my desk. I will read the part which relates to the wheat guaranty:

We are confident that Congress will pass legislation to make good the Government's guaranty to the wheat raisers. We respectfully ask that such legislation shall be safeguarded to prevent millers and grain dealers from securing the major portion of the benefit of the guaranty made by the Government. As you are doubtless aware, a 16-ounce loaf of wheat bread can be sold for 5 cents even if wheat brings $3 a bushel, provided the profits to millers and grain dealers are kept down to a reasonable figure.

Sincerely, yours, GEORGE P. HAMPTON,
Managing Director.

Now, if that is true, that a pound loaf can be sold for 5 cents when wheat sells at $3 per bushel, the fixing of the price at $2.26 is not going to hurt anybody, and I will say that you can not produce wheat in some States for less than $2 or $2.50 a bushel.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Did I understand the gentleman to say that a pound loaf of bread could be sold for 5 cents?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No, sir; I say that is what the Farmers' National Council says. This organization is composed of some twenty-odd of the leading farm associations of the country, and I read that part relating to the cost of a pound loaf of bread.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. The wheat costs nearly that. That is a wonderful statement.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will tell you how that is. A barrel of flour with wheat at $2.20 a bushel costs $9.90; that is, 4½ bushels of wheat will make a barrel of flour. It is said a barrel of flour will make 300 loaves of bread. If that be true, then the flour in a pound loaf of bread with wheat at $2.20 a bushel costs .033 cents. I do not know whether that is too much or too little. I am reading you just what the letter says, and it is backed up by the largest and best authority that has come to my attention. It represents over 20 agricultural and other institutions of farm management.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Does the gentleman think that with the miller paying over 4½ cents for wheat bran that the bread could be sold for 5 cents?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I know that the bran and the middlings and the shorts will pay for grinding the flour, so they can get back a profit out of the by-products when they undertake to put up a barrel of flour.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORGAN had leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BAER] 10 minutes.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Chairman, the question as to whether or not the United States Government is going to make this guaranty good is an undebatable one. Every citizen whether he lives in the city or in the country, whether he raises wheat or not, firmly believes, if he be honest, that the Federal Government should make good in its contract with the wheat growers of the country. The President issued a proclamation in which he solemnly pledged the price of $2.26 a bushel for wheat for the 1919 crop. Congress passed the law and an overwhelming majority voted for it. How, then, can anyone raise the issue of not paying this price? If he does, what argument can he use to uphold his contention?

It is true that the farmer will benefit by this price guaranty. But I also want to show how the consumers as well as the producers will be benefited by this measure, assuming, of course, that in the administration of the law the Federal authorities will retain rigid restrictions on the price of flour. I recall that when the bill was being considered to fix the price of wheat at $2.20 in 1917 that wheat was selling for $3.45 per bushel. On the day the price was fixed at $2.20 wheat was selling in the market for $3.07. At that time when the price was cut down nearly $1 I did not hear these ardent defenders of justice and city consumers complaining because the farmers were being paid less for their wheat. They were conspicuously silent. The farmers in my State, knowing it was their patriotic duty to raise wheat for our Government and the allies, did not complain. They loyally went forth in the fields and produced it without complaint nor murmur and without sending committees and lobbyists to protest here in the city of Washington.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAER. Yes, indeed.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Does the gentleman remember that Mr. Hoover said that the danger was that wheat could go to $7 a bushel?

Mr. BAER. Yes; I talked to a gentleman from a consumers' league who interviewed Mr. Hoover. He went to his office. He asked, "Why are you fixing wheat so high—at $2.20?" Mr. Hoover informed him that the Argentine wheat and the Australian wheat was not accessible because there was not sufficient shipping to make available the vast supplies, and that wheat would probably go up to $6 or $7 a bushel if left to the law of supply and demand.

I wish I had time to go into the history of this price-fixing bill. On May 17, 1917, in Fargo, a barrel of flour cost $17.50. That same day in England, 3,000 miles away across the ocean from the United States, a barrel of flour only cost $8.20, and it was made out of American wheat. True, England appropriated $200,000,000 to take care of the differential between the cost of manufacture and the price that the consumer paid, but the amount that England paid was not equivalent to the amount the shipping of this wheat from North Dakota to England would cost.

Then what happened? The United States took control of the wheat and fixed the price at $2.20, and the price of flour was also fixed at $10.60 a barrel. Through the restrictions on flour the consumers of this country—in spite of the fact that the farmers received twice as much as they ever did before—paid $7 less for a barrel of flour than they did in the period before the price fixing, when gamblers and speculators of the country controlled the market and controlled the price of both wheat and flour. You gentlemen of Philadelphia and other cities paid $18 a barrel for flour then, and you paid only $12 for it a few months later when the Government took control.

I believe that the whole secret of this law is in the administration of it. I believe that if you keep the price at $2.26, and if the men who administer this law will restrict the selfishness and greed of the profiteers who formerly charged exorbitant prices for flour, that the American consumer will still obtain his flour for $7 a barrel less than he would if you take off all price restrictions. I know this is true, because in Ireland and England in September you could go to a mill and get a barrel of flour for $7.50, according to Senator GORE, who wrote an article at that time in the Forum magazine. Here in the United States it was $12.50, $5 more than it was over there. Let some of the gentlemen explain why this difference in price exists, especially those who are arguing that we are obtaining extortionate prices for our wheat.

In Larimore, N. Dak., where citizens were eating barley flour as a substitute for wheat flour in order to save the wheat, on the same day the baker bought wheat flour wholesale at $10.60 a barrel, I went to the elevator, and what did I find there? I found that wheat was $2.05 a bushel and barley only 63 cents a bushel. Of course, it takes more barley than wheat to make a barrel of flour. It weighs 42 pounds, where wheat weighs 60 pounds. Consequently barley would be worth about 93 cents in comparison with wheat. But the consumer paid $4 more for a barrel of barley flour than he did for a barrel of wheat flour, when at the same time wheat was selling for over twice as much as barley.

I lay this at the door of the gamblers and the speculators, who robbed the mothers and the wives of our soldiers while they were over in France fighting for this country. I say that we should lay these restrictions not only on wheat flour but on all products of wheat.

Take bran and middlings, for instance. This affects the man in the city, because he has to buy milk, eggs, and butter. The farmer feeds the by-products of the wheat to his cows and chickens. Bran was $27 when the Government had a stiff restriction on it. About three weeks ago the restriction was removed from bran, and what happened? It went from $27 to $41 overnight, and a few days ago it was $56 a ton.

I shall offer an amendment at the proper time which will include shorts, bran, and middlings, as well as flour, and if that be adopted in that way we will save the consumer millions of dollars.

At this point I shall insert in the RECORD a concurrent resolution recently passed by the legislature of my State:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
STATE OF NORTH DAKOTA.

To all to whom these presents may come:

I, Thomas Hall, secretary of state for the State of North Dakota, do hereby set forth and certify that the following is the full text, and whole thereof, of a certain concurrent resolution adopted by the Sixteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of North Dakota.

Dated at the capitol in Bismarck, N. Dak., this 3d day of February, 1919.

[SEAL.] THOMAS HALL,
Secretary of State.

Concurrent resolution relating to the fixing of the price for all wheat grown in the United States during the year 1919 that is delivered prior to June 1, 1920, at $2.26 at Chicago.

Whereas the President of the United States by his proclamation of September 2, 1918, fixed the price for all wheat grown in the United States during the year 1919 that is delivered prior to June 1, 1920, at $2.26 at Chicago; and

Whereas upon the faith of said proclamation the farmers of North Dakota and generally throughout the Northwest have gone to an enormous expense in the increase of acreage for wheat and for the purchase of horses, machinery, and other equipment for an increased wheat production, and have incurred great obligations on that account; and

Whereas it appears that up to this time no agency of the United States has been created and charged with the duty of making effective the guaranteed price under the President's proclamation; and

Whereas the farmers of North Dakota, as well as all other wheat-raising districts of the United States, have acted in good faith upon the said proclamation of the President, and in case Congress fails to make the said proclamation of the President effective such failure will cause an enormous financial loss to the farmers of the State of North Dakota and other wheat-raising districts of the United States, as well as a great disappointment, and will tend to lessen the confidence of the people in the Federal Government: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of North Dakota (the House of Representatives concurring), That we earnestly urge Congress to pass such measure as will make the said proclamation of the President effective: Be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state be instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress and to the chairmen of the Committee of Agriculture in both Houses of Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Dakota has expired.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield what time I have left to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for this bill, of course. I do not think there is anything left to do where the Government makes its promise, even if it be improvident—and I do not say that the promise we made here was improvident—but to vote for the bill. I would like to get some ideas with reference to what will be the effect of the bill when enacted. I heard a gentleman a moment ago on the floor favor the bill because while it would carry out the promise of the Government it would subject wheat to the ordinary laws of trade—the laws of supply and demand. My reading of the bill had not led me to suppose that would be the case. As I understand the proposition, it is that the Government through the grain corporation will practically purchase the wheat that is produced in the country. While there may be some transactions in wheat on boards of trade or grain exchanges, yet practically there will be no market price of wheat at all. Of course, if the price of wheat would go away up above the price that the Government is willing to pay, then there might be a market transaction in wheat. Whether there would be I do not know, but where the ordinary value of wheat, as compared with the market price of corn and oats and barley and rye, is to be held a good deal higher than would otherwise be, it seems to me that it will be necessary for the Government practically to buy all of the surplus wheat, at least, if not all of the wheat. Of course, it might happen, and probably will—and I suppose that is contemplated—if wheat comes into the Minneapolis market or some of the other markets, with the guaranty that the Government will pay on the basic price of $2.26 a bushel at Chicago, that millers may buy the wheat directly without its passing through the hands of the grain corporation at the same price. But there can be no market for it below the basic price guaranteed by the bill.

Now, we have two sides to look at on this proposition. If the price of wheat is kept up through the purchases by the grain corporation, as it will be, to $2.26 a bushel, Chicago market, there is no way I can see, and I am glad to have information from those who studied it, how it can be reduced when it comes to selling the wheat through any market operation. We have had said to us, on the one hand, the Government will buy this wheat at the guaranteed price, and then will sell it for consumption at the real value in the world, but if the grain corporation pays $2.26, Chicago market, per bushel for wheat, why will it go any lower unless they by their own volition offer to sell it for less? There is not enough wheat in other countries to supply the year's demand without using some of the wheat raised in the United States. In other words, the European markets may be able to buy wheat now in Australia or Argentina and ship it to Liverpool for a good deal less than $2.26, Chicago market, but they can not get enough wheat from those countries to supply the year's demand in Europe, and in the end they must get some wheat from the United States. Now, we are appropriating $1,000,000,000. That would more than pay for all the surplus wheat we will raise in this country, probably, yet unless the grain corporation, after it buys wheat at $2.26 of its own volition sells for less than it pays, the price of wheat will stay up in the markets of the world eventually, and it will not take very long to get to that position if people believe the grain corporation is going to take that position. Of course, it would save the Government from loss, but would require the consumers of the country here to pay a high price for all the wheat that is consumed in this country. And while various gentlemen, in discussing this matter, seem to assume that under this bill people who eat wheat flour are going to be able to buy it for a good deal less than it would be, based on the $2.26 a bushel, that can not be done unless the grain corporation, without regard to the laws of trade, without regard to market supply or demand, shall say, "We pay $2.26 a bushel for wheat, but it is not worth that much, and we will sell it for less, because there will be no market price fixed," as it would seem to me. I am perfectly willing to get information on the subject.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. GORDON. Does not the gentleman think there is a large surplus of wheat in Argentina and Australia; that because of the lack of shipping facilities during this war there has been an accumulation of wheat in those countries?

Mr. MANN. I heard the figures given by the gentleman from South Carolina, and I assume they are correct as to the amount of the surplus wheat both in Argentina and Australia, and under that the supply is not sufficient materially to affect the price.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BAER. I ask unanimous consent for two minutes in order to answer a question——

Mr. MANN. The time is fixed in the House.

Mr. LEVER. Has the gentleman from Michigan used all his time?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. LEVER. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY].

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, had I spoken earlier in the debate I should have been glad to have reviewed briefly the events which have led up to the situation which confronts us to-day in the consideration of this bill. Those things have been gone over in the debate so often and they are so well known to the membership that I shall not go back into history and repeat them in detail.

I do want to reply very briefly to one statement which has been made so often in this debate, namely, that the purpose of enacting the legislation which led to the fixing of the guaranteed price on wheat was to benefit the consumer. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] made that statement a few moments ago; other gentlemen have said the same thing.

We all know that in August, 1917, when this House by a practically unanimous vote passed the food-control bill the underlying idea upon which it acted was that it was being done for the purpose of encouraging production. We all know that at that time we were at war; we know that the avenues of trade were shut out from England, France, and Italy for the purchase of wheat. They could not get wheat from Australia; they could not get it from Argentina; they could not get it from Russia. All of the Old World markets from which they had secured their supplies in former years were absolutely shut out. The crop of this country was at a very low ebb, and it was known to us and to our allies that during the war we would have to depend upon the United States and Canada for the wheat with which to feed our armies, to feed ourselves, and to feed our allies in Europe.

With that very idea in view, this Congress passed that bill, and if you will read it you will find that the act sets out the purpose for which it was enacted, namely, that of stimulating production. As the bill passed the House it authorized the President to determine and fix what would be a reasonable guaranteed price for wheat in order to assure producers a reasonable profit. After the bill went to the Senate it was considered there for a number of weeks, debated day after day, and it was then that the farmers of the Northwest, becoming uneasy lest the price might be too low, came to the Senate and asked them to put in a provision that the price should not go below $2 a bushel. That provision was inserted, and when it came back to the House the House passed the conference report by a unanimous vote. I quote from the act, as follows:

SEC. 14. That whenever the President shall find that an emergency exists requiring stimulation of the production of wheat and that it is essential that the producers of wheat produced within the United States shall have the benefits of the guaranty provided for in this section, he is authorized, from time to time, seasonably and as far in advance of seeding time as practicable, to determine and fix and to give public notice of what, under specified conditions, is a reasonable guaranteed price for wheat, in order to assure such producers a reasonable profit. The President shall thereupon fix such guaranteed price for each of the official grain standards for wheat as established under the United States grain standards act approved August 11, 1916. The President shall from time to time establish and promulgate such regulations as he shall deem wise in connection with such guaranteed prices, and in particular governing conditions of delivery and payment, and differences in price for the several standard grades in the principal primary markets of the United States, adopting No. 1 northern spring or its equivalent at the principal interior primary markets as the basis. Thereupon the Government of the United States hereby guarantees every producer of wheat produced within the United States that, upon compliance by him with the regulations prescribed, he shall receive for any wheat produced in reliance upon this guarantee within the period, not exceeding 18 months, prescribed in the notice, a price not less than the guaranteed price therefor as fixed pursuant to this section. In such regulations the President shall prescribe the terms and conditions upon which any such producer shall be entitled to the benefits of such guaranty. The guaranteed prices for the several standard grades of wheat for the crop of 1918 shall be based upon No. 1 northern spring or its equivalent at not less than $2 per bushel at the principal interior primary markets.

The guarantee was made not by the President of the United States but by the Congress. The President fixes the price, the Government guarantees, as stated in the act. The language is specific.

When our committee was confronted with the duty of preparing a bill to meet these obligations we felt that we had before us a very difficult as well as a most important task. We met and gave to this subject our most earnest and candid consideration. We held extensive hearings; gentlemen came from all parts of the country to appear before our committee. Some gentleman asked a moment ago why we did not call the farmers before our committee. We did not do that for the very good and sufficient reason that it was not necessary. We will take care of the farmers when we pass a law that will enable the Government to meet its obligations and pay to them the guaranteed price. The thing we were most interested in was the very best way to write this law and put into it the provisions which would enable the Government to meet its obligations.

So we had our hearings. Then we went into our committee room. And let me say to you that all the members of the committee, practically, were there. We went over very carefully every proposition which we thought we ought to put into this bill. We discussed them at great length, and then we appointed a subcommittee to draft a bill according to our ideas. We then took the bill up and went over it again and again. No measure that has come before our committee since I have been a Member of this House has had more careful, candid, earnest consideration than the one we present to you to-day. When finally it was passed and reported back to the House, it came with the unanimous vote of the Committee on Agriculture. I am glad that to-day, after five hours of debate on this measure, no Member has even intimated that we ought not to keep our obligations; no one has said that he is not going to give this bill his support. Gentlemen may not agree with all of its provisions; they may not be pleased with everything in it, but in the main they are satisfied; they are for keeping the obligations made by the Government to the farmers and are going to support this bill.

Now, then, I want to discuss with you for a little while the plan upon which we are to proceed under the provisions of this bill. Quite a number of schemes were presented to us. Men came before our committee, good business men, and said to us, "Our idea is that you should go out to the farmers and pay them at the thrashing machine when they thrash their wheat."

We had other gentlemen come before our committee and say in substance, "You must go to the elevator and you must give the farmer two checks, one upon the basis of the world's price and the other for the difference between that price and the guaranteed price." Other suggestions were made, but the plans proposed were new, untried, and, in the opinion of the committee, unworkable. After careful deliberation our committee decided that the best thing to do was to do that which we are already doing—in other words, to give to the President the same authority he has now and enable him to carry on the trading in wheat just as it has been carried on for the last two years. For two years the Grain Corporation, organized under the food-control act, has been handling the wheat of the country, and we considered that the thing for us to do was to make provision in this bill for the continuation of that plan which is already well known not only to the grain trade but to the farmers and the people who have to do with it through the entire country.

Let us see what will happen under the provisions of this measure when it is put into operation. The farmer will take his grain to the market place, he will sell it to the elevator man, and he will receive from him the guaranteed price. He will get the same price that he would get if he were to take his wheat to the nearest central market, less the freight from his local market to the central market, and less a small per cent given to the elevator man for handling the wheat. Under the provisions of this act, the wheat business will be carried on just as it has been carried on for the past two years, and every farmer in the country will know exactly what is expected of him and what to do in order to get the guaranteed price.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I would like to ask the gentleman how much the warehouses are allowed for the handling of the grain? I know that during the last season there was a very great difference in different markets.

Mr. RUBEY. I regret that I can not give the gentleman that specific information. I do not know.

Mr. ANDERSON. At the terminal markets I think it was one twenty-fifth of a cent a bushel per day.

Mr. RUBEY. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I did not understand his question. It is somewhere near a cent a bushel per month for storage charge.

Mr. ASHBROOK. And you must add to that the charges for insurance and things of that kind?

Mr. RUBEY. Yes; insurance, interest, and storage will make it run to about 2 cents a bushel per month.

Mr. ASHBROOK. But the exact amount is not set out in the bill?

Mr. RUBEY. Oh, no.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Would it be 2 or 3 or 4 cents a bushel?

Mr. RUBEY. Probably not that much. It would probably be from 1 to 2 cents a bushel.

Now, as I said, the plan proposed in this bill is not a new one. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] says this bill is against the interests of the consumer and that the consumer is to pay the price. He tells us that the thing for us to do is to settle at once. If the gentleman from Alabama can give us the machinery under which this can be done, I would be glad, of course, to have him do it. That would be practically an impossibility.

Now, after the grain leaves the country elevator it goes to the central market and becomes the property of the Government. The Government must become the owner of that wheat. I can see no other way of handling it except for the Government to become the purchaser of wheat. As was suggested a moment ago, and very properly, by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], the Government must become the purchaser of the wheat and have a monopoly of the whole wheat business of the country. Especially will that be true if we raise a bumper crop, as now seems likely.

Now, let us see what the Government will do with the wheat. It must sell it, of course, but whether it will sell that wheat for $2.26 or less depends upon conditions that are absolutely impossible for anybody here or anywhere else to determine. It all depends upon world-wide conditions.

If the wheat crop in this country is an immense one of 1,000,000,000 bushels or more, if wheat is raised in Argentina and Australia and other countries and the supply is very great, the price of wheat is going to be low, and then necessarily the Grain Corporation acting for the Government must sell that wheat at a price less than $2.26 a bushel. It must meet those conditions and give the consumers the benefit of the lower price. I for one do not believe that the world conditions will be such as to bring that price down to a very low plane. I believe that the conditions will be such that the price will be kept up. It will probably be less than $2.26. It may come down to $2. It may come down to $1.50. It might be less; but I doubt it very much.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUBEY. Yes.

Mr. ROSE. What provision is made for storing the wheat in case the price should go so low that the Government will face a large deficit?

Mr. RUBEY. The President, through his agent or agency, has absolute authority under this bill to make provision for storage. Authority is given to commandeer, if necessary, space in which to store the wheat.

Mr. CURRY of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUBEY. Yes.

Mr. CURRY of California. Is not the world price of wheat at the present time $1.35?

Mr. RUBEY. There is no such thing now as a world price.

Mr. CURRY of California. That is the price outside of the United States.

Mr. RUBEY. No; that is not the price outside the United States, as I will demonstrate. Let me say this to the gentleman: It has not been 10 days since the Dutch Government sent over here and bought a cargo of wheat from the United States Grain Corporation. It paid $2.60 a bushel for that wheat f. o. b. at the Atlantic seaboard. About the same time, or just a little while before that, England wanted a large supply of wheat. She could not get the credit to buy that wheat in this country; what did she do? She went to Argentina, and there they loaned her $100,000,000, and she agreed to take the wheat there and take other products. She paid $1.35 for the wheat, the freight was probably from 60 or 70 cents a bushel, making the price delivered in England around $2 a bushel. The Dutch Government sent her own vessels for her wheat. Had she paid freight her wheat would have cost her about $3.20 a bushel delivered. Wheat in Australia sells for $1.35; the transportation to England is about $1.30, so that Australian wheat delivered in England is around $2.65 a bushel. So, you see, there is no such thing as a uniform world price.

Mr. CURRY of California. Was not the reason why they came here and bought it at that price the fact that Great Britain would not let them go to other countries—to the countries of the allies? We are not an "ally," you know.

Mr. RUBEY. Holland is a neutral; she can buy where she pleases. The conditions are such that we can not have what is called a world price. Some gentlemen here to-day have talked about the law of supply and demand. They say that we did away with the law of supply and demand when we passed the food-control bill and provided for a fixed price on wheat. The law of supply and demand was done away with when the great European war broke out; we could not have the law of supply and demand acting in this country during the great European war. And not only that, but that law will not act until conditions become normal.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUBEY. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. How long will the farmer have to put his wheat on the market to get this guaranty; what is the time limit?

Mr. RUBEY. On the 1st day of June, 1920. He has that time in which to sell his wheat, and he gets that price at the central market.

Mr. MADDEN. This bill guarantees a price on wheat that is not yet planted?

Mr. RUBEY. It guarantees spring wheat.

Mr. MADDEN. Why does it do that?

Mr. RUBEY. Because the gentleman voted to do that, just as the rest of us did.

Mr. MADDEN. We did not do that.

Mr. RUBEY. If the gentleman will read section 14 of the food-control act he will find that he did that very thing. We did not say, of course, that we were going to pay for wheat before it was planted, or anything of that sort, but we did say that "thereupon"—after the President had fixed the price—"thereupon the President guarantees to every producer of wheat produced in the United States," and so forth. That is what the act says.

Mr. MADDEN. I am talking about the time limit.

Mr. RUBEY. The time limit is the 1st day of June, 1920.

Mr. MADDEN. Is that what the law says?

Mr. RUBEY. That is what the guaranty says.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman kindly yield for an inquiry?

Mr. RUBEY. I will be glad to.

Mr. MANN. On the question of the disposition of the wheat, I know what the provision of the bill is—the penalty against falsely representing the wheat—but if the grain corporation should sell the wheat at less than the basic price, how will it be able to guard against that wheat being sold again to the Government or to the grain corporation at $2.26?

Mr. RUBEY. The grain corporation will sell that wheat through the license system. It licenses the millers of the country, and it sells this wheat to them at a certain price, and, of course, it has entire control of them through the license system and knows what they do with the wheat and how much flour they will make out of it. It not only does that, but this bill authorizes them to fix the amount of profit that the millers shall make out of the flour, so as to carry that on down and protect the consumer.

Mr. MANN. I understand that part of it, but suppose I want to buy wheat for seed purposes, how can I buy it? How will they know that I will not sell it back to them?

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman will allow me, I will refer the gentleman from Illinois to section 7 of the bill, which imposes a very heavy penalty——

Mr. MANN. I know the penalty, but the penalty is against falsely selling other wheat. This would be the wheat subject to be purchased. There will be a great many farmers perhaps who will want to buy seed wheat, and they ought to be able to buy it without too much red tape. How is it proposed to guard against somebody buying wheat for a legitimate purpose, but not using it for that purpose, and selling it over again to the Government?

Mr. LEVER. Let me see if section 7 does not cover it—if I am not taking too much of my friend's time.

Mr. RUBEY. Go ahead.

Mr. LEVER. Section 7 provides:

That any person who knowingly makes any false statement or representation to any officer, agent, or employee of the United States engaged in the performance of any duty under this act, or falsely represents to any of said persons that the wheat he offers for sale was grown as a part of the 1918 or 1919 crops for the purpose of securing any of the benefits of the aforesaid guaranties, or any person who willfully assaults, resists, impedes, or interferes with any officer, agent, or employee of the United States in the execution of any duty authorized to be performed by or pursuant to this act, or any person who knowingly violates any regulation or order issued pursuant to this act, except as otherwise made punishable in this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or both.

Now, there may be something in the gentleman's suggestion that we ought to make that more specific to cover the case the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUBEY. Yes; I yield.

Mr. ANDERSON. I assume that all of the elevators and all of the mills will be under license.

Mr. LEVER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. ANDERSON. And they will have to account for every bushel of wheat that they take, either in reshipments or in flour, so that if a proper check is kept on the accounting systems in the elevators and in the mills, I assume that the wheat can not get back into the hands of the farmer after he has once sold it.

Mr. MANN. Then, a man, in order to buy wheat, must show what he is going to do with it, and satisfy the seller that he is going to mill it, or something of that kind.

Mr. ANDERSON. I think so.

Mr. MANN. He can not buy wheat for shipment.

Mr. ANDERSON. A country elevator can buy wheat for shipment, of course, but not an individual.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I must proceed. I have only a moment remaining. I esteem it an honor to be asked to close the general debate on so important a measure. My regret is, however, that the time limit has not enabled me to discuss fully many important features. We are all agreed that the Treasury of the United States must be safeguarded, but at the same time justice must be done to the consumer. We are also of one accord and fully agree that this Government must keep the faith with the American farmer. The guaranty must be kept, no matter what the cost.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That by reason of the emergency growing out of the war with Germany and in order to carry out the guaranties made to producers of wheat of the crops of 1918 and 1919 by the two proclamations of the President of the United States dated, respectively, the 21st day of February, 1918, and the 2d day of September, 1918, pursuant to section 14 of "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917, and to protect the United States against undue enhancement of its liabilities under said guaranties, the instrumentalities, means, methods, power, authorities, duties, obligations, and prohibitions hereinafter set forth are created, established, conferred, and prescribed.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. LEVER. I hope the gentleman from Oklahoma will withhold his amendment just a moment. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HAMLIN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 15976) to enable the President to carry out the price guaranties made to producers of wheat of the crops of 1918 and 1919 and to protect the United States against undue enhancement of its liabilities thereunder, had come to no resolution thereon.

INFORMAL WAR CONTRACTS—CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1118).

Mr. FIELDS presented the following conference report of the House conferees, which was ordered to be printed under the rule:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13274) to provide relief where formal contracts have not been made in the manner required by law, having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina, from the Committee on Appropriations, by direction of that committee reported the bill (H. R. 16104) making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time and, with accompanying papers, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed (H. Rept. No. 1117).

Mr. MONDELL reserved all points of order on the bill.

GUARANTY PRICE OF WHEAT TO PRODUCERS.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the wheat bill.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. HAMLIN in the chair.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 10, after the word "prescribed," strike out the period and insert a semicolon and the following: "and the President is hereby authorized and directed to carry out the guaranties to wheat producers referred to in this section."

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the committee to the fact that there is no provision in this bill directly and specifically authorizing the President to carry out this wheat guaranty. Section 2 says that in carrying out the guaranty the President is authorized to do certain things.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. It may be that the gentleman is right to give a direct authority to the President. That matter was up in committee, but I want to suggest to the gentleman that the President of the United States is never "directed and ordered" to do anything. He is "authorized," and I would suggest that the gentleman modify his amendment by striking out the words "and directed"; then it would be unobjectionable.

Mr. LEVER. The whole purpose of the bill is to do the very thing that the gentleman seeks to do.

Mr. MORGAN. I admit that.

Mr. RUBEY. Section 2 gives the President authority to carry out these provisions of the act.

Mr. MORGAN. It says in carrying out the guaranty the President is authorized to do so and so. I have looked over it and I am quite sure there is no provision which authorizes the President by direct language to carry out these guaranties. The suggestion made by the gentleman from Michigan may have something in it. I do not see any reason why, however, there is disrespect to the President in directing him, because otherwise it would be entirely discretionary with him. I assume if the bill is passed the President will carry it out, and yet I see no reason why we should not put in a direct authority to the President to carry it out, and it seems to me it would be preferable to leaving the language in this way, because, instead of leaving it discretionary with him, Congress assumes its right of legislation and directs the President to carry out what we direct.

Mr. ANDERSON. Does not the proposed amendment suggest that unless the President is directed to carry out the guaranty he will not do it?

Mr. MORGAN. No; I do not think so. I would not convey any such idea.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. The President signed the proclamation, and would it be likely that he would not carry out the guaranty?

Mr. MORGAN. I think he would accept the bill as a sort of instruction, but I think it is no disrespect for Congress to assert its right to direct. But even if you leave out the word "direct," there would be no objection to making a specific authorization. At the suggestion of the gentleman from Michigan, I will ask to modify my amendment by striking out the words "and directed" and leave it simply a broad and definite authorization for the President to carry out the guaranty.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MORGAN asks to modify his amendment by striking out the words "and directed," so that it will read: "and the President is hereby authorized to carry out the guaranties to wheat producers referred to in this section."

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 7, after the word "guaranties," strike out the comma and insert the following: "and for the regulation of the trade in wheat products and by-products while such guaranties remain in force."

Mr. LEVER. To that, Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to take up over a minute of the time, because I think that most of the Members were here when I spoke on the control of bran, middlings, and other by-products of wheat a few minutes ago.

The point is that if we do not fix the price of middlings, bran, shorts, and the other by-products of wheat, they will go sky high, and the farmers of this country can not pay these exorbitant prices for feed and then not charge more for butter and milk and everything that they sell to the city people. If you are going to control the price of wheat and flour why not control the products and the by-products of wheat? I think it is absolutely necessary that some such amendment go into this bill.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will give me his attention, I would suggest that while I am not sure the amendment is subject to the point of order at this time, and I do not care to argue it, yet I think that it would more properly come in section 3.

Mr. BAER. In section 3, line 24, after the word "thereunder"?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. BAER. Very well. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the word "products" was substituted for "flour" in the proper place in section 3, it would serve the purpose.

Mr. LEVER. Yes; I think so.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That in carrying out the provisions of this act the President is authorized to make such regulations and issue such orders as may be necessary, to enter into any voluntary arrangements or agreements, to create and use any agency or agencies, to accept the services of any person without compensation, to cooperate with any agency or person, to utilize any department or agency of the Government, including the Food Administration Grain Corporation, and to coordinate their activities so as to avoid any preventable loss or duplication of effort or funds.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania: Page 2, line 13, after the word "necessary," strike out the comma, insert a period, and strike out the remaining words in lines 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, and 20.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, this section confers extraordinary powers on the President. It proposes blanket authority involving the expenditure of this entire billion dollars, such as "to enter into any voluntary arrangements or agreements" with anybody, "to create and use any agency or agencies," and "to accept the services of any person without compensation, to cooperate with any agency or person," and so forth—to do what the Overman Act did, in substance, utilize any department or agency of the Government, including the Food Administration Grain Corporation. I presume most of this business could be done through the Food Administration Grain Corporation, but for some reason or other somebody here, not the President, for he has been abroad and knows nothing about this except by cable—somebody here again wants these extensive bureaucratic powers which most of us felt we were in error in voting during the war. Now comes peace. But we propose here to let Mr. Hoover or somebody else invite any agencies here or elsewhere to do anything they please under the direction of the President, if he ever hears about it, to the limit of $1,000,000,000. I was one of those who did not believe that we should have given away at the expense of the taxpayers of the United States $100,000,000 for the purpose of supplying free food to the people of Europe. I had no objection to offering assistance along with other nations, but we were to be the sole nation to do it. It was voted through the House. I said at that time that there was some distress in the United States, and there are signs now that there will be real distress in the United States. We have taken out of the Treasury nearly all of the money there is in it. We have borrowed almost to the limit of the capacity of the people of the United States to lend, and we have in a general way given almost everybody, every bureaucracy, the power to expend, until we are all scared to death about the effect of taxation on the people. Now, this bill proposes, if this paragraph is agreed to, to let these new agencies, operating under the President while he is busy in France, go ahead and make any combinations they please, any contracts they please, which we must keep to the tune of $2,700,000,000 in war contracts down to $1,000,000,000 in the matter of these price-fixing grain contracts. We must let them go on apparently and continue making bonds and contracts, although we are approaching an era of peace.

I received a letter with regard to the hundred million dollar appropriation from a high official in the service of the United States abroad. I will not give the name of the gentleman who wrote it, but I am going to read briefly, if I have the time, an extract from this letter, showing that some of us were very nearly right when we opposed the giving away of the taxpayers' money to the tune of $100,000,000 to let somebody on the other side of the water, under the direction of Mr. Hoover, dispense it. He tells me that the farm people in Belgium, where they have had good German markets, are "fat and sleek." Evidently there is some exaggeration about starvation over there, but evidently food and money will be accepted so long as we are willing to tax our people to send it over for Mr. Hoover to give it away.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to discuss with the gentleman from Pennsylvania the suggestion contained in his anonymous letter, because during my 44 years of life I have made it a rule never to answer anything that came to me anonymously. Of all the miserable creatures in the world, of all the detestable cowards in the world, it is the man who attacks under cover of an anonymous communication.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This is not anonymous, I will say to the gentleman, but for obvious reasons I will not give the name.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman has not given the name.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I understand my business well enough, and I have full confidence in the writer, whom I know.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman's amendment would strike from section 2 the power of the President to create and use any agency or agencies; it would take from him the power to enter into any voluntary arrangement or agreement; it would take from him the power to accept services from any person without compensation, or to cooperate with any agency or person, or to utilize any department of the Government, including the Food Administration Grain Corporation, and to coordinate their activities, and so forth. It leaves the President only with the power in carrying out this act to make rules and regulations and issue such orders as may be necessary. That would mean, I take it, in a practical way, that the President himself personally would have to take over the management of the distribution to make good the guaranty of the crop for 1918. This language is in the existing food-control act. It is the language under which the present Grain Corporation has been organized, and I feel that it would be unfortunate if this burden should be placed upon any existing governmental organization unless it should be the present Food Administration Grain Corporation. When this matter of the food-control act was up for consideration at first it was suggested by some that the Department of Agriculture might handle the whole business. I very violently opposed that idea, as did the Secretary himself, because I felt we ought not to burden any existing institution with this extraordinarily difficult work.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Will the gentleman from South Carolina yield?

Mr. LEVER. For a question.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Do you not think it would be well if, at the end of section 2, some provision was made whereby, with the agricultural interests of the United States, the grain interests and milling interests should be represented in the agency to make those rules and regulations?

Mr. LEVER. I understand that is the case now.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It is not under this grain board that you are talking about.

Mr. LEVER. That is my information.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. If so, it has not been exercised, for there is not any representation, as I understand it.

Mr. LEVER. I understand that the President, when the price of wheat was fixed, appointed a commission, in which different interests were represented, to advise as to a fair and just price.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The point I am making is that in this agency which is to provide the machinery for the carrying out of this act there ought to be some representation looking after the interests of the agriculturists of the United States and the grain and milling interests of the United States.

Mr. LEVER. Let me say to the gentleman the agricultural interests are taken care of by the bill automatically. The farmer is going to get the guaranty.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Perhaps in the price fixed for his wheat, but the grain man is not taken care of, and he is the one that is going to suffer for this legislation, if anybody does.

Mr. LEVER. I do not see it that way.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That whenever the President shall find it essential, in order to carry out the guaranties aforesaid or to protect the United States against undue enhancement of its liabilities thereunder, he is authorized to buy, sell, consign, or contract for the purchase or sale of wheat of said crops of 1918 and 1919 and flour produced therefrom, for cash or on credit at the said guaranteed prices or at such other prices and on such terms or conditions as may be necessary; to make reasonable compensation for handling, transportation, insurance, and other charges with respect to wheat and wheat flour of said crops, and for storage thereof in elevators, on farms, and elsewhere; to take such steps, to make such arrangements, and to adopt such methods as may be necessary to maintain and assure an adequate and continuous flow of wheat and wheat flour in the channels of trade, including the protection of millers, wholesalers, jobbers, and bakers against actual loss by them on account of abnormal fluctuations in the price of wheat and wheat flour of said crops; to borrow such sums of money as may be secured by the property or other assets acquired under this act; to purchase, lease, and utilize storage facilities for, and to store, such wheat and wheat flour; and to requisition storage facilities therefor. He shall ascertain and pay a just compensation for facilities so requisitioned. If the compensation so ascertained by the President be not satisfactory to the person entitled to receive the same, such person shall be paid 75 per cent of such amount and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as, added to said 75 per cent, will make up such amount as will be just compensation for such facilities; and jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the United States district courts to hear and determine all such controversies.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the committee amendments now be acted on.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 24, strike out the words "sell, consign."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Page 2, line 25, strike out the words "or sale."

The amendment was agreed to.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Page 3, line 2, strike out the words "and flour produced therefrom" and insert "at the places designated for the delivery of the same by the President's proclamations or such other places as he may designate."

The amendment was agreed to.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Page 2, line 5, strike out the words "or on credit."

The amendment was agreed to.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Page 2, line 5, after the word "at" insert the words "not less than."

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, just one moment. It was not the intention of the committee by the amendment of striking out the words "not less than" before the words "the said guaranteed prices" to do what the language might indicate could be done. I think that language was put into the bill out of abundance of caution, to see to it that the farmer gets his guaranty. I really think it is capable of being interpreted in a manner that the committee had no intention of, and I ask that the amendment be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard on that. I voted against the amendment that was offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] because we had this very section in here written in this very way. It seems to me it is necessary to retain this language in the section in order to be sure what is going to be done by the agency established by the President. One of my friends, sitting beside me, has asked me to state what this is about. The chairman of the committee has moved to strike out the words "not less than" which precede in this bill the words "the said guaranteed prices."

Mr. HASTINGS. So that it will read——

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. The words "not less than the said guaranteed prices."

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Yes.

Mr. LEVER. I had overlooked the interpretation that might be put on this language. I do not think it is the intention of the committee that the Grain Corporation, no matter what happens, should go into the market and buy wheat above the guaranteed price. As a matter of practical common sense, if the world condition of wheat should become such that it would be worth $2.30 instead of $2.26, I take it the Government agency would not function at all.

The farmer would be getting his guaranteed price. But this may suggest a doubt. Does it suggest that the Grain Corporation might go into the market and pay $2.50 a bushel? The gentleman from New York made the suggestion to me, and I think there is great force in it. I think you are amply protected when the language reads, "For cash at the guaranteed price." That price is set out in the proclamation.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Suppose that in the judgment of the Grain Corporation, the crop of wheat being very short, there was serious danger of the price going very much higher. Then it would be authorized to buy above the guaranteed price.

Mr. LEVER. I do not think it is the intention of Congress, after peace has come, to permit any agency of the Government to prevent the farmer from getting his guaranteed price for his wheat. I do not think there is any authority for that unless it is contained in this provision.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Why not add the words "and not more"?

Mr. LEVER. I have no objection to that.

Mr. ANDERSON. Your contract is to pay the guaranteed price. Now, if you leave out the words "not less than" you authorize the President to do that very thing—to keep the contract and buy the grain at the guaranteed price. That is what we want to do.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. This is what the section provides: At the terminal, the place where the wheat is to be delivered, the President shall have the power to buy the wheat at not less than the guaranteed price. After he has bought it in the first instance it says he may sell it or buy it at different prices.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I ask for a division on that, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 6, noes 30.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I demand tellers, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota demands tellers. Those who desire the vote to be taken by tellers will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Not a sufficient number have arisen. Tellers are refused.

So the committee amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, line 6, insert: "And he is authorized thereafter to buy or contract for the purchase of for cash or sell, consign, or contract for the sale of, for cash or on credit, wheat of the said crops of 1918 and 1919 and flour produced therefrom at the said guaranteed prices."

Mr. LEVER. One minute, Mr. Chairman. I move to amend the committee amendment. On line 7, after the words "purchase of" insert a comma.

The CHAIRMAN. The clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. LEVER moves to amend the committee amendment by inserting after the word "of," in line 7, a comma.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEVER. Also after the word "cash" insert a comma.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. LEVER moves to amend, page 3, line 7, after the word "cash," by inserting a comma.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan desire recognition?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, this matter was talked over in committee, and it was arranged that this language in italics should be prepared and added. But in my judgment it does not carry out the understanding of the committee. It was the idea, as I remember, that the sale of wheat in this country would be for cash, and cash only; that this agency should not be permitted to carry on a credit business in this country, but that it might be advisable to extend credits as to foreign shipments, because we were told that the foreign shipments would be solely to foreign governments. Private dealers in this country deal with private dealers in foreign countries, but the Government agency in this country deals with Government agencies in foreign countries. So that it would be perfectly safe for us to extend credit as to our foreign shipments, because that would mean dealing only with foreign countries. But this would authorize, as the language is now, this grain corporation to sell on credit to dealers, private individuals, all over the country. I do not think that is right, and it is not my understanding that it is in accordance with the understanding of the committee.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman will permit me to say, this matter was handled by a subcommittee, of which the gentleman from Missouri was chairman.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, the understanding of the subcommittee that handled this particular phase of the bill was that when the Government was to buy it was to buy for cash, and when it sold it was to sell for cash or credit, and it was upon that basis we fixed the language. Nothing was said about extending credit in this country or foreign countries, except that it was understood by the committee—and I think in carrying it out the Government will follow that idea—that credit would be extended only to foreign countries.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The gentleman thinks that they will do only that, does he?

Mr. RUBEY. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. That is the way you would write a law to permit them to do anything they please. There has been too much of that. You say they will not do so and so, but you do not put it in the bill.

Mr. RUBEY. The subcommittee worked on this for hours to get it the way the committee wanted it, and we thought we had it exactly as they wanted it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—42 ayes and 3 noes.

So the committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 20, before the word "bakers" strike out the word "and."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 20, after the word "bakers" insert "and retain purchase in carload lots."

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be amended by making the word "retain" "retained."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LARSEN. I have an amendment which I propose to offer striking out all after the word "trade," in line 19, page 3.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman wait until the committee amendments are disposed of?

Mr. LARSEN. Will it not then be too late?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, if we adopt the language, will it not make it impossible to strike it out?

Mr. MANN. These amendments are only to perfect the text.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendments are to perfect the text, and the gentleman can move to strike out afterwards.

Mr. LARSEN. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LARSEN. There seems to be a difference of opinion among gentlemen who are well versed in parliamentary law. I make the inquiry in good faith. I would like to be sure that I shall be permitted to offer an amendment. The amendment I desire to offer is to line 19, page 3, after the word "trade," so as to strike out the rest of the line and lines 20, 21, 22, and 23, including the word "crops." The amendment just offered by the committee, as I understand, is an amendment to that section which might preclude mine.

Mr. MANN. These amendments are only to perfect the text, and it is in order to move to strike out the text afterwards; no doubt about that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated in answer to the gentleman's question that the amendment was to perfect the text, and it makes no difference whether it is voted up or voted down, the gentleman would have the right afterwards to strike out the text of the bill. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, in line 25, strike out the word "purchase" and the comma.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 3, line 25, strike out the comma after the word "lease."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that on page 3, line 5, the word "guarantied," which is incorrectly spelled, may be spelled correctly.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Chairman, I send up an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BAER: Page 2, line 24, after the word "thereunder," strike out the comma and insert "and for the regulation of the trade in wheat and wheat products while such guaranties remain in force."

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Chairman, if there is no opposition in the way of debate on this amendment, I will ask for a vote on it.

Mr. MANN. There can be no point of order against this.

Mr. LEVER. I do not care to press the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Now, let us see about this. I may be wrong about it, but I am under the impression that the bill is confined to wheat and flour?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. That is correct.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman's amendment refers to wheat and the products of wheat?

Mr. BAER. That is correct.

Mr. MANN. Of course, that is a very wide difference. I do not know whether crackers would be called products of wheat or not.

Mr. BAER. Cream of wheat, and crackers, and oyster crackers, and everything.

Mr. MANN. That introduces a very different proposition here. I did not suppose that was the purpose of the gentleman in offering the amendment.

Mr. BAER. The original idea was just to control the prices of by-products—and by by-products I meant bran and middlings and such things—but one of the members of the committee, whose name I do not care to mention, came over here and told me that it had better be wheat products, and consequently I have changed it from "by-products" to "wheat products." It is about the same.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think that in order to carry out the guaranteed price of wheat it is necessary that we turn over to an agency of the Government the control of everything that is made from wheat flour? That is a pretty wide and extensive authority, in no way connected with the matter of guaranteeing the price of wheat. We are to carry out the guaranteed price of wheat, and I suppose necessarily in connection with that, because wheat is converted into flour, and flour is called wheat, practically, we may have to control the price of flour; but this amendment would control the price of manufactured products, and I doubt very much the advisability of having the General Government, through an agency, undertake any further to regulate the trade than is necessary to carry out the guaranty.

Mr. BAER. We assume that the men who will carry out the administration of this law will be practical enough not to try to control the price of every product that is made out of wheat or wheat flour; but there are products that I believe, as far as practicable, should be controlled, especially the by-products which the farmer buys, such as bran, middlings, and similar feed products. They have soared 100 per cent in the course of the last month. I realize that the millers are not making much profit on flour. The millers made only 100 per cent profit last year, and it is a shame to cut them out of this profit on these by-products. Nevertheless I believe the farmers of this country and the consumers in the cities will pay higher prices for food than they ever paid before if we do not regulate the price of them in this bill.

Mr. MANN. That argument goes to everything that we buy, from hair oil to shoe soles.

Mr. BAER. Hair oil and shoe soles are not by-products of wheat.

Mr. MANN. No; but the same reasoning applies just as much as it does here. The gentleman wants to have the General Government undertake to regulate the price of everything that is made from wheat. Well, if that is so, we ought to regulate the price of everything that is made from wool and everything else, it seems to me. It has nothing to do with the guaranteed price of wheat.

Mr. BAER. I have heard the gentleman's logic and reasoning on this floor, and I would not be presumptuous enough to argue with him, but I think in this case he is in error, for I am not trying to take in wool and hair oil and everything else; but I would like a vote on this amendment.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Mr. Chairman, this proclamation of the President confines itself to wheat, and we are trying to create a machinery to carry out that guaranty. As the gentleman from Illinois says, this would go right down the line. In the first place, the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BAER] says that mill feeds have increased 100 per cent. Mr. Barnes was before our committee, and I want to read just what he said:

Mr. RUBEY. I have before me a petition from some farmers in my State protesting against this. I will read what they say:

"Almost immediately after the Government regulations were removed feed advanced nearly 100 per cent, feed which we are forced to buy on account of a short crop."

Has that prevailed very generally throughout the country?

Mr. BARNES. Yes. Your letter must be from the Southwest.

Mr. RUBEY. It is from Missouri.

Mr. BARNES. They had a light feed crop in that section, and therefore a greater need for it, especially in feed grain or mill feed.

Mr. RUBEY. What was the necessity for this advance in price, if any?

Mr. BARNES. The maximum price fixed at the beginning of the crop year was too low; it was below any possible comparison with any other feeding stuffs. And when the maximum price was taken off and the markets made a more natural reflection between feed and flour, the feed responded to the enlarged demand, while the shrinkage came in flour.

Mr. RUBEY. Do you believe that in handling the 1919 crop the power should be lodged in the Government to control matters of that kind?

Mr. BARNES. No; I do not.

Mr. Chairman, the feed price was fixed at $1.90, or $38 per ton, under the old crop, before the regulations were relaxed. The price did go up after the regulation was taken off to about $57 a ton. Since then it has gone back to $40 a ton. If we should regulate the price of feed products in this way, I think we would make a mistake. The price of it is generally away below the value of any other feed products. For instance, corn meal sells for $80 a ton and bran is selling at $40 a ton, and when the feed value is taken into consideration bran is worth more than the corn meal, so that the very object the gentleman tries to accomplish he would defeat. The people who produce milk must have bran, and under the regulations of the food-control act they were prohibited from getting it, because it was sold in mixed feed. I think the amendment ought to be defeated. I do not think it is in line with what we intend to do, viz, to regulate wheat and wheat flour; and that is the only object of the bill. If this were adopted, we would have to go on clean down the line for everything made from wheat. I hope the amendment will be defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 24, after the word "thereunder," add the following: "and for the regulation of the trade in wheat, wheat flour, bran, shorts, and middlings while such guaranties remain in force."

Mr. LEVER. I make the point of order that that is not germane to the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to think that that is the same amendment that was just voted down.

Mr. BAER. No; it is not the same amendment, because this other was more comprehensive than the one which I now offer. I would like to have read in my time a short excerpt from the Grand Forks American upon this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina reserve his point of order?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order and ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 19, after the word "trade," strike out all of said line and lines 20, 21, 22, 23, to and including the word "crops."

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this amendment close in 22 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Chairman, there may be those who are disposed to adversely criticize the President for guaranteeing the price of wheat during the years 1918–19. Those who are thus inclined may feel that it is easy to criticize with some degree of accuracy and plausibility at this time. But, inasmuch as the war terminated at an earlier date than many had expected, an impartial public may desire to know why their protests have been so belated. Those who now or hereafter indulge themselves in this respect may not be able to convince the public that such a guaranty did not materially affect our fortunes in war. Surely no one will doubt that it materially affected the morale of our matchless armies, as well as those of our allies. It is certainly not unreasonable to assume that it had a depressing effect upon those against whom our armies were contending. Who can estimate the lives or dollars which the guaranty may have saved? During the war on almost every billboard we read, "Food will win the war." Who will deny that it did contribute a substantial part or that the guaranteed wheat price was not an important factor? Be that as it may, the price was guaranteed, and as I conceive it, we are honor bound to protect those who in good faith acted to their injury in trying to comply with the President's proclamation.

While I feel that the guaranty which the President made was authorized by the necessities of the situation, still I do not believe that we should extend its provisions. If I understand the wording of this bill, that is exactly what it seeks to do. In line 16, page 3, we find this language:

to take such steps, make such arrangements, and to adopt such methods as may be necessary to maintain and assure an adequate and continuous flow of wheat and wheat flour in the channels of trade.

That is all right, but then we find the following:

including the protection of millers, wholesalers, jobbers, bakers, and retail merchants who purchase in carload lots—

And so forth.

I fail to see any reason why that class of people should be included in the provisions of this bill. Suppose they go into the market and buy wheat at $2.30 per bushel, a price in excess of the Government guaranty. Section 11 of the bill provides that the act shall expire on October 15; that any rights which may accrue to parties under it shall not bar them from suit in the district courts, and so forth. Now, suppose a merchant has wheat and flour purchased in large quantity, or at any rate above carload lots, and it has not been disposed of at the time fixed in this bill; that he purchases it above the price at which the guaranty was made; he may come in and claim protection under the provisions of this act, and there is no telling when we would get through with suits all over the country. I do not understand that it was the original intention of Congress or the President to protect millers, merchants, bakers, and that class of men. It was to protect the man who was producing something to feed the soldier and to furnish our allies something in the way of food. Mr. Chairman, if that is true, then let us protect the man who produces and let the fellow who goes into the markets for speculative purposes take care of himself. [Applause.]

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LARSEN. For a brief question.

Mr. LONDON. If that is right, why not include the wage workers and say, miller, wholesalers, jobbers, bakers, and their employees?

Mr. LARSEN. I presume we might with equal propriety. I have nothing against this class of men. I only say it is not right for Congress to undertake to put legislation on the country which will protect speculation. I do not desire to take up further time of the committee on this matter, and I desire to yield what time I have not used to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman can not yield time.

Mr. LARSEN. I would like for the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] to have it. I understood he had only three minutes and I had five, and therefore I would like for him to have it if possible.

Mr. LEVER. I have no objection to his having it.

Mr. LARSEN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] may have what time I did not consume.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has exhausted his five minutes.

Mr. LARSEN. Very well, then.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I think my friend from Georgia is laboring under a misapprehension touching this proposition. He has referred to the fact that he did not believe in protecting these bakers, millers, wholesalers, and jobbers against speculation.

Mr. LARSEN. I said in their speculation.

Mr. LEVER. Well, as a matter of fact, provision is made to prevent speculation in wheat and in wheat flour in this bill in another section; but, be that as it may, this proposition here is not so much for the protection of the miller or baker, but it is to guarantee the continuous flow of grain to the mill on the one hand and flour out of the mill on the other in order that we may have a continuous flow of bread in this country.

Mr. LARSEN. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. LARSEN. Is it supposed they are protected under the provision of the preceding line, or in line 18?

Mr. LEVER. He would be absolutely, but the committee wanted to be frank with the Committee of the Whole, and we wrote in this bill this specifically. It is absolutely protected in the language in which it is.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. LEVER. I will.

Mr. LONDON. That is, strike out the words "the protection of," so that it would read "including millers, wholesalers, jobbers," and so forth, you would obviate——

Mr. LEVER. This criticism?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

And you would not in any way injure the bill. I would suggest that the gentleman strike out the phrase, "the protection of," because it is your intention to provide a continuous flow of wheat and wheat flour in the channels of trade, including millers, wholesalers, jobbers, bakers, and retail merchants.

Mr. LEVER. Exactly. I think the gentleman has made a good suggestion.

I want to impress on the committee that our information is that from 35,000,000 to 50,000,000 bushels of wheat are required to be in transit constantly, and that the same amount of flour must be going out of mills and into transportation in order that there may be no break in the bread line. The miller may anticipate that on June 1, two months in advance, at the time when the guaranty runs out, that there will be a drop in the wheat prices, and refuse absolutely to buy any grain, because he thinks that he can buy it cheaper when the control is taken off and your bread line is broken. We are not trying to protect the millers, jobbers, or wholesalers. We are endeavoring to protect the American people and see to it that they have bread at all times. And I therefore very much hope that this amendment will be voted down.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, like every other Member of the House, I am in favor of the Government keeping the guaranties it makes, but I am absolutely opposed to the Congress creating some more and absolutely unnecessary guaranties that it shall have to keep hereafter.

What is the situation with reference to this matter? These words which are sought to be stricken from the bill are inserted for the protection against loss of certain traders in wheat commodities. They are there for that purpose, and for that purpose alone. Why should we protect them against loss any more than we should protect a man who deals in steel, or in corn, in cotton, or any other commodity? Why is it any more necessary to protect them against loss in order to maintain the usual course of trade than it is in the case of steel or corn or cotton? All of those articles must move in order to maintain our trade and business.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The reason why they should be guaranteed is because of the fact that by fixing the price of wheat you have also fixed the limit on the margin of profit.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Unfortunately, the gentleman's premise fails at the start. If the price is to be fixed, from what these gentlemen tell us, by the law of supply and demand, these parties to be protected will pay only at the normal price as if the sale was to be transacted in the ordinary business way at any other time.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Do you not understand that one of the purposes of this bill is in fixing the price of wheat to fix the margin of profit?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Not at all. If it is, it is something I would never agree to. The purpose is to keep the guaranties the Government has made to the farmer. These provisions which the gentleman from Georgia properly moves to strike out are for the purpose of protecting the other people against losses in trade transactions. Particular classes are being selected that are no more subject to loss than one who buys corn or cotton—perhaps not so much as in cotton. The cotton traders have experienced some heavy losses of late; yet cotton must and its products are as necessary as flour.

Mr. ANDERSON. The Government has created an artificial condition here——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If my friend wants to make an argument, he is on the committee and can get time. I have only three minutes.

Mr. ANDERSON. Very well.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The Government has created an artificial condition, as my friend says, but it is expected to remove it, so far as the country at large is concerned. We keep it up only with reference to the farmer. What reason could possibly be given why we should pick out the people who deal in wheat, its products, or flour, or afterwards use the flour in the way of baking, and say we will protect them against loss while we will protect nobody else against the fall of prices that we all know is going to occur. What reason is there why we should especially select the millers? They have been making enormous profits while grain was rising, so the Trade Commission reports. Why should the retail dealers in flour be saved from loss? Flour will not fall as much as some other products. But, gentlemen say, the miller will not grind unless protected against loss. If the gentlemen who put forward this argument were not of known ability, I should characterize the contention as absurd. Even now I can not but think they have been hypnotized in some manner by the food commission, which, like all these other boards and commissions, it always wants to unduly extend its powers. It is a sufficient answer to this claim that wheat prices have fallen before, and to a greater extent than anyone predicts now, yet the mills ground, the dealers bought, the bakers baked, and the people got their bread just the same.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HUTCHINSON] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Mr. Chairman, this is one of the most important provisions in this act. In the first place, as our chairman says, we have 50,000,000 or 60,000,000 bushels of wheat in transit. We have some mills which grind 250,000 bushels a day. They have got to make provisions to keep that flow of wheat running for 60 days. Some of them have bought as high as 10,000,000 bushels of wheat. If this should be stricken out of this law, I venture to say we will have a flour famine in a very short time, because nobody who deals in grain will buy a lot of wheat, with the expectation that the price will change at any time. While the law protects the farmers, certainly they ought to make provision for selling the wheat. You can sell the wheat, but you can not force the dealer to buy it. Therefore it is the most important thing in this whole bill. If you do not retain it, as I said a little while ago, you are going to have a famine in flour, and every mill in the United States will shut down, because they do not know where they will stand. I think the amendment ought to be defeated, and the provision ought to stand just where it is.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Why will we not have a famine also in steel in the same way? Why will not people refuse to buy steel ingots and bars to make them up?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Wheat is guaranteed to the farmer at $2.26.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. To the farmer; but they are not going to sell it to the mills. Are you going to keep up the price? Is that the object? We were told that you were going to put down the price.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. If the price goes down, say, to $1.25 a bushel, the miller ought to have protection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Do you say the miller is going to pay $2.26 under this bill?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Absolutely.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Why?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Because the Government price is there.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. You mean if that is the ordinary price? It may slump. It may be the same way with anything else. In that case you ought to protect everybody else against the decline of prices.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. That is the case with millers and the same with bakers. I know bakers who have bought as high as $100,000 worth of flour. They will not do that unless they are protected. This is to protect the regular routine of business.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, did not the gentleman from New Jersey have five minutes?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HAMLIN). I was out of the chair at that time.

Mr. WASON. That was the understanding.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman from New Jersey, as I understand, had five minutes. I was the only one to have three.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, if the time is so limited that the gentleman from New Jersey has not had five minutes, I would like to ask unanimous consent that he may have five minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Some of that time was reserved for me.

The CHAIRMAN. Two minutes were reserved for the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will yield it to the gentleman under the circumstances.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey will be recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. MANN. I understand that the bill does not undertake the payment of any loss to these people, but that the Grain Administrator may adopt such methods as are necessary to keep up an adequate and continuous flow of wheat in such manner as not to cause loss to the millers. I do not see how anybody can object to that.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not see how anybody can agree to it.

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Yes.

Mr. LARSEN. Does not the gentleman think that the small merchant who is not able to buy carload lots is just as worthy of consideration as the large merchant who buys carload lots?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. There are very few merchants who buy more than 13 or 14 barrels.

Mr. LARSEN. I do not think the smaller man should be discriminated against.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. The wholesaler can protect that man.

Mr. LARSEN. The baker would not buy at wholesale rates.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. The wholesaler can protect these men.

Mr. LARSEN. He might protect them for his own advantage.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. I would like to have the gentleman's version of the language that is sought to be stricken out—his interpretation of the meaning of that language. Does it mean that the Government guarantees these different dealers against loss, or that it will merely have the authority to promulgate rules and regulations designed to protect them aginst loss?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. The object of the bill is this: For instance, as to the miller with fifty or sixty thousand bushels in transit, for which he paid at the rate of $2.26, or whatever it is, if next morning he wakes up and finds it $1.25, he is protected in that amount.

Mr. BLACK. Then he is guaranteed against loss?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. He is guaranteed against loss.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I see that this bill provides that methods shall be taken if necessary to protect the jobbers and millers and bakers and retailers against actual loss. Suppose the methods prescribed did not work out and proved insufficient to protect these people against actual loss. Then what would happen? The officials charged with this authority may do the best they can, but the conditions in the market might prove to be such that the methods pursued might fail to protect the millers, bakers, and other included parties against loss in that event; would these parties be entitled to call upon the Government for reimbursement?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. That is up to the agency in control.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I am asking a question. Suppose the methods they set in motion do not protect these retailers against loss. Then what? Will the Government make good the actual loss?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. We are giving them the power, and we assume that they will protect them.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Then if the methods they adopt are not sufficient to protect these parties against loss, then it is true that the Government will make good to them any loss which they may actually suffer. That is what I understand from your answer that the bill proposes to do.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is there any amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia pending?

The CHAIRMAN. There is none.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment. I move to strike out all the language included in the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia and to strike out the words "the protection of" in line 19, page 3.

Mr. LEVER. I make the point of order that that is not in order.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. The time for debate on the former amendment has not expired, has it?

The CHAIRMAN. No; it has not. The gentleman will be recognized.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I yield my time to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. BANKHEAD. May I offer my amendment as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Alabama can offer an amendment to perfect the text.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is what I am seeking to do, and the gentleman from South Carolina made a point of order against it.

Mr. MANN. It is not an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Why is not that in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not ruled that it is out of order.

Mr. ANDERSON. There is an amendment pending now.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending, but the gentleman from Alabama is offering to amend the amendment.

Mr. MANN. No; not to amend the amendment, but to perfect the text.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman withhold his amendment until the debate is finished on the other amendment?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; I will be glad to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] is recognized.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, the Government has created and intends to continue an artificial condition in the grain business. It proposes to close up the exchanges so far as trading in wheat is concerned. Now, the exchanges represent the insurance of the miller against loss. In other words, against all the wheat he has bought for manufacture into flour he hedges in the speculative market. The Government has closed that speculative market and therefore prevents him from protecting himself against the loss which might result as to the wheat which he has in transit. Now, the provisions of this section are intended to meet that situation. Here is a miller who is gathering at different points, perhaps, a million bushels of wheat for manufacture into flour. If the Government adopts the policy of maintaining the price all the way through on the basis of $2.26, then, of course, the miller or the baker or the wholesaler can not possibly sustain any loss. But if the Government adopts a policy of buying the wheat at $2.26 and selling it at a lower price, then eventually we reach a point at which the amount in transit must be sold at a lower price; that is, the wheat which is coming in at $2.26 must be sold as flour at a lower price. It does not make any difference where you take up that slack. You can take it up when you buy the grain from the farmer or you can take it up when you buy it at the terminal; but if you carry that loss along to the point where it occurs in the hands of the miller, the wholesaler, or the retailer, you ought to take it up there. You are not taking up any greater loss. You are just simply taking it up in a different place than you might otherwise take it up.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I am very much interested in what the gentleman is saying, because it is along the line on which I want to get some information. Is it the purpose of this bill simply to guarantee to the wheat producer his $2.26 a bushel?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes; to make good that guaranty.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. And after the Government has bought it from the producer at that price, then thereafter is the price of wheat, so far as the rest of the country is concerned, to be allowed to reach that level which it would obtain as the result of supply and demand on the market?

Mr. ANDERSON. No one can answer that question definitely, because the circumstances may necessitate adopting either one policy or the other. This bill does not adopt either policy.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Does this bill give the authorities who will administer it the power to take all means necessary to make it effective, and undertake to maintain the level of the price of the wheat and the things that are produced from wheat, along with the original cost of the wheat?

Mr. ANDERSON. I think this bill contemplates that authority, and that that authority is given in this bill; yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. That they undertake to take up all the products to the consumer of wheat at the relative price.

Mr. ANDERSON. All the products of wheat flour.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes; whatever comes out of wheat—middlings, bran, shorts, and so forth.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired. In order that there may be no misunderstanding the Chair will state——

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Chairman, I do not understand that all debate on the pending amendment has closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understand that; but the Chair wants to state that where a motion is made to strike out a certain portion of the text and then an amendment is offered to strike out only a part of that portion of the bill the second amendment would not be in order until a negative vote is had on the first amendment. Then the amendment would be in order if there should be a negative vote. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LARSEN) there were 7 ayes and 39 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, to strike out in line 19 the words "the protection of."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 19, strike out the words "the protection of."

Mr. LEVER. I have no objection to that.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, we ought not to make the House pass something that will be ridiculous, and this will read as follows if those words are stricken out:

To take such steps, to make such arrangements, and to adopt such methods as may be necessary to maintain and assure an adequate and continuous flow of wheat and wheat flour in the channels of trade, including millers, wholesalers, jobbers, bakers, and retail merchants who purchase in carload lots against actual loss by them on account of abnormal fluctuations in the price of wheat and wheat flour of said crops.

That would be ridiculous.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I see that the phraseology would have to be changed. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 19, after the words "protection of," insert the word "consumers."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman from South Carolina accept the amendment?

Mr. LEVER. Of course not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then I shall want to discuss it.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this amendment and all amendments to the paragraph be closed in 25 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 25 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from South Carolina what the proportion of wheat farmers in the United States is to the whole number of farmers?

Mr. LEVER. I would prefer that the gentleman ask some other member of the committee who is perhaps more familiar.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think my memory is not awry when I say I heard the gentleman say that the number of farmers who raised wheat was one-sixth of the whole number of farmers.

Mr. LEVER. I think that is about correct.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This bill carries an authorization for $1,000,000,000, which is about $10 per capita for every man, woman, and child in the United States to pay in some way or other before this contract is fulfilled. Every one of the total population of the United States is a consumer. Not that all men necessarily are producers of foodstuffs, but in this instance the total number of people of the United States, 110,000,000, if there is that number now, will contribute toward the payment of this bill—toward the keeping of the bond, this bond, which one-sixth of the total number of farmers in the United States have on the Treasury of the United States by virtue of the price guaranteed by the President of the United States. The bill provides for the protection of the wheat crop, and incidentally other farmers will have to pay as other consumers of wheat will have to pay.

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I can not yield, for I have only five minutes. The bill provides for the protection of one-sixth of the farmers of the United States, and it goes further and provides for the protection of the millers, the men who grind the grain.

It provides for the protection of the wholesaler. Who is he? Is he the horny-handed farmer who appeared before the Agricultural Committee urging the passage of this appropriation of $1,000,000,000 to keep an inviolate contract? He was there, and he was well attired. But he was not the farmer who raised the grain; he was the wholesaler who dealt in the grain. He is to be protected in this bill. The jobber is to be protected in this bill. What a horrible name that is! How terrifying it was in the old days when our friends wailed about the middleman, whom they insisted should be eliminated—the man who stood between the honest farmer and his customer—but this man, the jobber, is to be protected in this bill.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. For a question.

Mr. LEVER. I would suggest to the gentleman that the very bright, intelligent men who appeared before the committee, and who were brought there by the gentleman, were some of the men who insisted on this provision.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; but they were not heard. The jobbers in grain are the men who stand between the farmer who sows and harvests the grain and the consumer who eats the foodstuffs. These middlemen, who have been anathematized in this House so often, and whom the farmers' representatives have generally decried, are to be protected in this bill. Protecting the jobber! Think of it when you have gone home after passing this bill.

The baker is to be protected in this bill—not the man who eats the bread but the man who bakes it. If he has some wheat in his possession, he is to be protected; but the poor consumer, the 110,000,000 of them in the United States, who must eat the foodstuff, is he to be protected in this bill? Apparently not. I ask the gentleman to accept the amendment. So long as we are protecting the baker and the jobber and the middleman and the wholesaler and the miller, we might as well protect the farmers' friend, the consumer, the ultimate user of his product. That is what the amendment means. I hope the amendment will be agreed to. I trust there are enough of us in the House to-night to give some protection to the consumer, who has been omitted from this bill.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat in sympathy with the purpose of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] in so far as protection to the consumer is concerned. I had an idea that he was to be protected under the licensing or supervising system provided in the bill; but I want to talk just a minute about some of those who have not had any protection, and I am a little curious to know why they did not put some provision in the bill for the protection of some more of the farmers.

The statement has been made broadcast, and a great deal has been made out of it, that nobody's price was fixed except the wheat man's price. The misstatement amounts to this, that nobody's price was fixed and guaranteed except the wheat man's; and I want to say to you that there is a large class of farmers the price of whose goods has been fixed but was not guaranteed, and they are tied up tight to-day and have lost over $100,000,000. Take the matter of the cotton seed of the farmers of the South—about 5,000,000 tons. It was selling at $83 a ton. They came along and said that they must fix the price of that to prevent exorbitant charges, and they reduced the price to $69 a ton, making a deduction at one lick from the market price of $70,000,000. They fixed it at that and let it run along for a while, until some of the middlemen and some of the farmers had considerable stocks and seed on hand which they had obtained at the price fixed by the Government, and then they reduced it another dollar a ton. They did not guarantee that anybody could sell it at that. That took $5,000,000 more. Then they took the linters and reduced the price 3 cents a pound—the linters that were to be taken by the Government for the manufacture of explosives. By that reduction they caused the farmers of the South a loss of $21,000,000, but they made no guaranty about taking care of the loss that we sustained there. They went ahead then, and, as soon as the armistice is signed they cancel all of the contracts for linters and render them lifeless, so that the farmers can get only a cent a pound for them now. That cost us another niggardly $16,000,000 as a result of price fixing without a guaranty attached. That makes $112,000,000 that they fixed for us, but they did not guarantee us against loss. I sympathize with the gentleman over there who wants to be guaranteed against loss on the flour that we are going to buy from those fellows who had a guaranty out West. You must remember that cotton seed, after it is crushed and put into the mill, is sold back to the farmer for fertilizer; and they said, "If you take that seed home and keep it there over 60 days you will be guilty of hoarding," and they indicted some people in my country for hoarding cotton seed, so we had to let it go until the mills were blocked, and they have not bought a pound of seed since the 1st of December; and where are we?

They immediately raised the price of the cottonseed meal. Having reduced the price of the cotton seed $14 a ton, they raised the price of the meal $7 a ton, and thereby they hit the farmers of the South for $15,750,000 more on the price of cottonseed meal, but did not get any guaranty or relief or protection either out of the consumer or out of the producer. That is one item I have been sometimes desirous of letting somebody find out—that price fixing was not confined to the wheat producers of the West alone, that the price fixing and the guaranty was confined to them, and they are the fellows who are on top. Now, I think it is a good time to put in something here to protect the consumer, because we have all got to buy wheat, especially the southern farmer, who has been hit $127,000,000 by price fixing without a guaranty.

Mr. BAER. Under what administration was that——

Mr. AYRES. Out in my State all last fall they claimed that the South was in the saddle and fixed the price of wheat and they did not fix the price of cotton.

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; and they elected a Republican House on that plea, and now are going to get $1,000,000,000 as a result of the action about which they howled, while the southern farmer gets it in the neck. I am standing to the Government fixing the price of wheat and carrying out her contract. I had a letter from a member of a bond house in New York last week, in which he said:

> Do you know 20 per cent of the next sale of liberty bonds is going to be used to pay a bonus to the western farmer on wheat?

I wrote back and said:

> I do know it; but who is going to buy United States bonds if the United States begins to repudiate her contracts with the farmers?

[Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Chairman, I understand the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON], a member of the committee, will probably later on introduce an amendment that will amount at least to a declaration of policy along the line I have had in mind. If he does not introduce such an amendment, I shall do so. If the market price of wheat is less than the guaranteed price, there will be a loss, and, as I understand it, under the provisions of this bill it is left to the President or to the executive branch to apportion that loss. They can place the entire burden of the loss upon the Treasury or upon the consumer, or they can apportion the loss between the Treasury and the consumer.

I shall vote for this bill because I believe that the contract entered into between the Government and the farmers of the country should be carried out to the letter. The farmers have done their part in this war nobly, and they submitted to the fixing of the price of wheat without objection. For the Government to repudiate its obligation now would be the worst kind of a breach of faith. But the consumer should not bear the loss. The loss should come out of the Treasury of the United States.

I endeavored to develop information by questioning the chairman of the committee during the debate this morning as to just what effect the passage of this bill would have upon the consumers of the country, but the time of the chairman of the committee seemed to be so limited that he could not go into that phase of the situation. I made another attempt to develop the same informaion from the ranking member of the Committee on Agriculture on this side of the Chamber, but his answers to my questions were, to say the least, unsatisfactory. No one seems to have given very serious consideration to the effect of this legislation upon the consumer. To my way of thinking that is now the most important matter to be considered in connection with this bill. No one has advocated, to my knowledge, at any time that the Government should not make good in the spirit as well as the letter the guaranty that it has made to the farmers of America. We are not now considering whether it was wise or not to provide for the fixing of a maximum price on wheat. We have now reached the point where the Government is called upon to consider ways and means to make good a contract already entered into and acted upon in good faith by the farmers and producers of the country.

Most of the debate has been consumed in a discussion of whether or not we should repudiate our contract and the guaranties when that point is not at issue at all. The method, however, of making good these guaranties is an important question, and therein lies the interests of the consuming public.

Assuming, as I have said, that the market price of wheat will be less than the guaranteed price—and I think that is a fair assumption—there will be a loss. The question is who shall bear the loss. If this were a business proposition there would be no doubt about who would bear the loss. The loss would be borne by the guarantor, and the Government is the guarantor in this instance and should bear the loss. But it is possible under this bill to make the consuming public bear the loss, which means, in effect, that the poor man who must buy bread to feed his family will have to bear the burden by increased prices.

This bill provides that the President shall have the power to place the loss entirely upon the consumer or entirely upon the Government, or to distribute the loss between the Government and the consumer. He is given the power under this bill to buy wheat at the guaranteed price and then to supervise its distribution at prices to be fixed by him. If the price of wheat in the market, through the operation of the law of supply and demand, which this bill will interfere with, were $1 a bushel, the loss would be the difference between the market price and the guaranteed price, which would be $1.26. The President could have the wheat distributed, as I understand the provisions of the bill, at, say, $1.90, or any other price which would mean a distribution of the loss between the Government and the consumer.

Now, I am opposed to that method for two reasons. In the first place, I do not believe that Congress should continue to pass legislation which shifts responsibility from the Congress to the executive branch, because by shifting responsibility Congress also at the same time extends powers to the executive branch which may or may not be used to the benefit of the public. In other words, I believe that Congress should assume its proper prerogatives and say what should be done and what should not be done. During time of war it was probably all right, or, to put it more in accordance with my views, it was probably necessary to centralize power and authority in the Executive and to leave him free to act as he might see fit under conditions which might be very uncertain. But the emergency has passed, and the Congress should now legislate definitely upon these important subjects and assume responsibility to the extent of passing laws which are directory rather than discretionary. Second, I do not believe that Congress should make it possible for any part of this burden to be placed upon the consuming public. The Government having entered into this contract, it should meet this guaranty and take its loss. The poor man with a large family will without doubt be less able to contribute in this indirect way to the meeting of this obligation than would the taxpayer who would have to meet it by paying the increased taxes. Besides, it is to the interest of those who have property and of those who have possessions which are subject to taxation to remove in every possible way the chances for unrest and discontent among the people, and I can not think of any way whereby the tendencies toward discontent would be increased more rapidly than by keeping the cost of living up, and whatever you may say about it the price of bread is always regarded as a basis from which to judge the cost of living; at least, if the price of bread is high the average consumer will look upon the cost of living as high, and I do not believe that the Congress should be in the attitude of making it possible for the price of bread to be kept up for the purpose of taking care of this obligation. I understand that the provisions of this bill, which places the entire matter in the hands of the executive branch of the Government, are regarded by some Members as being such as to protect the consumer against exorbitant profits by millers and others through the licensing provision. There, again, is a provision about which I disagree with those who have framed this bill. I believe that there can be too much Government interference and that the regulations can be made too complicated to result in any real good, even if the executive branch of the Government acts from the highest motives possible. We should get away just as soon as we can from Government interference with private business. I am for the strictest kind of regulation for the purpose of eliminating unfair practices and the preventing of the raising of prices by artificial means, such as trade agreements and otherwise, but I believe that after the Government provides strict regulation that then it should keep hands off and allow the natural laws of supply and demand to work unhampered.

I shall restate my position in regard to this bill in order that it may not be misunderstood. The Government having guaranteed the price of wheat to the farmer should make it good, but the guaranty should be made good out of the Treasury of the United States and not out of the pockets of the consumers of bread. Therefore I believe that this bill should be amended along those general lines, and the power should be taken away from the executive branch to distribute this loss as it may see fit.

So, therefore, while I am in sympathy with the spirit of the amendment which the gentleman from Minnesota informs me he will propose, which amounts to a declaration of policy, I do certainly think that Congress should assume for once the full responsibility, and, instead of shifting the responsibility to the executive branch of the Government, granting it the power to fix these prices, that we should provide specifically that the Government will take care of it itself and pay the guaranty. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I trust the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] will not be adopted. The words of the bill are intended for the protection of the consumer, to take care of the fluctuations in price. The bill provides that the miller and the jobber and the baker shall be protected. There is a plan now, or during the operation of the grain corporation there was a plan, by which the purchaser of wheat—the miller—was required to pay a fixed price, and if the price of his product was reduced, he could call on the Grain Corporation to make his loss good.

If the price of his product increased, he should make up the difference to the grain corporation, but he should receive nothing unless he had given consumers the benefit of the reduction of price. It was because he was compelled to sell his product to the consumer at a lower price than was warranted by the price he had paid for the wheat that he asked protection, and under the plan that will be followed the miller will not be protected unless it is necessary for him to sell, and does sell, his flour at a lower price than he can afford to sell it according to the price he paid for the wheat. So the consumer is taken care of.

I am in thorough sympathy with what the gentleman from Ohio says, and I trust the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] will offer an amendment that will not only declare the policy of Congress but be binding upon the grain corporation, and that is that in selling this wheat and providing for the price for the products of wheat as they reach the consumer the consumer shall receive the benefit of the world's price—a fair market price.

We had hearings of several days. Some of the learned gentlemen on our committee, more familiar than I was with some of the intricate workings of the grain business, asked questions along a certain line. Some of my questions were along this line, to find out from Mr. Barnes, the head of the Grain Corporation, and from other gentlemen who might later be an authority, what their policy is or will be. I asked them a number of questions, each one of them. My questions were whether, if the world's price, the fair, reasonable, honest world's price, of wheat should be lower than the guaranteed price, the Grain Corporation should resist the influences that were honestly and fairly operating to reduce the world's price; that the corporation should hold up the price and thereby save the Government from loss? And they answered that they felt it would be their duty to hold up the market price and compel the consumers to pay a high price so that the Government might be saved as much loss as possible. Mr. Barnes said, in answer to several of my questions:

Again, I say I believe that it is a sound national policy that if you have something to sell, a surplus to sell, to get just as much for it as you can.

I concluded, evidently after I had annoyed him by my persistence in asking him those questions, with:

Well, I do not wish to pursue it to your annoyance, but I wish to suggest that, in my judgment, if anything is done later to force a higher price than the natural, honest, world's price there will be serious trouble on the part of the consumers of the country. In my judgment, they are entitled to the actual, reasonable, fair world's price, even though it involves a loss to the Treasury of the United States. The Government must take its medicine.

And gentlemen who appeared before us did not believe in the idea I expressed, and I trust the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] will present something that can be written into this law that will require the gentlemen to observe the fair, honest, reasonable world's price and give the consumers the benefit of it. [Applause.]

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. MANN. There is an amendment pending.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The amendment including the word——

The CHAIRMAN. Is it an amendment to that amendment?

Mr. LONDON. I offer an amendment to perfect the text.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman may have his amendment read for information and have it pending.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LONDON: Page 3, after the word "trade," in line 19, strike out all of line 19, all of line 20, all of line 21, down to and including the word "of," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "and to prevent."

Mr. LONDON. My amendment would strike out that portion of the amendment which relates to the protection of millers, wholesalers, bakers, jobbers, and so forth, and which would permit the Food Administration to adopt rules which would prevent abnormal fluctuations in the price of wheat flour. In other words, my amendment intends to deprive the Food Administration of the power and to divest them of the duty of guaranteeing money damages to the class of persons enumerated in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I desire, Mr. Chairman, to offer an amendment.

Mr. MANN. We should vote on the pending amendment first.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LONDON. Is it in order to explain my amendment now?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman had the right to offer it, but all debate is closed on it now. Does the gentleman from New York desire to reoffer the amendment offered awhile ago?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I call for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 10, noes 29.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to strike out, on page 3, lines 21 and 22, the word "abnormal."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WOOD of Indiana: Page 3, lines 21 and 22, strike out the word "abnormal."

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I have four minutes. I think the force of the amendment I offer will be apparent to every lawyer here and every layman. It is a well-known principle of law that a descriptive statute that is subject to two or more interpretations is void.

It only requires a moment's reflection to see that the word "abnormal" is subject to all characters and varieties of opinion. What might appear as abnormal to one man would not be abnormal to another. What might be abnormal in one section of the country might not be abnormal at all in another section of the country. It is comparative. It might be abnormal, and it might be more abnormal, and it might be most abnormal. I do not think there is a State in the Union where, if this word appeared in any statute, that portion of the statute would not be held void on account of uncertainty; and if possibly it could not be expunged without injuring the remainder of the statute or the section, it would render invalid all that section.

This word can be stricken out, and the provision would still contain everything that is intended by the committee. It would then read: "against actual loss by them on account of fluctuations in the price." I understand that is the purpose of this legislation, at any rate, and if it is not stricken out it will result in all character of confusion. It will result in all manner of litigation. It may be inoperative because of the fact of its very uncertainty.

As a legal proposition, I do not think that anyone can safely gainsay the proposition that I have here offered, that it would be held void because of the fact that it is subject to two or more interpretations.

That, Mr. Chairman, is all I care to say on it.

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, the wheat guaranty did two things for our farmer. It gave him a lower price during the war and a higher price following the war.

It deprived him of the opportunity to sell his grain at the highest possible price during the war, but induced him to plant, knowing that regardless of whether or not the war continued and regardless of the size of the country's crop, he would receive a good price for his product.

In neither case has he had cause to complain. He received a good price during the war. He had no right to profiteer on one of the world's greatest war necessities.

We compensated him for the temporary loss he may have suffered during the war by providing an abnormal and artificially produced high price for the period of the guaranty following the war.

It is persistently asserted over the country that the United States should now abandon all further dealings in wheat or efforts to affect the market, and leave the price to be regulated by the laws of supply and demand and pay the difference.

This contention ignores the equities of the situation. The guaranteed price of wheat to-day is nearly a dollar a bushel higher than in the open markets of the world. Our price is an artificial price, produced by this guaranty legislation. The vast surplus that confronts us in this year's crop is largely the result artificially produced by this legislation. To suggest that, after having by artificial means produced such a vast surplus, we should cease our activities in the wheat situation and let the law of supply and demand alone control, which, with the vast surplus ahead of us, would permit wheat prices to descend to the minimum, is in effect a suggestion to invite an unlimited raid upon the United States Treasury.

The consumers of the Nation received the benefits of a lower price during the war. By so doing they met a great war necessity.

They now have no just cause to complain if they are called upon to sustain the Government in doing the things that are yet necessary to terminate its wheat activities on a plan that keeps faith with the farmers and does no injustice to the consumers of the Nation.

A surplus artificially produced can not, under the guaranty plan, be disposed of in justice to the Federal Treasury without further artificial control.

It is a safe rule that under any ordinary circumstances the price of any given article is determined by the price at which the surplus of that article can be obtained. We have artificially produced a surplus for this year by controlling the price. To fail to control the surplus would be to let wheat prices go down with a crash. The difference between the guaranteed price and the price to which wheat would naturally fall under the law of supply and demand, if regulations were now abandoned, is not a just measure of the liability of the United States. It is grossly unjust to suggest that we should abandon regulatory measures and bear the difference between the low prices resulting from the great surplus and the guaranteed high price which produced the surplus. The artificial regulation that produced the surplus must continue the control of that surplus until the transaction is closed on equitable terms.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Chairman, did the gentleman from Indiana consume all of his time?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. A division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is called for.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 10, noes 22.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment as a new paragraph.

Mr. MORGAN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Oklahoma rise?

Mr. MORGAN. To offer an amendment as a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] is recognized first, then. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ANDERSON: Page 4, line 12, after the word "controversies," insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"The President is authorized and directed, in the resale of wheat in the United States and its possessions, to sell the same at a price as nearly as possible reflecting the value thereof in the world's markets as such value may be determined from time to time."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on that be closed in——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that no debate is permissible on this under the former order. This is offered as a paragraph to this same section, and the committee closed debate on this section and all amendments thereto.

Mr. LEVER. My understanding is different from that of the Chair. I understood this was offered as a new paragraph. Is that true?

The CHAIRMAN. But it is offered to the same section.

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not care to debate it.

Mr. MANN. I should like to be heard on it for a moment. I think the Chair is right in his understanding, but we did not anticipate this. It is not amending anything in the section.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from Illinois will be recognized.

Mr. LEVER. I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this amendment be closed in five minutes.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like three minutes.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman has another amendment, has he not?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; but I want to speak on this.

Mr. LEVER. Then I ask unanimous consent that the debate close in eight minutes.

Mr. ANDERSON. If there is going to be debate, I want some time on it myself.

Mr. LEVER. Will not the gentleman from Illinois let us take a vote?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think I will ask for the regular order.

Mr. MANN. If gentlemen are going to try to cut us off from debating new matter that is introduced, they had better send out and get enough Members to do it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman conceded that the Chair was right.

Mr. MANN. Technically he was right, because debate was concluded on the section and all amendments thereto, but this is a new paragraph.

Mr. LEVER. And a very important paragraph, too.

Mr. MANN. Everybody supposed it would be offered as a new proposition.

Mr. LEVER. I am anxious to get along with the bill, but this is a very important amendment, and I do not think myself that the debate was foreclosed, except technically.

Mr. ANDERSON. I could just as well have offered it as a new paragraph, and if there is any objection to this I will do so.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not object to the gentleman proceeding.

Mr. HAUGEN. There are a number of us who want to be heard. If one is heard, all ought to be heard.

Mr. LEVER. I ask unanimous consent that debate on this amendment and amendments to it be closed in 20 minutes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Reserving the right to object, I should like to have five minutes in this connection.

Mr. LEVER. Then I will make it 25 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that the debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto be limited to 25 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not think I will use my full five minutes, and other gentlemen may have the remaining time.

My constituency consist wholly of consumers, and this is in their interest, and I think it is inevitable that there will be some reduction in the cost of flour. But here is the situation in which we find ourselves: We fixed the price of wheat, in the first place, in order to sell wheat to our allies at less than the market price under market conditions, by which action the people of England and France and Italy saved a good deal of money. Now, we propose to pay $2.26 a bushel, Chicago basis, for wheat, and to sell the same wheat, under this amendment, to England, France, Italy, and Germany, if they buy it in the United States, which they will do, at a good deal less than we pay for it. We fixed the price of wheat, in the first place, in order to save money to the allies, or at any rate we did save money to them. Now, we propose to pay a very large sum of money in order to encourage the production of an immense crop of spring wheat, not yet sowed, and it seems to me that our friends on the other side of the water ought to be willing to take their chance on paying for the wheat what the Grain Corporation will ask them to pay, because, as this amendment is drawn, it would permit anybody who wanted to ship wheat abroad to buy it in the United States at what is called the world's market, whatever that may be, and sell it at a much less price than we pay for it. I am in a very charitable and generous frame of mind, but, really, when you go to cutting off not only the tail of the dog but his head as well, as a matter of convenience to the rest of the world, it is going a long way. This cuts both ways against the people of the United States. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, the purpose and object of these provisions is to give the consumers, it is said, cheap bread, as cheap bread as they could get in Europe. Do you know that is absolutely impossible, unless you cut down the expense that is incurred between the farm and the baker. For 25 years before the war the people in England had a penny loaf that we paid 5 cents for. Why? Because the wages here are higher and the expenses of dealers and everybody are more. I was in England just before the war broke out and I know that that was the price of bread at that time—was a penny or 2 cents—and here we were paying 5 cents for a loaf.

Mr. REED. How does the gentleman get 5 cents?

Mr. STEENERSON. I am speaking about the price before the war. But you will never get it again, even if you got your wheat for nothing on the farms, because the expense of transportation and milling, selling, and making the bread is so much that it means more to the 5-cent loaf.

Now, the head of the Grain Corporation, Mr. Barnes, testified on that subject and he conclusively showed that this was an unnecessary and improper provision. He pleaded that he be given authority to manage the affairs so that we could get all that was possible out of the surplus. We will have a surplus for export, it is expected. We believe we shall have two or three hundred millions of bushels for export. By this proposed method you are going to keep the price down to what is claimed to be the world's market.

Mr. Barnes testified that the world's market was not in existence; that it was a controlled price. It is a monopoly price on the other side, and it will be here, because the buying is concentrated in the Governments of those countries and the selling is concentrated in the Government here. It is absolutely impossible to find a world's price here; and if you find it, the consumer would not get the benefit of it.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Has it not always been the policy of the United States to get as good a price as possible for the product exported from the United States?

Mr. STEENERSON. Certainly. Now, here is what Mr. Barnes said:

Even if they can solve the problem of paying it out of the National Treasury, the practical difficulties of returning it are enormous. I do not think we should embark on that policy, and I don't think it is necessary. It seems to me there are certain very clear principles. First, the farmer must have this price. Second, if we have a surplus to sell we should make an effort to get every cent for that surplus in this country possible by every legitimate means, and if we then fail to market that surplus at this price level, then there should be authority vested in such a way that a readjustment can be worked out if the practical difficulties can be overcome.

What you do here is to take power away from the Government. The President should control this matter in his discretion. He is just; he will do what is right; there is no doubt about that. But if you take the power away and say they shall not exercise it, then who fixes the world's price? The grain speculators of the world, and especially the grain speculators and exporters of the United States; they will fix the price in order to bleed the Government as much as possible, and when they get the whole of the surplus they will put the price back to the consumer before the consumer has got time to get the benefit of it. Mr. Barnes testified that there were 10,000,000 barrels of flour in transit from the miller to the consumer all the time and an equivalent amount of wheat was in transit from the farm to the mill. It takes 60 days to make the operation complete. If you put this into effect you will have a guaranty, and you will pay the miller millions of dollars for the loss he incurs, and you will be creating a loss. I hope the amendment will not be passed.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment offered provides that the President is authorized and directed to resell to the people in the United States and its possessions and sell the same at a price as nearly as possible for the value thereof in those markets as such value may be determined from time to time.

I think it would be a very unwise policy on the part of the Government of the United States to adopt this kind of a policy. In the first place, if we are going to direct the President as to the policy we ought to require him to sell at home and abroad at the same price. Otherwise we would be treating the foreign countries in bad faith. If the people of the foreign nations want to buy our wheat, we have a surplus of wheat, and certainly this Congress will not adopt a policy of bearing down the price of the products we have to sell abroad. That policy never has been pursued, and it never should be pursued by any government. What is the position? England, France, and Italy, the three great allies, will have a buying agency here.

It will be to the natural and financial interests of those governments and their people to bear the price of wheat, to make us sell it at the very lowest price possible, and when we place in our statute a provision like this we are simply playing into the hands of foreign governments, to let them get the wheat at the lowest price possible. We are helping them to reduce the price of our product, to add to the cost of the Treasury of the United States, with nothing to be gained. We ought not to do such a foolish thing as that. We ought to leave this in the hands of the President of the United States to act from time to time. Nobody knows now whether we will have a surplus of 100,000,000 bushels of wheat, or 50,000,000 bushels of wheat, or 400,000,000 bushels of wheat. I know how quickly a bright prospect for wheat is sometimes destroyed. The idea that has been presented here that we are bound to have a great surplus and that wheat is going down is not justified. The best thing is to leave it to the President, leave to the agencies that he will create from time to time to do what is best.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I think this amendment clearly presents a question of policy involved in the administration of this act. It will determine the question of whether the cost of this guaranty is to be paid entirely by the consumers of the country, so far as they use the wheat, or is to be paid by the Nation at large as a war expense. It was contemplated when we made this guaranty that if there was loss under it it should be paid as a war expense, and that it should not be implemented against the consumers of the United States. It is, I think, true that the amendment as I have offered it is subject to the objection which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] suggests, and I shall ask to offer a modification which I think will correct that defect.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. If that was the policy, why did that act contain the provision that the President by proclamation might exclude all imports in order to make the losses to the Government as low as possible.

Mr. ANDERSON. Of course, nobody is suggesting, and certainly I am not suggesting, any policy which will make the Government loss as large as possible. I am simply suggesting that between the guaranteed price and what represents the intrinsic value of the product in the world's market, the loss shall be borne by the United States as a whole, as a war expense. I want to point out that in this amendment I have very carefully avoided using the words "the world's price," because I am frank to say that under the conditions now prevailing there is no such thing as a world's price and there may be no such thing as a world's price during the next year.

I have left it entirely in the hands of the President to say what the value of the wheat is on the basis of the world market. If he says it is $2.26 a bushel, then I am willing that wheat should be sold in this country at $2.26 a bushel, and that flour may be sold on the same basis; but if the President says that wheat, under the law of supply and demand of next year, is worth only $1.70 a bushel, then I am not willing that the consumers of the country shall be compelled to bear the other 56 cents a bushel. That is all there is to this proposition. Let us see what we have done. We provide in this bill that the President can embargo all wheat and wheat flour coming into this country.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That was provided in the original bill, was it not?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes; and we have provided that he may close all exchanges of the country and thereby prevent speculation, and we have provided that the Government may become the sole purchaser of wheat, and when we have done those things we have given the President the power to keep the price at $2.26, if he thinks that is a just price to the consumer. If, in his judgment, the world's price, considering supply and demand, when he has all of the facts at hand, justifies a price to the consumer of less than $2.26 a bushel, then all my amendment does is to permit him to give the consumer the advantage of that price.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment by inserting after the word "wheat" the words "for consumption."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment as indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, may I not ask the gentleman to strike from his amendment the words "and directed"?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes. I ask unanimous consent to do that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as it will be when modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, after line 12, insert as a new paragraph the following:
"The President is authorized, in resale of wheat for consumption in the United States and its possessions, to sell the same at a price as nearly as possible reflecting the value thereof in the world's markets, as such value may be determined from time to time."

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, we are proposing to do, it seems to me, some very extraordinary things in this bill. I am in absolute accord, and I imagine every other Member of this House is, with the proposition that the farmer is to be guaranteed the price of $2.26 a bushel on his wheat, but in connection with that simple proposition of guaranty we are creating some very complicated machinery that is likely to work out some very difficult situations. The paragraph we have just read provides that certain methods may be promulgated that are intended to keep wholesalers, jobbers, millers, bakers, and retail merchants safe and harmless against loss. I wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact that all of these people intended to be protected must purchase this wheat and flour in carload lots in order to receive the benefit of this protection against loss.

Now, there are a very large number of bakers and retail merchants who do not purchase in carload quantities, but, perhaps, purchase half a carload lot or three-quarters of a carload lot, or in other proportions less than a carload. I take it that in the average district in the United States a far greater proportion of the purchases will be in quantities less than a carload. In these communities there will be found a merchant, a retailer, or a baker who purchases three-quarters of a carload lot of wheat or flour, and an abnormal fluctuation occurs. In that case the retailer or baker is not guaranteed against loss. Right by his side is a neighbor who purchases one carload lot, or two carload lots, or three carload lots, and as a result of the same abnormal fluctuation he loses out. That party will have the right to call on the Treasury of the United States to make good his loss, but his competitor, who had not purchased as much as a carload of flour or wheat, is absolutely without protection. Do you think that the practical operation of a law affording these contrasts and inequalities will be popular? Will it be just?

I wish to call attention to another matter in connection with this situation: Suppose an abnormal fluctuation takes place and it favors a man who has purchased as much as a carload of flour or wheat, so that he makes a considerable profit therefrom. Later he goes on the market and encounters another fluctuation which causes him to lose. Is it the purpose of this bill to balance the loss against the profit, or will the party be allowed to hold the profit which he has made as a result of the first abnormal fluctuation and be entitled to be protected against the loss which resulted from his subsequent operation?

Mr. WELLING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I do.

Mr. WELLING. Will the gentleman point out how it would be possible for him to make any money on the purchase of wheat when a man purchases a carload lot?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Why not?

Mr. WELLING. He has got to buy it at the guaranteed price when he goes on the market and he can not make any money.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Very well, suppose the price is maintained, how is the party going to lose in that event?

Mr. WELLING. He loses because there may be a fluctuation in the price after he purchases it.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The Government is to maintain the price if it can, but these fluctuations may occur after the party has made his purchase.

Mr. WELLING. It will not come below the price——

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Why not? Another practical difficulty which suggests itself in this connection is this: Suppose a man has bought a carload lot and comes to the Government with the claim that he has lost out on the purchase. Possibly if that man had conducted his business a little more prudently, if he had not paid too much for his labor, if he had managed his business more prudently, he would not have lost out. Is the Government going to pay such a party on the presentation of his claim, or will the Government make an inquiry into the man's business to ascertain whether if he had conducted his business more prudently he would have sustained a loss? These are difficulties which I think are likely to arise. Just because a dealer comes to the Government, stating that he has lost out, should the Government accept his statement of loss, or should it undertake to conduct an inquiry into every phase of the dealer's business to ascertain whether, upon a proper conduct of business affairs, he would have sustained a loss?

These are practical inquiries in connection with the likely operation of this bill. The moment you undertake to interfere by boards, and methods and regulations with the ordinary rules of supply and demand, trouble begins. Many of the provisions of this bill deserve our very serious attention. They promise trouble.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I am surprised to find that the committee had overlooked any of the recommendations of Mr. Barnes, who represents the Government. I supposed that every recommendation he had made had been ignored, but I find here that another one has been discovered, and it is to be turned down. We are now to take over the wheat and sell it at market price.

As stated by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS], wheat bought by the administration at $2.26 a bushel, with the exchanges left open on oats and corn, makes it possible to hammer down the price of oats and corn and carry the price of wheat down with it. If the price is hammered down a dollar, the Government agency is compelled under the amendment to sell it at a dollar loss, and then the purchaser turning around and offering it to the agency at a dollar advance, hence we have another endless chain.

The suggestion made to close the exchanges was turned down, which makes it possible to hammer down the prices. Mr. Barnes asked for authority of control over other foodstuffs. We have ignored that proposition. The two propositions will enable somebody to depress the prices and cause a loss. As I have said before, there seems to be a determined effort to bring about a big loss to this Government.

We have guaranteed the millers against loss. That may cost many millions. Nobody knows how much it will cost. We guaranteed the baker. Nobody knows what that will cost. We have guaranteed the jobbers against loss; we have guaranteed the merchant who buys the carload lots. It is proposed, in order to bring about a loss to the Government, to be dead sure that we are going to absorb this billion dollars, to sell the grain—first, that it might be sold anywhere in the world; now it is suggested to limit it to the consumer. But who can determine who the consumer is in the United States? Anybody buying 100,000,000 bushels may claim it for consumption, and there is nothing to prevent him selling it.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. What is an abnormal fluctuation of wheat?

Mr. HAUGEN. Nobody knows. Probably it will fluctuate 40 cents; sometimes more. I can not say.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Fifty cents is what I had in mind. If a man loses prodigiously at that, would that be considered an abnormal fluctuation?

Mr. HAUGEN. I would consider it so, if it is in a short period, for a day or week. Fifty cents in a week I should consider an abnormal fluctuation.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Suppose it was 50 cents in a month?

Mr. HAUGEN. That is very uncommon.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. This is going to be difficult to administer. Suppose it is 25 cents in a week?

Mr. HAUGEN. That would be abnormal. Anything above 10 cents in a week I would consider abnormal.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Have you any definition of "abnormal fluctuation" in support of that?

Mr. HAUGEN. No; that would have to be left to the administration to determine.

A gentleman asked a question sometime ago whether the Government would pay the loss to the miller. I might say for information that the licenses that have been prepared provide for the taking over wheat held by millers for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment as a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment as a new section, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MORGAN: Page 4, after line 12, insert the following as a new section:

"SEC. 3a. That the President is hereby authorized and directed to arrange with some grain dealer, miller, elevator, or operator thereof, or with some person, corporation, or agency, at each and every local grain market in the United States, so as to provide for the reasonable convenience of wheat producers in the delivery of their wheat, to receive, purchase, and pay for the wheat delivered by each and every wheat producer for the crop years of 1918 and 1919, at the price or prices guaranteed, and said payment shall be made in full on the delivery of said wheat to any grain dealer, miller, elevator, or operator thereof, or to any person, corporation, or agency authorized to receive, purchase, and pay for the same as aforesaid."

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment. If the gentleman will not ask for more than five minutes' time I will withdraw the point of order and ask for a vote after six minutes.

Mr. MORGAN. I will not take more than that length of time.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this new section, which is the amendment, and all amendments thereto close in six minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in six minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina withdraws his point of order.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to detain the committee, but I would like to indicate what this amendment is.

I take it that in carrying out this guaranteed price the agency created by the President will provide that the farmer may deliver his wheat at the usual grain market at such time as suits the farmer's convenience, and that it will be paid for. But there is no provision in the bill which in any way provides for such a thing.

The farmer is interested in three things: When he delivers his wheat, where he delivers it, and when he will get his pay for it. He ought to be allowed to deliver that wheat at his own convenience, just as he ordinarily does. He ought to be allowed to deliver it at his usual grain market. And third, when he delivers that wheat he ought to be paid that price in full.

Those are the only three things that my amendment proposes. I say that is fair and just. If you do not put some provision of that kind in the Government may require the farmer to ship his wheat to Kansas City, or to New York, or to Chicago, or to St. Louis, or to some other place. I do not apprehend that that would be the case; I say that frankly. I think the Government would try to suit the convenience of the farmer. This provision simply requires that to be done.

Now, we are going to give the farmer the price that we guaranteed to him. That seems to be agreed to by everybody, but we ought to have a provision which will protect the farmer from inconvenience. Certainly when that wheat is delivered he ought to be paid the guaranteed price in full. It ought not to be in piecemeal.

Now, that is all that I really care to say on this amendment. It is very plain and you can all understand it. I offer it in the interest of the farmers, and I hope it will be adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, the amendment is so plain that it ought to be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That whenever the President shall find that operations, practices, or transactions at, on, in, or under the rules of any exchange, board of trade, or similar institution or place of business cause or are likely to cause unjust market manipulation, or unfair and misleading market quotations, or undue depression or fluctuation of the prices of, or injurious speculation in, wheat or wheat flour, hereafter in this section called evil practices, calculated or likely to enhance unduly the liabilities of the United States under the said guaranties, he is authorized to prescribe such regulations governing, or may either wholly or partly prohibit, operations, practices, and transactions in wheat or wheat flour at, on, in, or under the rules of any exchange, board of trade, or similar institution or place of business as he may find essential in order to prevent, correct, or remove such evil practices. Such regulations may require all persons coming within their provisions to keep such records and statements of account, and may require such persons to make such returns, verified under oath or otherwise, as will fully and correctly disclose all transactions in wheat or wheat flour at, in, on, or under the rules of any such exchange, board of trade, or similar institution or place of business, including the making, execution, settlement, and fulfillment thereof. He may also require all persons acting in the capacity of a clearing house, clearing association, or similar institution, for the purpose of clearing, settling, or adjusting transactions in wheat or wheat flour at, in, on, or under the rules of any such exchange, board of trade, or similar institution or place of business, to keep such records and to make such returns as will fully and correctly disclose all facts in their possession relating to such transactions, and he may appoint agents to conduct all investigations necessary to enforce the provisions of this section and all regulations made by him in pursuance thereof, and may fix and pay the compensation of such agents. Any person who willfully violates any regulation made pursuant to this section, or who knowingly engages in any operation, practice, or transaction prohibited pursuant to this section, or who willfully aids or abets in such violation, or any such prohibited operation, practice, or transaction, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $10,000, or by imprisonment for not more than four years, or both.

With committee amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 24, after the word "transactions," insert "in wheat or wheat flour."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I wish to offer.

Mr. LEVER. Let us finish the committee amendments first.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, lines 6 and 7, after the word "transactions," insert "in wheat or wheat flour."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 13, after the word "transactions," insert "in wheat or wheat flour."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama. Where does the gentleman want to offer it?

Mr. HEFLIN. At the proper place to regulate the exchanges.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk can not tell just where the gentleman wants to place it.

Mr. HEFLIN. When I rose to offer it at the proper place the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] suggested that I wait until we got through the committee amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. Can the gentleman indicate the place?

Mr. BAER. While the gentleman is ascertaining the place, Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. HEFLIN. It comes in on page 4, line 24.

Mr. BAER. Line 25.

Mr. HEFLIN. After the word "flour," in line 24.

The CHAIRMAN. After the word "flour," in line 24, page 4, the Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

The Clerk read as follows:

After the words "wheat flour," on page 4, line 24, insert: "That the fifth paragraph of section 5 of the United States cotton-futures act, approved August 11, 1916, be, and is hereby, amended by striking out all of paragraph 5 after the word 'cotton,' on line 1, and inserting the following:

"'To be delivered on, under, or in settlement of such contracts shall be middling, strict low middling, low middling, strict middling, and good middling, the grades mentioned being of the official cotton standards of the United States of white cotton,' so that the paragraph as amended will read as follows:

"'Fifth. Provide that cotton to be delivered on, under, or in settlement of such contract shall be middling, strict low middling, low middling, strict middling, and good middling, the grades mentioned being of the official cotton standards of the United States of white cotton.'"

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, it is clear that it is subject to a point of order. I make the point of order on that.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks well to rule, in order to save time. It clearly is not in order.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BAER: Page 4, line 24, after the word "wheat," strike out "or" and insert a comma, and after the word "flour" insert the following: "bran, shorts, and middlings."

Mr. LEVER. I make a point of order against that amendment.

Mr. BAER. I hope the chairman of the committee will withdraw that. I do not want to discuss the proposition which I have discussed here.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman will take a vote on it, I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. BAER. I should like to have a little statement read in regard to bran, shorts, and middlings. It will not take two minutes.

Mr. LEVER. I ask unanimous consent that debate on the amendment and paragraph close in two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw his point of order?

Mr. LEVER. I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in two minutes.

Mr. HEFLIN. I want to offer an amendment in line 19, on page 4, after the word "flour." to insert the word "cotton."

Mr. LEVER. You can not have two amendments pending at once.

Mr. HEFLIN. Then I object to the gentleman's request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama objects.

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not object to the gentleman from North Dakota proceeding for two minutes.

Mr. BAER. I desire to have this short article, which appeared in the Grand Forks American, read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read it in the gentleman's time.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE REVENGE OF THE PROFITEERS.

No better demonstration of the necessity of continuing the Government regulation of prices has been afforded than in the sudden rise in the price of mill feeds. The day before the Federal regulation was lifted on these commodities bran was quoted at $27.73 a ton and middlings at $29.73. When the Federal regulation of prices was removed, bran shot up to $41 a ton and middlings to $46. A couple of days later the price of bran went up to $43 and middlings to $48.

In a short time the disastrous effects of this condition will be felt in every dairy and every farm that produces milk and butter and in every household that uses these articles. For the sake of the extortionate profits for one of the closest and most thorough combines in the country—the millers' combine—the majority of the population will be made to suffer. The producers will be unable to supply the necessary feeds for their cows, or they will be mulcted of practically all their profits or driven out of business. These conditions will result in a greatly curtailed production of dairy products if they are not remedied soon. The consumers will soon find themselves shortened on their dairy product allowances, or they will find themselves robbed outrageously by the prices of these commodities.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to you Members with urban constituencies and you men from the South and other places who are consumers that this is a very vital amendment, and if you overlook this price fixing of bran, shorts, middling, and other complementary by-products of wheat you are overlooking a good bet. I will predict that the consumers in the cities will complain of this fact in the near future, when bran and shorts will go up to $75 a ton and they will pay for it in dairy products.

Mr. AYRES. They are already complaining.

Mr. BAER. They are already complaining. I have heard more about bran and shorts and middlings in the last week from the farmers and the consumers than I have heard about this price fixing of wheat. The high price of feed is what makes butter high and milk high.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BAER].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BAER) there were—ayes 23, noes 27.

Mr. BAER. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were refused, 14 Members, not a sufficient number, seconding the demand.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I know that it is not proper under the rules to put on amendments that are entirely foreign to the subject matter of the bill under consideration. I offered an amendment to this bill to give to the President the same power over cotton exchanges that you give him in this bill over wheat exchanges.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is nothing before the House.

Mr. HEFLIN. I offered an amendment regulating future transactions on the exchanges——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Alabama is offering an amendment.

Mr. RUBEY. He must offer it and let it be reported.

Mr. HEFLIN. I desired to offer this amendment, "including the cotton exchanges."

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I rise to a point of order. If the gentleman wants to offer an amendment, let him send it up.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama will submit his amendment and the Clerk will report it.

Mr. HEFLIN. I move to strike out the last word. I am submitting my reasons for not offering the other amendment.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not yield the floor.

Mr. LEVER. I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes, the gentleman from Alabama to have 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes, the gentleman from Alabama to have 5 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. HEFLIN. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] wants to offer an amendment, and I will yield him three minutes of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not yield his time. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. HEFLIN. Then, I object.

Mr. LEVER. I move that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. HEFLIN. I have not yielded the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina can not take the gentleman from Alabama off his feet. The gentleman from Alabama has moved to strike out the last word.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I have offered the amendment that I wanted embodied in this bill, which fixes the grades to be used on exchanges in future markets to five broad grades, which cover from 90 to 95 per cent of the cotton crop of the cotton-growing States. The gentleman from South Carolina has made a point of order against that amendment and the Chair has sustained it. I have offered the amendment at the place where I though it was proper, and it would have been as proper on this bill as the Agricultural bill, to which the gentleman from California offered the prohibition amendment, and it was held in order. Since the chairman of the committee [Mr. LEVER] has made the point of order against the other amendment that I offered, to restrict the grades of cotton to be used on the cotton exchanges, and the point of order was sustained, I feel that it is useless to offer the other amendment, and I yield to Judge CARAWAY, of Arkansas, to offer his amendment.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer an amendment in line 19, page 4, after the word "flour," to strike out the word "or," and then, in line 21, I want to strike out the words "unduly the liabilities of the United States under the said guaranties" and insert the words "or to enhance or unduly depress the price of those products."

Mr. LEVER. To that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman add the words "corn and oats"?

Mr. CARAWAY. I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 19, after the word "wheat," strike out the word "or"; after the word "flour," in the same line, insert the words "or cotton"; and page 4, lines 21 and 22, strike out the words "unduly the liabilities of the United States under the said guaranties" and insert "unduly depress the price of these products."

Mr. MANN. To that I make a point of order.

Mr. CARAWAY. I do not concede that it is subject to a point of order. The gentleman has not stated any grounds, and I would like to hear the reason for his point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill the object of which is fairly well stated in the title—to enable the President to carry out the price guaranties made to producers of wheat of the crops of certain years. The bill relates to transactions of wheat and includes flour as a part of the transactions in wheat; all one subject matter of wheat. Now, it is not in order to include some other product as an amendment; it is not germane. To a proposition to enable the President to carry out the price guaranties in wheat I contend that it is not germane to offer an amendment relating to cotton, or steel, or minerals, or coals, or anything else of that sort.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, this section under discussion is only remotely related to the question of guaranteeing the price of wheat and flour, if related to it at all. It is an independent section injected into the bill to prevent speculation; that is all. You could strike out section 4, and the question of Government liability in guaranteeing the price of wheat is not affected at all.

This section deals solely with delegating authority to the President under certain conditions to prevent speculation in farm products. Now, that is all there is in this section. It seeks to regulate speculation in grain and grain products. There is nothing in the section suggested that it would not be germane to include other farm products. To hold otherwise would be ridiculous, it seems to me. All kinds of extraneous propositions are proposed here; but if we attempt to legislate for cotton, then the rule of germaneness is invoked and the amendment is held foreign. Then, there is no use of further saying that we are a deliberative body. There is absolutely nothing in section 4 which has to do with the main purpose of the bill, which was the guaranteeing of the price of wheat. It is a section injected here to regulate exchanges that deal in wheat and flour.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the regulation is to enable the Government——

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, that is merely an assumption on the part of the gentleman, because it is not necessary to the guaranteeing of the price of wheat.

Mr. MANN. I take it that the committee which reported the bill thought it was.

Mr. CARAWAY. I do not care what they thought; it does not make any difference to me what they thought.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say that the amendment must be germane not only to the section to which it is offered, but it must be germane to the bill. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas in striking out certain language and inserting other language changes the character of the bill.

Mr. CARAWAY. Is section 4 germane to the legislation?

Mr. LEVER. Why, it is a part of the legislation.

Mr. CARAWAY. Is it germane to the main purposes of the bill?

Mr. LEVER. Surely. It is a part of the machinery.

Mr. CARAWAY. In what way?

Mr. LEVER. To prevent undue speculation that would enhance the liabilities of the Government.

Mr. CARAWAY. The object here was not to prevent speculation. The object of the legislation is to guarantee the farmers a certain fixed price for wheat.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The purpose of the bill is very clear to the Chair. It deals entirely with wheat and wheat flour, and in its very title provides that the purpose is to enable the President to carry out the price guaranties heretofore made to the producers of wheat for the crops of the years 1918 and 1919, and to protect the United States against undue enhancement of its liabilities thereunder.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the Chair there with a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. What about the germaneness of the proposition to guarantee the millers and the bakers and the merchants and the wholesalers against loss? It shows that the bill goes beyond what the title proposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was not called upon to rule on that part of the bill.

Mr. CARAWAY. It constitutes a part of the legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. Section 4, where the gentleman offers his amendment, provides:

hereafter in this section called evil practices calculated or likely to enhance unduly the liabilities of the United States under the said guaranty—

And so forth.

The very thing that the title of the bill declares the President may do in reference to wheat, but cotton is not affected or in any way referred to from the first line to the last line of the bill. The Chair thinks this amendment very clearly is not germane, and sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That, from time to time, whenever the President shall find it essential to license any business of importation, exportation, manufacture, storage, or distribution of wheat or wheat flour in order to carry into effect any of the purposes of this act, and shall publicly so announce, no person shall, after a date fixed in the announcement, engage in or carry on any such business specified in the announcement unless he shall secure and hold a license issued pursuant to this section. The regulations prescribed pursuant to this act may include requirements with respect to the issuance of licenses, systems of accounts, and the auditing of accounts to be kept by licensees, submission of reports by them, with or without oath or affirmation, and the entry and inspection by the President's duly authorized agents of the places of business of licensees. It shall be unlawful for any licensee to engage in any unfairly discriminatory or deceptive practice or device, or to make any unjust or unreasonable rate, commission, or charge, or to exact an unreasonable profit or price, in handling or dealing in or with wheat or wheat flour. Whenever the President shall find that any practice, device, rate, commission, charge, profit, or price of any licensee is unfairly discriminatory, deceptive, unjust, or unreasonable, and shall order such licensee, within a reasonable time fixed in the order, to discontinue the same, unless such order, which shall recite the facts found, is revoked or suspended, such licensee shall, within the time prescribed in the order, discontinue such unfairly discriminatory, deceptive, unjust, or unreasonable practice, device, rate, commission, charge, profit, or price. The President may, in lieu of any such unfairly discriminatory, deceptive, unjust, or unreasonable practice, device, rate, commission, charge, profit, or price, find what is a fair, just, or reasonable practice, device, rate, commission, charge, profit, or price, and in any proceeding brought in any court such order of the President shall be prima facie evidence. Any person who, without a license issued pursuant to this section, or whose license shall have been suspended or revoked after opportunity to be heard has been afforded him, knowingly engages in or carries on any business for which a license is required under this section, or willfully fails or refuses to discontinue any unfairly discriminatory, deceptive, unjust, or unreasonable practice, device, rate, commission, charge, profit, or price, in accordance with the requirement of an order issued under this section, or willfully violates any regulation prescribed under this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both: Provided, That this section shall not apply to any farmer or cooperative association of farmers or other person with respect to the products of any farm or other land owned, leased, or cultivated by him, nor to any common carrier.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BAER: Page 6, line 7, after the word "wheat," strike out "or" and insert a comma, and after the words "wheat flour" insert the words "bran, shorts, middlings, and feed."

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that. We have already voted on that several times.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Chairman, I believe this is the proper place for this to be inserted, and I hope the gentleman will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. LEVER. I think I have been very liberal with the gentleman. He has offered this half a dozen times, and the committee has expressed its opinion about it.

Mr. BAER. I really feel that the last time it was out of place. I believe this the proper place for it. I do not like to take up the time of the committee, and I know the gentleman is in a hurry to get this bill through. Otherwise, I would bring in a lot of facts in connection with this, but I think I have been very lenient with the gentleman on the time of debate.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman is ready to vote, I shall withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina withdraws the point of order. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BAER) there were—ayes 22, noes 33.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota demands tellers. Eight gentlemen have arisen, not a sufficient number.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BAER. Can I ask for the other side, if I can not I will have to make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. No; it takes one-fifth of 100 to order tellers.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the proviso beginning with first line, page 8.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania moves to strike out the proviso, page 8, line 1.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe the American farmer wants to be exempted from any of the laws that are applicable to other people. This section provides for a licensing system under the direction of the President, and it prescribes certain penalties to be imposed upon those who violate the license feature or who resort to discriminatory or deceptive practices or devices. Now, I do not say any American farmer would do this thing, but in the name of the farmer some one might resort to the use of a deceptive practice or a deceptive device, some one might resort to unjust or unreasonable practices or devices, or charge unreasonable or discriminatory rates, commissions, profits, or prices; some one might willfully violate any of the regulations prescribed under this act. That would be regarded as a misdemeanor if any individual other than the farmer were to be guilty of it.

Who is to be punished under this section, the baker, who was protected by the preceding paragraph, the jobber, or the middleman, who was taken care of in the preceding paragraph? Are they the only ones to be punished? Suppose that which never should happen in regard to the American farmer should happen and that there should be a short-weight bushel, or some poor grain should be put in the bottom of the car, or that there should be some deception in regard to the quality of the grain, overheated, or something of that kind. If that were done by one who could prove himself a farmer, then under this provision he would be exempt from any of these penalties.

Mr. LEVER. I suggest that the gentleman read section 7, and he will find where the farmer is protected.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is there a section which protects the farmer?

Mr. LEVER. You bet.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Where is it?

Mr. LEVER. Section 7.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In section 7 the farmer is particularly cared for? Well, I am very glad to have that information, because I thought for a while this bill was to protect the middleman and jobber, and that they were to be the beneficiaries of this $1,000,000,000 appropriation, this tax of $10 per head upon every man, woman, and child in these United States. But seriously, Mr. Chairman, I do not see why in justice and in fairness to the entire population of the United States some of the people should be exempt from these penal clauses. The gentleman from South Carolina is a very fair-minded man. I know that he would not speak in the interests of the American farmer unless duty impelled him to do so. I know he would not put any provision in this bill that would exempt the farmer from any obligation imposed by the bill upon other people. He has already indicated that he would not include the consumer in any of the benefits provided by this bill, and I thought possibly if I could reason with him a little, especially at this late hour of the evening, when we are all in good humor, I might satisfy him that this amendment was a proper one.

Mr. LEVER. I suggest that the gentleman from Pennsylvania's reasoning is always persuasive, but most usually is wrong, as this is, and I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That whenever the President shall find it essential in carrying out the guaranties aforesaid, or to protect the United States against undue enhancement of its liabilities thereunder, and shall make proclamation thereof, it shall be unlawful to import into the United States from any country named in such proclamation, or to export from or ship from or take out of the United States to any country named in such proclamation, wheat or wheat flour, except at such time or times, and under such regulations or orders, and subject to such limitations and exceptions as the President shall prescribe, until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress: Provided, That no preference shall be given to the ports of one State over those of another. Any person who shall import, export, ship, or take out of the United States, or attempt to import, export, ship, or take out of the United States, any wheat or wheat flour in violation of this section or of any regulation or order made hereunder, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000 or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both.

Mr. BRAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, line 18, after the word "another," insert:
"Provided further, That no part of the appropriation herein provided shall be available for the purposes named in this bill unless within 30 days after its approval the embargo on cotton exportation provided for in title 7 of the espionage act, approved May 16, 1918, shall have been removed and all regulations and orders placed thereon and now of force shall have been vacated."

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that for five minutes only.

Mr. BRAND. Mr. Chairman, I have submitted this amendment because of the grave peril confronting the people of my district and State, which situation I assume similarly exists in all the cotton-growing States.

As it shows upon its face, the paramount object of this amendment is to lift the embargo on cotton and remove all limitations and restrictions on its free and unlimited shipment to all the countries of the world who need cotton and who are in the market for cotton.

Title 7 of the espionage act approved by the President May 16, 1918, prohibits all exports under certain orders and regulations to be fixed by the President.

On November 20, 1918, I wrote President Wilson the following letter upon this subject, signed by myself and Mr. BELL, he being the only other Member of the delegation accessible when it was written, all of whom entertained the same thought about the situation:

NOVEMBER 20, 1918.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: For the last two weeks we have been receiving letters and telegrams from constituents in our districts in regard to the cotton situation.

It has been suggested if the War Trade Board or Mr. BRAND'S committee do not give any relief to the cotton grower that we appeal to you.

The farmers of our districts, as a rule, are not selling their cotton. Most of it is stored in warehouses. The warehousemen will not loan a dollar upon this cotton. They claim that they can not borrow any more money from the banks, and for this reason they decline to make any advances, no matter how much collateral is offered.

Our people believe if the embargo upon shipments of cotton is lifted or removed that the price thereof will seek its level, which, in the judgment of cotton producers and other well-posted men, will be from 35 to 40 cents per pound. This has been a costly crop to make, and to sell it at the present price means a great sacrifice.

We are deeply concerned and interested in this matter. If you do not deem it proper or wise to remove said embargo, we respectfully submit for your serious and immediate consideration the proposition of not only authorizing but ordering the War Trade Board to remove its restrictions upon the shipment of cotton and liberally licensing the same.

This matter is not a question of politics with us or our constituents, but next to the war and the issues growing out of it, it is the most serious problem at present confronting our people.

We hope and trust that the matter may receive favorable consideration at your hands.

We beg to remain,

Most respectfully, yours,

C. H. BRAND.
T. M. BELL.

THE PRESIDENT,
The White House.

On November 22 I received his reply to this letter, which is as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, November 22, 1918.

MY DEAR MR. BRAND: The letter signed by yourself and Mr. BELL touches a matter to which I have given a great deal of thought and which I sincerely hope is slowly straightening itself out. If it does not do so, it will not be from lack of sympathetic attention, but only from lack of ships and because of the present impossibility of breaking the blockade which is continued by the armistice.

Cordially and sincerely, yours,

(Signed) WOODROW WILSON.

Hon. C. H. BRAND,
House of Representatives.

No substantial results having been accomplished by this correspondence, nor by cablegrams sent by Senators and Congressmen to the President while in France, I thereafter introduced a bill to amend this act by repealing said title, the effect of which, of course, would be to permit the exportation of cotton and the purchase and sale thereof by the different nations of the earth interested in the same, which bill is now pending before the Judiciary Committee. A similar bill had previously been introduced in the Senate by Senator SMITH of Georgia. It is apparent that during the few remaining days of this session of Congress it is highly improbable that this bill will be reported to the House for consideration. This being true, if the removal of the embargo on cotton is to be made effective by legislation, an appropriate amendment to some of the pending bills must be engrafted thereon at this session of Congress. It will be too late to relieve the crisis which now exists for such legislation at the next session of Congress or at the extraordinary session which may be called.

I desire to call the attention of the chairman to the Randall prohibition amendment, which was put on the agricultural bill, H. R. 11945, found in the RECORD of May 21, 1918. The title of this bill is as follows:

An act to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purposes of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products," and for other purposes.

Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by Mr. RANDALL, of California, is as follows:

No part of this appropriation shall be available for any purpose unless there shall have been previously issued the proclamation authorized by section 15 of the act of August 10, 1917, entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the transportation of agricultural products, such proclamation being the prohibition of the use of foods, fruits, food materials, or feeds in the production of malt or vinous liquors for beverage purposes.

After a lengthy debate, in which some of the expert parliamentarians in this House engaged, the Chairman decided the point of order was not well taken. It was accordingly overruled and this amendment was engrafted upon that legislation. In ruling upon and deciding the point of order thus raised, the Chairman, the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS], makes this statement:

This amendment does not compel the President to issue the proclamation referred to. He may issue it or refuse to issue it, in his discretion. But the amendment, in substance, says to the Department of Agriculture, we propose to withhold from you the benefit of this appropriation during the full period of time during which this proclamation is unissued.

And further on in his opinion he says:

The matter proposed to be dealt with is an appropriation of money, and this body has the absolute power to determine whether it will or will not appropriate. In the exercise of that power we may do unreasonable things, but, after all, the question is whether, with respect to the action proposed, we are within our powers and within our rules; in a word, whether this is a limitation, in a parliamentary sense, on an appropriation bill? The Chair overrules the point of order and remits the same to the determination of the committee.

After the point of order was overruled this proposition of Mr. RANDALL'S was hitched onto the Agricultural bill. In effect, this action tied the hands of the President and virtually told him he could not put into operation and make effective the Agricultural bill unless he issued the proclamation which Congress had theretofore authorized him to do, prohibiting the manufacture of liquor and beer.

I do not pretend to be familiar with the technicalities of parliamentary law obtaining in this House, but I know the Randall amendment is a parallel case to the one I submit. It is a precedent for the propriety of my amendment and is ample authority for a ruling on the part of the Chair against this point of order.

I also know that the rules of any deliberative body in making laws are related in a degree to the rules which obtain in the interpretation and construction of laws by the courts. While one enacts legislation and the other construes, both deal with proposed amendments. The trend of the courts all over the United States for the last decade has been to broaden the authority of the judges and of the courts in allowing amendments to pleadings.

The established policy of the courts is to be liberal in granting amendments where there is any degree of germaneness. The days of niceties and technicalities, so far as dealing with amendments to pleadings is concerned, are past. I do not believe when considering legislation in the House which deals with millions and billions of dollars of money that we ought to be sticklers in regard to points of order or hold in such sacred regard technicalities and niceties of the character involved in the objection to this amendment. And I appeal to the Chairman and insist that this precedent to which I have referred is direct authority for a ruling on the Chairman's part favorable to this amendment and adverse to the point of order made against it.

I take the position, if any doubt exists in the mind of the Chairman as to the propriety of this amendment, that it should be resolved in its favor, because the cotton-growing States and the farmers who produce the cotton are suffering the greatest calamity short of human life which could befall a people. The great cotton-growing section of this country is facing perilous times, and I firmly believe that if this embargo on cotton is lifted the atmosphere would clear up, and that what now appears to be a pending calamity may be turned into a national blessing.

As all of us know, this espionage law embracing among other things an embargo upon the exportation of cotton is war legislation. As the war terminated last November I can see no earthly necessity for continuing this blockade on any sort of exports, much less should it operate a day longer against cotton.

In my judgment all this legislation which was enacted on account of the war should be repealed as soon as possible, in order that the business of this country may get back to normal conditions. [Applause.]

I can not see for the life of me why any Member of this House or why the administration or any of those high in authority should insist that this legislation should be continued, particularly when it benefits no section of the United Sates and is working irreparable loss and damage to a great section of our common country.

The lifting of this embargo will work no injury to the constituents of any Member of this House, it matters not what section of the country is represented.

Millions of dollars have been given to the poor and suffering people of Europe. Billions of dollars have been loaned to all the allied countries of the entente powers. The taxpayers of this country have been burdened on account of the necessities of war by the issuance of billions of dollars of bonds, and now that peace has come, I think it is high time that we begin to consider the interests and necessities of our own people. [Applause.]

The cotton grower does not ask you to give him a dollar. He does not ask you to loan him a dollar. He does not ask you to fix a price on cotton. He does not ask you to guarantee a fixed price on cotton. All he asks is fair play and fair treatment and that the shackles which have been placed upon cotton by this embargo be stricken and the chains which for months have held it captive may be broken, and in this way so far as possible we may be able to prevent the vultures in the New York and New Orleans Exchanges from further inroads upon the welfare and well-being of the cotton-growing States. [Applause.]

When the administration, in October of last year through Baruch, laid its hand on cotton and began to meddle with the price of it, though done in good faith and on account of the exigency of the war, the law of supply and demand was paralyzed. This action turned loose an avalanche which almost swept the cotton grower of the South into bankruptcy and financial destruction.

When the war was on and the results of it seemed uncertain and when the fate of humanity and civilization was trembling in the balance and the high seas were filled with submarines destroying human lives and property from shore to shore, cotton was selling in the open markets at 37 cents per pound. When the administration began, under the authority given it by title 7 of the espionage act, to regulate the exportation of cotton, the price began to go down. The bears took advantage of the situation. The cutthroats and robbers in the exchanges of the country saw an opportunity to enrich themselves at the expense of the laboring people of the South. They seized upon it, and have been successful in their operations from that day to this.

Hundreds of banks have advanced money on cotton on the assumption that it would sell around 35 cents per pound. Hundreds of merchants are in dire straits and many others have lost the accumulation of years by reason of the operation of these exchanges. Landlords have suffered heavily, but the most distressing feature of the whole situation is the suffering which the poor laboring people have endured on account of the great slump in the price of cotton. The man without land, the cropper and tenant, both white and colored, is the least able to endure the havoc wrought by these cotton gamblers.

Though indulging in grave reflections while carrying the load which he should not bear, as "the ploughman homeward plods his weary way," he endures the pending peril like a stoic, and yet it is nothing short of a crime that he should be the victim of the cotton conspirators, who have deliberately robbed him of the just fruits of his toil.

Mr. AYRES. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BRAND. Yes.

Mr. AYRES. Do you mean to say that the price of cotton has been decreased in the last year or so?

Mr. BRAND. Everybody knows that to be a fact.

Mr. AYRES. I did not know it. The campaign was made all over the West last year that the South was in the saddle and had fixed the price of wheat and had not fixed the price of cotton. I can not understand it. Is not that same South in the saddle now?

Mr. BRAND. In what respect?

Mr. AYRES. I am taking the argument that the Republicans used last fall.

Mr. BRAND. That argument was delusive. The South was not in the saddle. How could she be when her cotton crop cost from 30 to 31 cents per pound to make it when it was selling f.. 25 or 26 cents, and the cotton grower could not borrow a dollar on it from the warehouses. While the Republicans got away with the argument in the West, instead of the cotton grower being in the saddle on account of this embargo he was on his knees.

The average price for cotton went from 37 cents to 27 cents per pound, and estimating a bale at 500 pounds and the number of bales now held plus that sold around 27 cents, the loss to the farmer and the cotton grower of the Southern States is approximately $200,000,000.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to interrupt the gentleman, but I suggest that the gentleman is not debating the point of order. I do not know how long the gentleman desires to continue.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will not interfere. Let him go on.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, there is a big lot of truth in what the gentleman says, and I ask unanimous consent that he may go on for a little while.

Mr. BRAND. Let me have but two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is arguing on the point of order.

Mr. LEVER. Is not argument on a point of order subject to the five-minute rule?

Mr. CARAWAY. Argument on a point of order is not subject to the five-minute rule.

Mr. BRAND. I will quit in a minute.

In my judgment, to a large extent this great loss can be retrieved if the embargo upon cotton is lifted and the ports are opened for its shipment to other countries of the world.

From estimates made by experts, the cost of raising the crop of 1918 ranged around 30 cents per pound. There are now two and a half or three million bales of cotton in the farmers' hands in the South, in addition to a great volume of cotton now being held and controlled by bankers and merchants. If this embargo can be lifted, in the judgment of well-posted and disinterested men cotton will bring, as it ought to bring, from 35 to 40 cents per pound.

A great battle is on between these cotton growers, who are trying under great difficulties to hold for better prices, and those people in the country who are interested in keeping down the price of cotton. The latter are speculators. They have no earthly interest in the cotton farmer except to rob him and fleece him. The House of Representatives should therefore see to it that the farmers have a fair and open fight in their efforts to have the law of supply and demand vitalized and restored, and this can not be done unless this embargo is lifted. They believe the removal of this embargo will have this effect. If it does not, no one is hurt.

As is known of all men, the farmers of the South have done their share toward financing every war activity from its inception until now. They have subscribed liberally to every liberty bond issue. They have bought freely of all the war savings stamps and certificates. They have given unstintedly to the Red Cross, and besides have yielded their sons to cross the high seas for France to engage in a war for the security of mankind, in which many have made the supreme sacrifice. Yet they ask no favor for any of these reasons, because this was a patriotic sacrifice which they and their fellow countrymen everywhere have made. Their appeal for relief is not based upon any of these grounds.

In one of the most famous addresses of Daniel Wolsey Voorhees he relates an incident of an Indian at the head of his tribal delegation who appeared at Washington to plead for justice at the hands of the official authorities:

> His bronzed face and stoical bearing told that he was a native of the North American wilderness. The English language was an unknown tongue to him, and an interpreter told his hearers what he said. In the midst of his eloquent utterances, accompanied by dramatic gestures, there flashed from his barbarian lips in barbarian language that immortal sentence, first heard on the plains of Palestine: "And as ye would that men should do to you, do ye also to them likewise." His Christian listeners heard him amazed. The Indian of the plains, with his blanket on, stood there teaching them a higher principle of government than had ever been practiced toward him and his waning, perishing race. This dusky child of a plundered, outraged people, in claiming protection for his home and the graves of his kindred, based his touching appeal on the injunction of the great Galilean put forth 20 centuries ago.

The cotton grower places his case and his appeal to Congress upon this rule and upon the principles of equity and justice and the equal protection with his fellows of the laws of the land, and upon these propositions he is willing to stand or fall. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I regret to have to make a point of order against this amendment, because I realize that there is a great deal of truth in what the gentleman from Georgia says. But I must make the point of order on the ground that the bill now under consideration is not an appropriation bill in the sense in which we understand appropriation bills, and therefore this amendment would not be in order except as a limitation. This not being an appropriation bill, it can not be a limitation, and as it stands with reference to this section it is not germane.

On that proposition, Mr. Chairman, I may say that the Chair yesterday sustained a proposition of this kind when the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] was presiding.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Oh, no. It was just the other way. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard briefly on this point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Do I understand that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] makes his point of order on the proposition that this is not germane, or that this is not an appropriation bill?

Mr. LEVER. I say it would not be in order unless it were in the form of a limitation, this not being an appropriation bill. A similar ruling was made yesterday on a like bill. It can not be a limitation; and the only way it can be in order on this bill would be that it should be germane, and it is not germane.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, in addition to the precedents cited by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRAND], a ruling, I believe, by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS], when the Randall prohibition amendment was under consideration, which it seems to me is clearly in point upon this proposition, I desire to cite a more recent precedent to refresh the memory of the House, and call attention to a bill a few days ago when Mr. GARNER, of Texas, was in the chair, when that point of order was made to a proposition identical with this. The ruling of the Chair was that although in his own deliberate judgment the point of order was well taken, yet in view of the fact that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] a short time previously to that had made a ruling to the effect that the same point of order was not well taken, and that the limitation in the amendment was germane, he overruled the point of order, and on an appeal to this House that ruling of the gentleman from Texas was sustained. Now what is involved in this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman allow the Chair to submit to him a question?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The cases to which the gentleman refers were appropriation bills.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What is the difference in principle, Mr. Chairman? The only reason why a point of order of that sort on a general appropriation bill is so prescribed is by the rules of the House—Rule XXI of the House.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. LEVER. I am sure the Chair desires to have the latest ruling on this subject. This is contained on page 3894 of yesterday's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The Chair ruled as follows:

> The Chair believes it is agreed by all that this does not come under the head of a general appropriation bill, and therefore the question of new legislation does not apply. The only question, then, is as to the germaneness of this particular amendment to the bill. Let us just see what this bill proposes to do.
>
> * * * * * * *
> That this is no general appropriation bill. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is not pertinent to the ruling that I am citing, because this is a limitation. Even under the rule that the gentleman from South Carolina is citing, the committee and the House have the right to put limitations even upon the Executive discretion in the exercise of its power of legislation.

If the Chair has any question upon that, I call his attention to numerous decisions in Volume IV of Hinds' Precedents, cited here on page 368 of the Manual. Now, as I started out to suggest, what is the object of this amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia?

The CHAIRMAN. Right at that point, will the gentleman permit the Chair to make a suggestion?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's contention is that this is in order because it is a limitation?

Mr. BANKHEAD. A limitation upon an appropriation bill, if you please.

The CHAIRMAN. A limitation under the Holman rule.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Not necessarily. It is a general proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The reason for the Holman rule was that it was an effort to save the Government some money.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am not discussing the Holman rule. That is not involved in this question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman cites page 368 of the Manual?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair calls the gentleman's attention to the citation at the top of page 369.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; but let me call the attention of the Chair to those at the bottom of page 368.

The CHAIRMAN. The citation on page 369 is—

> But such limitations must give no affirmative direction, and must not impose new duties upon the executive officers.
